THE ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE OF ART.

WASHINGTON TAKING FAREWELL OF HIS MOTHER.

THE incident depicted in the annexed engraving illustrates, in a striking manner, one of the most admirable of the many estimable traits in the idiosyncrasy of the purest public character of modern times. Like many of the greatest men in all ages, from the earliest of the heroes of antiquity, to the last of British warriors—whose presence is hardly yet lost to our wondering vision, the competitor and conqueror of Napoleon, himself a conspicuous example of the same filial attachment—Washington was remarkable for his devoted affection to his mother. Not only was he so in early life, to such a degree that the pain of separating from her prevented his acceptance of an apparently advantageous commission in the naval service; but, long after, when he had attained the highest eminence that had probably ever been reached, his first care was to pay her honour, and seek her blessing before he entered on the final stage of his glorious and unparalleled career. Just previously to the period of his departure for New York to take the oath of office on being elected President of the States to which his valour had given freedom, and to which his wisdom was about to impart the enduring strength of cohesion and identity of aim and object, he hastened to Fredericksburg, where, at the age of eighty-five years, and afflicted by a disease the most terrible that can tax the fortitude of humanity—cancer in the breast—his mother resided, bowed with age and shattered with pain, but sustained by Christian resignation, and buoyed up with natural pride at being the parent of such a son. The interview is described as having been most affecting. She speeding him on his mission; he promising a speedy return to report to her how the inaugural steps of what remained of that great enterprise had been gone through; and she admonishing him of the unlikelihood that she should be alive to receive him, but assuring him of her conviction that he would in all things prove worthy of the destiny Providence had evidently marked out for him; both mother and son dissolved in tears at the thought that they had looked upon each other for the last time on earth. It is this ennobling episode in the patriot's life that our artist has endeavoured to render in the engraving; and the reader will, we think, agree with us that he has succeeded as far as the material employed in the delineation will admit of the portrayal of emotion at once too subtle and too sacred to be capable of tangible delineation through the medium of the pencil.

To the credit of Americans, they are not merely jealous of the fame of their great countryman in every particular, but they extend their pride and attachment to his memory to that of his mother. And not in words only. The corner-stone of the monument erected over her grave at Fredericksburg, was laid by Andrew Jackson, President of the United States, in May, 1833, amidst every accessory of public ceremonial that could testify to the solemnity and strength of a people's veneration. As the exponent of this sentiment the President said that "when the American pilgrim shall, in after ages, come up to this high and holy place, and lay his hand upon this sacred column, may he recall the virtues of her who sleeps beneath, and depart with his affections purified, and his piety strengthened, while he invokes blessings upon the memory of the mother of Washington."

It is, of course, not our intention to offer anything in the shape of a biography of Washington, nor an analysis of his character. Contemporary judges disposed of both during his lifetime, and history has not disturbed the verdict. If we were to dwell upon his career, it would be to remove an erroneous impression which cursory readers of the events in which he figured too often carry away—viz., that his great successes were the result either of chance or of genius. They were neither; and therein is one important element of value in the example of Washington, as showing what is possible when opportunities are prudently treasured and judiciously applied at the right moment. It so happened that Washington's early professional occupation, as a surveyor of large estates, gave him a familiarity with the military positions of the country that proved of inestimable utility in the subsequent war, in which so much depended upon acquaintance with the geography of particular districts. So, again, with another branch of his early professional pursuits, as a valuer and appraiser of the timber and products of the estates he surveyed. The necessity for accurate reckoning and laborious account keeping, imparted a mastery of detail in arithmetic that proved of the greatest importance when he had to arrange for the provisioning of forces heterogeneously drawn together, and to conduct the business of a commissariat often but scantily and precariously supplied. The habits of business to which he devoted himself in youth he carried into the camp and the senate-house in after life, where they gave him a prodigious superiority not only over the great majority of his own countrymen, many of whom were ever ready to decry his ability and to fetter the exercise of his judgment, but over the drawing-room soldiers and red-tape diplomatists sent out from England, filled with disdain and contempt for the American, and who only learnt to correct their estimate of his sagacity, alike in the field and the council-chamber, after experience of the most costly nature to their country and to themselves. Washington was not a conqueror in the ordinary sense of the term; neither was his in any way one of those dazzling minds whose effulgence blinds mankind to eccentricities that too often degenerate into the criminal and indefensible. On the contrary, sobriety of view, common sense, moderation in all things, an adherence to the homely virtues, and a pure and unambitious love of the cause of his country, not only because it was his country's, but because, also, it was the cause of justice and truth:—these were his attributes; and in right of these he has left behind him, for the edification of all posterity, a reputation that has no parallel, at least in the annals of the Anglo-Saxon race, with the single exception of Alfred.

Sir James Mackintosh, in his famous "Reasons against the French War of 1793" (which Mr. Cobden has also recently unanswerably shown ought never to have been undertaken, whether on the grounds of justice or of expediency, or even of a wise selfishness at the time), spoke glowingly of the genius of William III. in conducting a similar crusade against Louis XIV., urging that "that confederacy required, to build it up and hold it together, all the exalted ability, all the comprehensive wisdom, all the disinterested moderation, and all the unshaken perseverance of the Great Dutchman—other talents than those of petty intrigue and pompous declamation." Upon that passage, Mr. James Mackintosh, in editing his father's works, makes the following note:—"If there be any man in the present age who deserves the honour of being compared with this great prince, it is George Washington. The merit of both is more solid than dazzling. The same plain sense, the same simplicity of character, the same love of their country, the same unaffected heroism, distinguish both these illustrious men; and both were so highly favoured by Providence as to be made its chosen instruments for redeeming nations from bondage. As William had to contend with greater captains, and to struggle with more complicated political difficulties, we are able more decisively to ascertain his martial prowess and his civil prudence. It has been the fortune of Washington to give more signal proof of his disinterestedness, as he was placed in a situation in which he could, without blame, resign the supreme administration of that commonwealth which his valour had guarded in infancy against foreign force, and which his wisdom has since guided through still more formidable domestic perils." Nothing can be more accurate and discriminating than this parallel, though one ingredient in favour of the great American is left out—the purity of his private moral character, his temperance, and his decorous observance of the domestic virtues; whereas the king, if he be not greatly belied by his panegyrists, including Bishop Burnet, the historian of the revolution and chaplain to his majesty, was addicted to the pernicious habit of dram-drinking, and other indulgences, if possible, still more reprehensible. Besides, William's memory is stained, if not by deeds of actual cruelty, at least by insensibility to many of great atrocity, some directly affecting himself. For instance, when he was twenty-one years of age, the Dutch people, inflamed by the misfortunes and burdens of the war in which their statesmen, the De Witts and other aristocratic families, had involved them with France and England, murdered the obnoxious oligarchs; and William, who had been raised to chief power as Stadtholder and Captain-General, like many of his ancestors, neither took proper means to prevent the outrage, nor any means whatever to punish the perpetrators. So, again, with the horrible massacre of the Macdonald clan, in the Vale of Glencoe, when thirty-eight men were brutally slain, and women and children, their wives and offspring, were turned out naked in a dark and freezing night, and perished with cold and hunger—the sole cause for this inhumanity at the hands of the Earl of Argyle and his regiment being, that the undefending inhabitants of the valley had not surrendered in time to William's proclamation.

No participation in such deeds as these, nor even any connivance at them, sullies the fame of Washington; and though we fully subscribe to the eulogium on William, yet, by so much more, in the instances we have cited, and other analogous ones that might be added, does the character of the noble American transcend his. It is to be borne in mind, too, that the provocation to cruelty was quite as great in the case of Washington as of William; for the American War of Independence was, in reality, quite as much a civil war as that in which the Dutchman was engaged in the invasion of England, or even in the conquest of Ireland, where the whole popular feeling was on the side of his father-in-law, James II., and continued to be strong in the same cause long after it had died out even in Scotland; indeed, up to the beginning of the present century, as testified by the rebellion of '98, which was merely another phase of the spirit that was crushed in 1688. The only piece of even questionable severity, in which Washington's memory is in the least degree implicated, is the execution of Major André, to whose death more interest attached on account of his heroic and romantic character and the circumstances surrounding it, than from any real culpability on the part of Washington in causing it, though political animosity at the time stigmatised the American in much the same terms that were afterwards applied to Bonaparte, in reference to the capture and execution of the Duke d'Enghien in the fosse of Vincennes. André, the reader will remember, was an adjutant-general in the British army, and was taken on his return from a secret expedition to the traitorous American general, Arnold, in disguise, within the American lines, September 23rd, 1780. It was not, however, till the October following that he was sentenced to death by a court-martial of Washington's officers at Tappan, every possible facility being given for his defence; but the proofs that he deserved death, according to the usages of war, were overwhelming, and he was hanged upon the evidence of criminality that satisfied his judges, who wept at the fate to which they were forced to doom so magnanimous a victim of his own daring and devotion. Arnold, originally a surgeon, promoted to high military command for his skill and bravery against the British, entered into negotiations with the British general, Clinton, for the surrender of a post of great consequence with which Washington had entrusted him; but the capture of André, whom Clinton had entrusted with the execution of the project, led to its disclosure, and Arnold flew to the royalist quarters, where he was captured by Clinton against his former comrades, and raised to the rank of brigadier-general; dying in England as late as 1801. Here alone, unfortunately, the real traitor and offender escaped, while the innocent suffered through the inexorable requirements of the military service at such a moment and under such circumstances.

It may not be uninteresting to some of our younger readers to learn a little of André's history. Born in London, in 1751, he became accidentally enamoured of a Miss Honora Sneyd; but at the instigation of her relatives, who disapproved of the intended alliance, she discontinued her correspondence with him, and soon after married Mr. Lovell Edgeworth, father of the celebrated novelist, who died only a few years ago at her seat in Ireland, and was famous as being the person whose works, in favour of her native country, incited Scott to commence the immortal fictions of the "Waverley Series;" William Lovell Edgeworth himself being also a man of remarkable ability, especially in inventions of mechanical ingenuity. Pending his courtship of Miss Sneyd, André, in hopes of benefiting his pecuniary position, entered a mercantile house in London; but on learning that the object of his affections had been married, he joined the British army in America, where his abilities and gallantry secured him rapid promotion, raising him to the rank of adjutant-general of the forces, and adding to the command-in-chief, Sir Henry Clinton. It is related of him, that besides courage and distinguished military talent, he possessed a well-cultivated mind, being a proficient in drawing and music, and evincing considerable poetic humour in a piece called the "Cow Chase," which appeared in three successive parts at New York, the last on the very day of his capture. One of his last letters gives us an affecting incident relating to his first love. When stripped of everything by those who seized him, he contrived to conceal in his mouth a portrait of Honora, which he always carried on his person, though he was unaware that she had breathed her last some months before. All visitors to Westminster Abbey will remember the beautiful monument under the organ-screen, with its spirited inscription, erected to his memory as lately as 1821, at the expense of George III., the figure of Washington on the bas-relief having had a new head three several times—a consequence of the "wanton mischief of some school-boy, fired, perhaps, with raw notions of transatlantic freedom," as Charles Lamb, with comic pleasantry, said to Southey, after the author of "Joan of Arc" had become poet laureate, and had taken to panegyrise persons and principles he had been all his previous life denouncing.

PETER THE GREAT.

Peter being the son of Alexis, by a second marriage, was not at all liked in the family; no one, therefore, thought of his reigning even for a day. His father died, leaving three sons—Phedor, Ivan, and Peter—the eldest of whom ascended the throne. Phedor's reign was of short duration, and, as Ivan was an imbecile, he determined, much against the will of the Princess Sophia, to leave his vast dominions to his half-brother Peter, who was then about ten years old. Sophia was appointed regent during his minority, and hoped to retain the reins of government.

"What have we to fear," said she to Galitzin, "from one who is imbecile and another who is epileptic?" The last expression was applied to Peter, who, in his childhood, was often seized with convulsions.

"The child, though timid," said the prime minister, "is quick and ardent; we must subdue him." He was not mistaken. Peter did all in his power to overcome his natural timidity, and having a great aversion to the water, took such pains to conquer it, that his dislike soon changed into a great love of that element. It was the policy of his sister Sophia, not only to allow his education to be neglected, but to surround him with idle and vicious associates. Ashamed of the ignorance in which he was brought up, Peter instructed himself in the Dutch and German languages, in which he took more interest than in any others, because Germans carried on at Moscow some of the manufactures which he wished to promote in his empire; and the Dutch excelled in navigation, which he considered the most important of all arts.

Peter listened eagerly to all accounts of the manners and customs of other nations, and made a determination, when he came into power, to place more confidence in the advice of foreigners, as regarded military affairs, than in that of his own countrymen. He constituted the General Lefort, his friend and preceptor, and confided implicitly in him. With his aid he organised a band of fifty young men, who were trained and clothed in the Danish fashion, and called the Guards of the Poteschna, of whom Lefort was made captain. The Emperor himself joined the new guard, and, wishing to gain his own promotion step by step, even began by being a drummer. This little regiment gradually increased, and some of its members were sent to learn fort-building at Venice and Leghorn; others ship-building, and the management of large vessels, in Holland.

THE GIRAFFE.

The specimens of the giraffe now living in the gardens of the Zoological Society will have rendered the appearance of this animal so familiar to most of our readers, that they will probably be surprised to learn, that at one period the very existence of such a creature was doubted, and the accounts given of its size, form, and colours were regarded as mere travellers' tales. This surprise, however, is considerably lessened when we consider the amount and quality of the information extant, respecting this animal, at a comparatively recent period. Purchas tells his readers, that the camelopard was "a beast not often seen, yet very tame, and of a strange composition, mixed of liberid, harte, buffe, and camel; and by reason of his long legs before, and shorter behind, not able to graze without difficulty." In another passage, he says it was "so huge, that a man on horseback may pass upright under him, feeding on leaves from the tops of trees, and formed like a camel." The fore legs were said to be twice as long as the hind legs, "so that one who was not acquainted with it, would think it was sitting, although it was standing." Such was the length of the neck, and the animal raised his head so high when he chose, that he could cut with facility from the top of a lofty wall; and from the top of a high tree he could reach to out the leaves, of which he devoured great quantities." These palpable exaggerations are contained in a description, otherwise tolerably accurate, of a giraffe seen by some Spanish travellers, in the year 1494; so that we need not be much astonished if some people treated the whole matter as fabulous, and assigned the giraffe to the same tomb as the unicorn, satyrs, griffins, and other monsters, in the existence of which the ancient naturalists placed such implicit faith.

It was not, in fact, until the end of the last century that Europeans obtained any precise and credible information as to the form and habits of the giraffe, an animal which must have been well known to the Romans of the empire, as we find that it was exhibited on many occasions in their amphitheatres, and one of the emperors (Gordian III.) had as many as ten giraffes living at one time.

The giraffe is undoubtedly the tallest of all living quadrupeds; the male, when fully grown, sometimes measuring seventeen feet from the top of the head to the fore feet. Nearly half this height is due to the length of the neck, which, however, contains only the same number of vertebrae (seven), as the neck of any other quadruped. Hence, although the movements of the neck are sometimes not devoid of grace, there is generally a degree of stiffness about them, and we never get the elegant curves which the neck of the swan and of many other birds present to our view. This structure, however, may well excite our admiration in another way—it exhibits in a striking manner the wonderful resources of the Creator, who can form by a simple modification of the same plan, and without the addition of any new parts, the short, thick neck of the elephant, and the long, slender, tapering column which supports the elegant head of the giraffe. And our admiration is increased when we consider how perfectly this structure fits the creature for its mode of life, and enables it to play the part assigned to it in nature. An inhabitant of the arid regions of tropical Africa, from Nubia almost to the Cape of Good Hope—where the amount of herbage would scarcely suffice for the sustenance of the smallest herbivorous animal, the stately giraffe is enabled by means of his long neck to browse peacefully upon the tender twigs and foliage of the trees scattered here and there in the desert, which derive their moisture from far below the parched and dusty surface of the ground. And in this respect, even the small number and large size of the vertebrae of the neck are found to be not without their object; for if the number of these bones were increased sufficiently to give this part of the animal greater flexibility, the labour of maintaining it in the erect position would be vastly increased, and the creature would be, to a certain extent, unfitted for the peculiar conditions in which it is placed. The giraffe is assisted in reaching down his food by the singular prehensile power of his tongue, which is capable of being protruded from the mouth to a considerable distance, and by an admirable arrangement of the muscles of which it is composed can then seize upon any object within its reach. In this way, the tongue of the giraffe serves him as an organ of prehension almost like the trunk of the elephant, although by no means capable of performing the same variety of offices as the proboscis of that unwieldy quadruped.

The head is undoubtedly the most beautiful part of the giraffe. The delicacy of its form, the gentleness of its aspect, and the softness of its full, lustrous eyes, render the head of the giraffe one of the most charming objects to be found in the animal creation. Like most other ruminant animals (the ox, deer, &c.), the giraffe possesses two horns; but these differ remarkably from those of any other quadruped with which we are acquainted. In the deer tribe we find the horns forming branched antlers, often of great size, but always falling off annually, and giving place to a new pair. In the ox and antelope, on the contrary, the horns consist of a permanent bony core, covered by a sheath of the substance commonly known as horn, and these weapons are never shed, but continue growing during the whole life of the animal. The horns of the giraffe present the characters of neither of these groups, and, to a certain extent, may be said to exhibit a combination of both. Like the latter, they consist of permanent bony processes of the skull, but, instead of a horny covering, they are clothed with the same skin that covers the rest of the body; a circumstance which also occurs with the deciduous antlers of the deer during the period of their rapid growth, although the skin dies and peels off as soon as the horns have attained their full size. The horns of the giraffe are three or four inches in length, and terminate in a singular tuft of hair, which gives them an appearance altogether different from those of any other animal. It is generally supposed that the appendages to the head, which occur in both sexes of the animal, are rather intended for ornament than use; but this does not appear to be the case, for the males have been observed to use them with great violence in their combats, and one of the females in the Zoological Gardens is said to have driven her horns through an inch board.

The most formidable weapons of the giraffe are, however, his hinder hoofs, with which he kicks out with such tremendous force that even the lion is sometimes repelled and disabled by the wounds thus ignominiously inflicted upon him. His powers of defending himself against his enemies are wonderfully increased by the position of the eyes. These are situated quite on the sides of the head, and are remarkably prominent, so that the giraffe, when browsing on the twigs of his favourite trees, can still keep a good look-out on all sides of him, and be prepared for any coming danger.

Another error which has been induced by the singular appearance of the animal, and which has been copied from one natural history into another for many years, is the statement that the fore legs of the giraffe are twice as long as his hinder extremities. The fact is, that all the legs are nearly of the same length, but the shoulders and fore part of the body are very much elevated, giving the hinder quarters a very low appearance, and rendering it very easy on a cursory glance to suppose that the fore legs are much longer than the hinder. It has also been often stated and often denied that the giraffe has great difficulty in reaching the ground with his mouth, and succeeds only by stretching out his fore legs to a considerable extent, so as to bring the fore part of his body nearer to the ground. This appears really to be the case in most instances, although scarcely to the extent that has sometimes been described; and when we consider the powerful mechanism of ligaments required to maintain the neck in its customary erect position, we shall be able easily to understand the cause of the difficulty, without lengthening the animal's legs to any inordinate extent.

The skin of the giraffe is of a light fawn colour, covered with large brownish spots, which give the animal a very elegant appearance. The skin, when taken from the animal and dressed, is so large, that the natives of the countries which it inhabits sometimes cover their huts with a single skin; and Le Vaillant, the French traveller in Africa, mentions this as the first indication of the existence of the animal that he met with. "I was struck," he says, "by a sort of distinction which I perceived on one of the huts; it was entirely covered with the skin of a giraffe. I had never seen this quadruped, the tallest of the inhabitants of the earth; I knew it only by false descriptions and figures, and could therefore scarcely recognise its robe. And yet this was the skin of the giraffe. I was in the country inhabited by this creature; I might, perhaps, see some of them alive ; I looked forward to the moment when I should be thus recompensed, at least in part, for all the sufferings and annoyances of my expedition." The thickness of the hide, however, occasions its application to another and less picturesque use. It is considered by the natives to be the best material for sandals ; and in this form, although the sight of it may never again produce down on horseback. Mr. Gordon Cumming, however, in his book on "South African Field Sports," relates several instances of his having done this ; and Mr. Methuen, in his "Life in the Wilderness," says, that any person of light weight, mounted on a pretty good horse, can easily overtake a herd of giraffes, and cut off the one he wishes to shoot. He gives the following description of the

the same feelings in the mind of any future naturalist as those so eloquently expressed by Le Vaillant in the passage just quoted, it may certainly greatly assist him in his search after the many other wonderful things still to be discovered in the vast continent of Africa.

The animals soon perceived us, and took to flight, charging through some bushes, and striding clear over others with their Brobdignagian legs, and cantering in the most ludicrous manner possible ; the hinder legs at each spring coming before the fore ones, and seeming to work outside them by at least two feet; their tails were curled, and they proceeded with a peculiar jumping motion, their long taper necks and lofty heads overtopping the tallest shrubs. I was quickly

THE OAK OF HENRY IV. AT FONTAINEBLEAU.

HENRY IV. of France, the lucky prince who escaped the massacre of St. Bartholomew, when so many thousands became the victims of the savage revenge of Catherine—because they had not upheld her against the Guises—was almost the greatest patron the castle and wood of Fontainebleau ever had. Catherine and the ferocious Charles IX. had previously made it a scene of pleasure, and had here successfully capoled some of the Huguenots, who were then making efforts, which, if successful, would have raised France to a pinnacle of extraordinary prosperity, and would effectually have prevented the subsequent revolution.

But things were ordained otherwise; and Henry IV. was himself obliged to recount his religion ere he could secure the throne of his beloved France, of which he was, undoubtedly, one of the best kings.

In the manuscript department of the king's library at Paris is a letter, by which the monarch announces to the celebrated Gabrielle d'Estrees his arrival at Fontainebleau. It is very characteristic of the king, who, in some particulars, rather resembled Henry VIII. of this country.

FROM OUR DELICIOUS DESERT OF FONTAINE-BELLE-EAU.

My dear Friend,—The courier arrived this evening. I have sent him back at once, because he informs me that you have given him instructions to return immediately with news of me. I am very well, thank God. All I desire is to see you.—HENRI.

Gabrielle d'Estrees loved the king. She was determined, in her own mind, to be queen of France. There was easy morality in those days, but there was also inordinate ambition in many minds. That the beautiful Gabrielle should aspire to be the spouse of the king, who loved her, was not at all surprising; but the task, with every good disposition on the part of the king towards her, was a difficult one.

There was a minister in France to whom the king was, with justice and reason, very much attached. He was a man who loved his country, and he was well aware that a king, who owed his throne to a successful revolution, would do much wiser to ally himself to some of the princesses of royal blood, than to any private individual.

Gabrielle knew that she had to contend with this powerful and firm opposition. But she did not despair. She played for a throne, and that was a prize worthy in her mind of every risk. She, therefore, on the receipt of the king's letter, came in all haste with other ladies to Fontainebleau.

She saw at once that Rosny de Sully was aware of her design and prepared to oppose it by every means in his power. He received her with great respect, and showed a degree of humility which was surprising.

But Gabrielle was not to be deceived. The next morning, as a party of ladies and courtiers were promenading in the beautiful park, she contrived to be alone with the king under the great oak-tree, of which we have given an engraving.

The king was as usual gallant, and spoke of her beauty and his affection in no measured terms.

"Your majesty is very good," said the beautiful favourite with much emotion; "but, sire, do you remember a certain promise made at St. Germain, which—"

"What promise?" asked the king.

"A promise, sire, which was to have been carried out there, but which a certain Rosny de Sully—"

"Do you speak of my friend and first adviser?" said the king with a slight frown.

"Your friend, sire, I know; but not mine," replied the lady. "He hates me; but I return the compliment."

"Beautiful Gabrielle!" said the king, who loved a little mischief; "I do not think Sully could hate a woman; he cares too little about them."

"Sire?" exclaimed Gabrielle d'Estrees, blushing with anger, "you mean that we women are beneath the notice of so great a man?"

"I am afraid he is sufficiently ungallant to consider the heart of a woman not a very valuable commodity."

"Sire, it matters little what Rosny de Sully thinks, if the memory of Henry IV. of France be good. I remind your majesty once more, of your promise at St. Germain."

"Tut! tut! not mine, what promise?"

"You said, sire, that you loved me, and were sufficiently of a peasant—those were your majesty's words—to think that a good wife was a thing which a king should covet above everything."

"A good wife is an excellent thing," said Henry IV. gravely.

"Then your majesty recollects your promise at St. Germain?" said the lady, whose eyes flashed fire. Ambition now overcame every other feeling.

"Faith, Gabrielle, and thou wouldst make a rare queen. Few would equal you, if any. None would surpass you in loveliness," continued the king, musing.

"When, then, will you announce it to the court?" exclaimed Gabrielle, seizing the king's hand.

"Tut! tut!" said the king laughing; "not mine is in a hurry. Rosny de Sully is not a man to be gained over in a minute."

At this moment the grave minister appeared before them only a few yards distant. The king affectionately nodded to him, and the minister bowed profoundly.

"Your majesty recollects the interview at twelve?" he said inquiringly.

"Ah! yes," exclaimed the monarch rather uneasily, "about that eternal question of my marriage."

"Your majesty," said the grave minister, who saw the king was inclined to talk, "marriage, in crowned heads, is a duty they owe to society. As long as your majesty is without due heirs and successors, there will be fear of civil war."

"Sully, you mean well, but I fear marriage is too great a tie."

"Your majesty is too great a king, to consult your personal feelings. The good of your country will be your first thought."

"Rosny," said Henry IV., with a laugh; "you usually condemn flatterers. Where have you been taking such apt lessons?"

"I never flatter, sire. But, perhaps, this question of the marriage had better be reserved for the council-chamber."

"Why not speak of it now?" exclaimed Gabrielle d'Estrees, with a fierce and angry look at Sully, her chief enemy, she well knew, as regarded the marriage question.

"Gabrielle is right, in truth. Under this oak-tree is pleasanter on such a day than in my cabinet. Seat yourself there, my trusty councillor, on that wooden seat, and let us talk of affairs of state."

"The presence of a lady," said the minister gravely, "is somewhat against the usual custom of councils."

"Sully," replied the king, "you forget Jeanne d'Albret, her whose courage saved me from early death; you forget Catherine, of evil repute."

"I forget nothing, sire," said the minister, with a look of meekness, which made Gabrielle d'Estrees wince; "and if the Lady d'Estrees takes an interest in the subject, I see no reason why your majesty may not combine pleasure and business."

"Take an interest in the subject!" exclaimed the king, laughing, and roughly bringing on the question, like a school-boy who fears the consequence, "why, as she is probably the fair dame who will grace my crown, it can scarcely be supposed the subject is not interesting to her."

Gabrielle d'Estrees looked triumphantly at the minister.

"Sire," said the minister slyly, "that is impossible."

"Ventre St. Gris," said the ex-king of Navarre, "How impossible! Why impossible?"

"Rosny de Sully," whispered Gabrielle, "beware!"

"Sire," said the minister solemnly, "it is impossible. In the first place, it is quite out of the question, that under present circumstances your majesty should marry a subject. Spain is awake and alive. The son of the Marquis de Verueil aims at supplanting you on the throne. Every mistake must be avoided by your majesty. Besides, the negotiations for the hand of Marie de' Medici, though not officially commenced, are in train—"

"How in train?" asked the king frowning.

Gabrielle smiled. It was clear the king was on her side.

"Your majesty will please to recollect that you doubted my ability to bring about this marriage, and said you feared less to ask, than to risk a refusal."

"Yes, yes, I recollect," exclaimed the king rather uneasily.

"Your majesty, I have this morning received a private intimation, that an official demand will be met with a warm consent."

"Sire, do you allow this?" said Gabrielle, who began to be alarmed, the influence of the minister over the king being undoubted, and the quiet way in which he had acted proving his determination, and at the same time his great confidence.

"But, Rosny de Sully," exclaimed Henry the Fourth, "I have given my word."

"Sire, your majesty will pardon me. You never gave your word unconditionally. The Lady Gabrielle d'Estrees must see that the interest of the state is above all private considerations. Your majesty then, I hope, will make the formal demand for the hand of Marie de' Medici this day."

"But! but! man, there is no such hurry," said the king, who now deeply regretted the presence of the fair charmer, to whose hopes he had given so much encouragement.

"Sire," exclaimed Gabrielle, "your royal word is given. I have as good as your bond. The promise made at St. Germain your majesty ratified but ten minutes since."

"Nay, ma mie!" said the king; "I only said you would look a queer individual."

"Of that," interposed Sully, "no man will doubt. Did beauty and grace and elegance decide royal marriages, there can be no doubt that the Lady Gabrielle d'Estrees would carry all before her."

"And pray, most learned expounder of the royal matrimonial theory, why may not a king direct his choice where beauty, grace, and elegance lead him?" asked the monarch.

"Because, sire, a king has more duties than rights, more a policy to think of than privileges to enjoy," replied the minister.

"Sophistry!" cried Gabrielle d'Estrees, now losing her temper, and allowing her fine eyes to be suffused with tears; "this is all mere idle talk, to move his majesty to break his royal word. 'Tis treachery, rank treachery!"

"Madam, were there no treachery to his majesty in France, save in the heart of Rosny de Sully, Henry IV. might marry safely where he loved. But there is danger, and treachery, and doubt, and tribulation; and a great king must yield to state policy."

The king mused deeply, Gabrielle d'Estrees began a scene of mingled tears, supplications, threats, reproaches, and fitting, to which Sully offered only the calm reasons which, in truth, did guide the mind of one of the best and greatest politicians France has ever produced. The contest was long and alarming. The lady was alternately a terrible Juno, and a melting, yielding Danae. The king wavered, but at last, as was natural with one of his character, the woman appeared clearly about to gain the day. He could not resist the "tears as big as little p's" that fell from her beautiful eyes, and the minister began to fear that the day was lost. He determined to make, therefore, one last and bold stroke.

He rose.

"Your majesty," said he, bowing respectfully, "appears to have decided. You have determined to do that which I believe to be ruinous to the prospects of the country, fatal to the peace of France, I have but one duty—a solemn and unpleasant duty—and that is, to request your majesty to appoint my successor."

"You desert me, Sully," exclaimed the king in a reproachful tone.

"Sire, I cannot, loving my country, and desiring an honest fame, incur the odium of having connived at an unpopular and unwise act. I must resign, to save my honour and my reputation."

"Your majesty will find many as faithful and attached ministers," exclaimed Gabrielle d'Estrees, beginning to recover her hopes.

"And so, Rosny," said the king affectionately, "you have made up your mind, in this case, to leave me."

"I say it, your majesty, with deep regret; but it is my duty."

"Then, Rosny, it must be that you are right. You would never leave me, were you not persuaded of the justice of your cause. This afternoon send the demand for the hand of Marie de' Medici to Go, my friend."

The minister bowed, without a word, and retired.

"Your majesty," exclaimed the alarmed Lady Gabrielle, "I had not yet learned to understand the King. I know, Sire, your majesty prefers that Rosny to your beloved Gabrielle."

"That Rosny, Gabrielle," said the king gravely, "is the guardian of my crown."

Gabrielle till every art to persuade the king to give up the minister, and take one more compliant. Though it was the king, he made his historical reply to the fair dame.

"Pardi, madame! this is too much. You have been injured to this by some enemies of mine. In order, then, that you may be quite at ease on the subject, let me tell you, that I would rather lose one hundred women as beautiful as you, than one of the Sully."

Gabrielle d'Estrees was s-lens l. After dinner she renewed the conflict in Sully's pavilion, but in vain.

The hand of Marie de' Medici was formally asked by the King, and Gabrielle d'Estrees returned to Paris, after begging the monarch's pardon on her head of knees.

She retired to her apartments in the Hotel Zamor, where a few days later she died, after eating a meal which had been all poisoned. It was never known, nor even suspected, by whom this poison was administered, as the object could not very well be discovered. It has even been suggested that she ate only some rancid ones, which were of a poisonous tribe, and ate them accidentally killed.

King Henry IV. was a little hurt in heart at the disappointment of which the great oak had been the theatre, and visited it for several days with considerable gravity.

But soon all Fortunaebleser was in activity. The marriage ceremony was settled, and Henry IV. became the English in a few days of Marie de' Medici, who, on the 21st of September, 1600, presided him with a drugging. The king was obliged to pierce his own sword in the infant's hand, and addressed the queen thus:

"Ma mie!" he exclaimed; "rejoice! Heaven has granted your wish. We have a handsome son."

And he ran in such a hurry to hear a T. D. de in the church of the Holy Trinity, that he lost his hat in the crowd. He was a ardent a Romanist as he had, at one time, been a firm Huguenot.

Many of the plans and designs of Henry IV. were conceived and debated under that spreading oak, which is only one of the many magnificent trees that adorn that delightful forest.

One day, in the sixteenth century, St. Louis was hunting in the forest of Bievre, in the Gatinais. He lost a dog he was very fond of, and which answered to the name of Blean. The King was very much vexed at his loss, and all the court exerted themselves to recover it. Saints as well as other beings have their idiosyncrasies. The flatterers of St. Louis hurried so swiftly about the forest, that they found the dog drinking at a spring. The spring was next to a fountain, which was called Fontainebleau.

Such is the legend which Francis I. and the Princes of France selected by a painting. But Madillon tells us that it was an old domain named Bievre, while Poland and the Germans, still showing any respect for old stories, tell us that the dog came from Fontaine-belle-eau, corrupted into Fontainebleau. Here the French kings built a residence.

Old Guillaume Maisis, an ancient chaplain of France, says:

"The Gatinais, diversified by woods, rivers, and plain, and its mountains, is very healthy and agreeable, which is also its great beauty, not a ponded, and of our seeing that those who hold that it is good, live to a good old age, and die full of years, and in a healthy old age, so common anywhere else in France. And indeed our kings constantly a pleasure-palace in this locality. The monarchs of France and royal houses in Europe's Pan de Mon. Our Kings of France made it a residence with a view to pleasure, and the Kings of France were chiefly born and brought up there, and place of the country."

Monteige and Meun had previously endeavored to diminish the misery of France. They were successfull in their efforts. St. Louis wrote to them, "I feel what is said to me, I feel under the great oak. The king had said, and was, and was, his safety, when he fell ill of the measles, and died."

"You are the king," said the old man.

"I have many titles, I you," said the king, "but I am not the king."

At the close of the day, the king, and the queen, and the

ARTS AND CRAFTS

There are many fine specimens of the art of the ancients near the walls of the city of Rome, and in the neighbourhood of the Bay of Salerno. The most interesting remains of antiquity are the ruins of the city of Paestum, as well as the ruins of the city of Stabia, and the ruins of the city of Herculaneum. According to the reports of the antiquaries, the ruins of the city of Paestum were discovered in the year 1763, and the ruins of the city of Stabia in the year 1749. POLITICAL ASPECT OF CHINA.

BY WILLIAM KNIGHTON, M.A.

THE system of government, prevalent for ages in China, is based upon that of a family. The Chinese constitute the vast family of which the emperor is the father; and, as absolute filial obedience is required by their faith, as the father has absolute power over his children, even so has the emperor absolute authority in the state, the most implicit obedience being required from his officers and subjects. Such a system is often mis-called the patriarchal, but it is quite a misnomer—the foundation of both may be alike, but the practice is quite different. The emperor is styled “the sacred son of heaven,” “the sole ruler of the earth,” “the great father;” offerings are made to his image and to his throne; his person is adored; his people prostrate themselves in his presence. When he goes abroad, all the people take care to shut themselves up in their houses; whoever is found in the monarch’s way is liable to instant execution unless he turns his back, or lies flat with his face upon the ground. The children have evidently no reason to rejoice, under such circumstances, in the visits of their father; his journeys must be rather alarming to travellers. Everything about him partakes of the idolatrous homage paid to himself, whilst the mandarins, who are his delegates in distant provinces, have authority as absolute as his own.

No despotism was ever more unalloyed; no power more absolutely without control than that of this “son of heaven;” and yet it was all based upon a mistaken view of the domestic relationship. The language, spoken and written, of China, is an admirably-contrived supporter of this state of things; each sign representing an idea, often without any corresponding word, so that a piece of writing, although intelligible to the learned reader, cannot be read aloud to others; and hence the information acquired by the privileged classes has no means of becoming diffused amongst the bulk of the people. Reflection and memory are the only powers called into exercise by this dumb language—the imagination can never be appealed to by it. Even in a Chinese poem, which cannot, of course, be read aloud, the beauty consists in the adaptation of symbol to symbol; it excites no feeling in the breast, it affords no culture to the imagination. “Not a hundredth part of the Chinese characters,” says Remusat, “has any vocal expression, and it is no uncommon thing for the literati of that country to conduct their disputes by describing in the air, with their fans, characters which do not correspond to any word in the language which they speak.” (Essai sur la Langue Chinoise, p. 33). Eminently absurd, we are inclined to call such symbolic argument, and to us it does certainly appear so; but it is eminently note-worthy, by reason of the deductions that may be drawn from the fact, that, if appeals are thus made to the reason and to the memory only, all the fervour of eloquence must be quite thrown away and all the aid of the imagination lost in religious or political addresses.

In the earliest ages of authentic Chinese history, that is, about five hundred years before the Christian era, the country was divided into nine sovereignties, all subsequently united under an enterprising prince named Lo, the Chinese Esbert. For centuries the country, thus united, enjoyed peace and prosperity under its native lords. The intestine tumults were few and far between, and the military art became almost unknown, for there was no foreign aggression to repel. Ghenghis Khan, the great Asiatic conqueror, swept over the country like a whirlwind, carrying everything before him in the thirteenth century; but the Ming or native dynasty was restored subsequently. About a century and a half ago, however, the Ming dynasty was again displaced by the Manchoo invaders from the north-east, whose monarchs have ever since sat upon the Chinese throne. The paternal rod by which China had previously been governed, was heavy and severe enough; but, since then, the whip of the Tartar has been added to the domestic tyranny, until subserviency has superseded obedience. “The despotism of the Manchoo sovereign,” says Balbi, “keeps that of the grandees in order, and obliges them to remain united. There is no resistance on the part of the people; they have much cunning but little courage, and find it safer to preserve a part of their property by grovelling at the feet of their masters, than to risk the loss of the whole in order to obtain their liberty.” Had Balbi lived in these days, he might have learnt that, however bound down by a foreign yoke, however tyrannised over by foreign rulers, the Chinese had not yet lost their nationality entirely, and were certainly disposed to make a violent effort, and able to make it, to regain their liberty and to shake off the Manchoo rule. Whether they be successful or not remains to be seen—probably they will not be so; yet it must always be remembered, to their honour, that the attempt was made, and that they exhibited in it courage, constancy, and perseverance, not unalloyed, it is true, with cruelty and intolerance. But these are always the vices of the fallen; long-continued slavery produces them naturally in the mind; long-continued, pent-up indignation feels itself upon blood when it gets the opportunity.

The various civil and military appointments are filled by nine classes of officers, called originally mandarins, by the Portuguese, from the Latin verb mandare, to command. The power of these officers is, as I have said, absolute, when they are sent by the emperor as his viceroys into the various provinces of the empire. An officer of this description entering a city, can order any person he suspects to be arrested and executed, without giving any further reason for the summary procedure than that noted in his despatch to the High Court of Peking, in which he announces the fact. He is unquestionably a formidable officer. A hundred victors go before him, announcing his mission with discordant yells. Should any one be found in the way, notwithstanding this announcement, he is mauled with bamboo rods or castigated with heavy whips. It is some consolation to know that the officer himself, who thus has the power of tyrannising at his will, is liable to the same summary punishment he inflicts on others. If tales to his discredit are whispered by influential men in Peking, and come at length to the emperor’s ears, an imperial mandate may, at any moment, arrive, which orders the inferior officers to seize the viceroy, of whom they have been standing so heartily in dread, and to chastise him soundly. It is likely, under such circumstances, that they would lay it on with hearty good-will.

The redeeming point of all this Chinese government must be mentioned, however. It is this, that these mandarins are not hereditary nobles, born to rule, and brought up in supercilious contempt of all around them, but men who have passed examinations in the classical literature of their country—men versed in such religion, in such mathematics, in such science, in such philosophy, as Chinese wisdom has attained to. Learning is the ladder of nobility, and he has a chance of climbing highest—other things being equal—who has learnt most. From their peculiar system of symbols, this learning, however, is not so powerfully operative for good as it might otherwise be. It is cold and heartless, cultivating the head much, but leaving the warm impulses of the heart unregulated, unpolished, and unenriched from the stores of the imagination. The human mind has many faculties, all of which require simultaneous development to constitute a superior being, ultimately. No one of these faculties can be neglected without evil being induced.

The insurrection which has been threatening for the last year or two to overturn the Manchoo dynasty, and once more place the native line of princes on the throne, excited little attention in England until the intelligence was brought by one of the Indian mails, last autumn, that Nankin had been taken by the rebels. Indistinct rumours of troubles in the southern provinces of the empire had been heard and canvassed in Canton months before. At first, the disturbers were robbers, and numerous imperial decrees declared that the leaders of these robbers had been seized, and quartered at Peking, their dismembered limbs being affixed on the gates, and elsewhere, as a warning to evil-doers. But still, all the imperial decrees notwithstanding, the troubles continued, and it was further rumoured, that the descendant of the old Ming family was the head of the insurgents. At length Nankin was taken, and the robbers became, forthwith, rebels. Nankin, the centre of the arts, fashions, and literature of China—Nankin, the old capital of the country, was taken. Europeans began then to doubt whether even imperial proclamations were always to be credited—it was evident, indeed, that they were not. The insurgents advanced; they seized the southern basin of the Great Canal; they commanded the mouths of the Yang-tse-kiang. One imperial army after another was defeated; they threatened Peking itself. They became forthwith patriots. Who shall say, after this, that there is nothing in a name? Nothing in a name! robbers and patriots convertible terms! Verily there is much in a name. Success will afford a healing plaster for many wounded consciences; success will blind the eyes of most lookers-on. A man makes a great leap to attain a distant blessing—he fails, and people laugh at his temerity; he succeeds, and they applaud his heroism. Had the Chinese insurrection perished in its first efforts in the South, we should have heard of it only as the troubles caused by a few paltry robbers.

Hien-fong, which, being interpreted, means Complete Abundance, is the present emperor of China, the Manchoo sovereign who reigns in Peking. He is but twenty-two years of age, "a young man," says M. Callery, "of middle height, his form indicating great aptitude for bodily exercises. He is slender and muscular, has a high forehead, and a detective obliquity of the eyes?" which latter means, in plain English, that his majesty squints. "His cheek-bones are very prominent, and strongly marked. The space between his eyes is broad and flat, like the forehead of a buffalo." By no means a flattering simile, M. Callery's, for, although Juno was called the ox-eyed, that is no reason why Complete Abundance should be likened to a buffalo. There is little to be added to this sketch of Complete Abundance, save this, that he appears to be always in want of money.

Tien-te, the head of the insurrection, and the representative of the Ming dynasty, is also a young man, only a year or so older than Complete Abundance. "Study and want of rest," says M. Callery, "have made him prematurely old. He is grave and melancholy, leads a very retired life, and only communicates with those about him when he gives his orders." Tien-te means Celestial Virtue; and the cunning Chinese, anxious to obtain the favour of the western barbarians, assured them that this Celestial Virtue was really a Christian at heart, and intended establishing Christianity when he became emperor. The fact of his having thirty wives, however, when it became known, made the Europeans look with suspicion on Celestial Virtue's Christianity, as well they might. So they have left Complete Abundance and him to fight it out, their sympathies, perhaps, being with the insurgents, their diplomatic communication still, however, with the Manchoo and his officers. Certain it is, that the insurgents have shown no favour whatever to Buddhism, which is the religion of the Manchoo court, since they have invariably destroyed its temples and images as they have advanced. Whether they intend to restore the system of Confucius, or to amalgamate it with some of the truths of Christianity, does not yet sufficiently appear. They seem to have correct ideas on the subject of the Deity and of his nature, ideas probably obtained from Christian sources. It is almost certain, however, that if they do succeed, the insurgents will settle down into the old political forms; all their sympathies and tendencies seem to point in that direction. Recent accounts leave it doubtful whether they will succeed at all. They have got to within a hundred miles of Peking, having traversed a district of country as extensive as the whole of European Russia. They have been almost uniformly successful hitherto; but the fierce Tartar tribes may possibly be too much for them, if the latest intelligence on the subject is to be credited.

A VISIT TO THE EAST.

Is a recent entertaining work, entitled "Scenes in Eastern Life," opens the following amusing episode, which we give without vouching for the strict accuracy of every particular:—

Stanislas Duhamel was a blasé Parisian. He had exhausted all the enjoyments of life, and wasted all his energies in the feverish pursuit of pleasure. As a student, a man of fashion, a politician, a mercantile man, and a lieutenant in the National Guards, he had been foremost in all sorts of exciting scenes, till at last, having run the whole round of worldly activity, he sat down like Alexander the Great, and mourned that he had not another career open to him. In his vexation and embarrassment for want of yet one more part to play, one additional scene in the drama of life, he suddenly bethought him of an expedient which promised to answer his purpose admirably. He would go to Constantinople, assume the turban, and become a thorough Mahomedan. He would get a palace with beautiful fountains, a palanquin, with a procession of slaves, etc. etc. As he dwelt upon the bright visions of enjoyment opening up before his mind's eye, his heart throbbled with delight, his jaded emotions once more resumed their intensity, and the exclamation—La Alla ila Alla! burst forth from his lips.

Without delay he was off to Marseilles, and in the course of a week or two landed safely at Constantinople, where he hired a splendid palace, of which the reader may form some conception from our engraving (p. 12). It was surrounded by a court, a garden, fine colonnades, and shady avenues, and had a marble pavement, fountains, arabesques, and whatever else could contribute to elegance or use. The Parisian was delighted with his new abode, which appeared quite a Mahomedan paradise. But before an hour had passed in self-congratulations, he began to feel painfully conscious of some serious defects. In the first place, he did not like the solitude in which he found himself. Then the windows, though artistically formed, were none of them glazed, so that the heat by day and damp by night had free admission, bringing ophthalmia and rheumatism in their train. "We must remedy this," said he to his dragoman, "by getting some splendid furniture and a company of dancing-girls." Accordingly, the dragoman went to the nearest bazaar, and the furniture was supplied the same evening. It consisted of sofas made of palm-wood, stuffed with cotton and covered with Persian silk, divans and beds, a small round table, curtains, mats, caps, pipes and margaublis. Highly delighted with the way in which he had fulfilled his commission, the dragoman exclaimed: "Here you have furniture fit for the reception of a pasha himself."

Our hero had also a numerous suite of personal attendants, including a secretary, a treasurer, two cooks, three pipe-bearers, four coffee-servers, five interpreters, and six ass-drivers, not to mention an armour-bearer, a groom to hold his horse, and several extra hands to assist the others. "At any rate," said he himself, "I shall be well waited on." Next day, however, his cooks brought him bean chickens hatched in the oven, dog's flesh dressed up as mutton, and dried loaves from Egypt, the whole seasoned to a fiery heat with pepper and mustard. He soon began to find out what it is to be the slave of slaves. Each of his servants being professedly about his appropriate work, and most of them taking their siesta in the middle of the day, he could never get their attention when he wanted. If he had occasion for the ass-driver, he stumbled upon the secretary, and vice versa. The extra hands were indignant when he asked them to shut the door, or do anything else so far beneath their dignity. His horse was never saddled except for his groom to have a ride. The pipe-bearers and coffee-servers brought him a hundred pipes and as many cups of coffee a-day, that they might regale themselves at his expense. All the neighbours and passers-by came in to squat upon his divans, smoke his tobacco, and taste his mocha coffee. To crown all, the cabale cordiales, which subsisted between the tradespeople and his servants, was productive of ruinous results.

Unable to endure this any longer, Stanislas determined to put an end to it by turning Turk in real earnest. Off he ran to a barber, who, in little more than a twinkling, completely shaved his head, with the exception of one small tuft of hair on the top of his cranium.

"But why leave this tuft?" he asked.

"For the day when you have your head cut off," replied the barber. "Every good Mussulman ought to be prepared for that operation, particularly those who were originally Christians, as they rarely escape this fate. Without this tuft for the executioner to lay hold of when he shows your head to the crowd, he would have to take you by the nose—an indignity past all bearing." The poor Frenchman shrugged and shrugged his shoulders, but had not the heart to attempt any reply, and therefore made the best of his way home. As soon as he arrived, he ordered the aduchs or dancing-girls to be sent for to soothe his perturbed spirit. Several were introduced, most brilliantly attired, and promising to delight him with a fine display of their art. They danced awkwardly and sang badly, but he tried to persuade himself they were adorable, after a comely show of reluctance, to accept his hand. The wedding day arrived, on which he was at length to realise the happiness of which he had so long vainly dreamt. His bride had always kept her face most sacredly veiled until the ceremony was completed. When there was no longer any reason for further reserve, she suffered him to lift her veil, and he had the felicity of discovering that she was an old Parisian dressmaker! On making application

When, however, after continuing their evolutions for some time, they came and bowed themselves before him and he approached them to give each a handsome gratuity, according to eastern custom, what was his horror and dismay to find that these pretended danceuses were men in women's dress!

To replenish his purse and solace his heart, he resolved, as a last resource, to take to himself a rich wife. He was not long in meeting with a lady said to be possessed of an ample fortune, and willing, for the dowry, he was informed that in the East it was the husband who furnished that. This was more than he could bear. His constitution gave way under such repeated blows. He was attacked with brain-fever, from which, however, he at last recovered, in spite of the remedies prescribed by the physicians; and then, after encountering many serious obstacles in succession, he managed to make his escape to Paris, where he was now recruited to a mode of life which had before been a source of constant dissatisfaction.

HARVEST IN ITALY.

A POET of the sixteenth century has left us a pretty song, supposed to be sung by a girl to her companions as she is winnowing corn. It is such a character that the artist has portrayed in the lovely picture from which our engraving is taken. As we gaze upon her beautiful features and graceful form, it is easy to fancy her fanning the flame of her admirer's affection by singing, in merry mood, snatches of some popular ballad to a well-known air. But, if we may believe the accounts given of an Italian harvest by well-informed and trustworthy travellers, there is nothing in that country corresponding to this pleasing illusion. It is true, the poor in troops of several hundreds, each under the command of a sort of corporal, armed with a staff, they present almost the appearance of an army. If a poor girl, exhausted by fatigue, panting, and fainting with thirst, rests for a moment, she is immediately goaded on to work by some harsh word, some threatening movement of the corporal's staff, or even a blow from his brutal hand. A melancholy silence pervades this laborious multitude. Nothing is heard but the sound of the sickle as it cuts, and the corn as it falls. The sickles and billhooks glitter in the sun like weapons of war, and, to complete the comparison, death reigns among the reapers as on the girls who, with their brothers and their betrothed lovers, go down from the Abruzzi, and the mountains of Lucca, and the Sabine district, to get in the harvest about Rome, are not unfrequently as beautiful as the one depicted in our engraving; but they are rarely cheerful enough to give vent to their feelings in songs. It is not on their father's fields that they reap the corn, bind the sheaves, and winnow the grain. For a miserable pittance of hire they go, much against their inclination, to expose themselves to the malignant influence of the atmosphere, and work laboriously for several months under very strict discipline. As they move along the vast plain field of battle. "Exposed," says a traveller, "to severe toil, passing speedily without transition from the temperate climate and pure air of their mountains to a burning plain which sends forth pestilential miasma, these unhappy creatures are often the victims of dreadful fevers. The season of harvest is most dangerous. The mortality is then sometimes frightful, and it is not uncommon to see ten or a dozen victims carried every evening from the fields to the hospital, their sufferings being aggravated by the coldness of the night and the hardness of the vehicle in which they are conveyed."

THE WALLACHIAN ROBBER.

The valley through which the river Temeş rolls its rapid waters serves as a road through the mountains from Lugos to Mihalacia and Old-Orsova. Not far from the commencement of this valley lies the town of Karansebes. Farther up are the scattered farm-houses which form the village of Slatina, and the traveller who goes against the strong current of the river sees on the left bank a small church which, situated on a rocky eminence, is visible a long way off. This little church is not particularly ancient. Its present form dates from the year 1771, and its origin does not go back more than about three centuries. But with this origin is connected a tradition which is dear to the hearts of the people, and, though scarcely a hundred and twenty years old, combines the poetical interest of an ancient tradition with the reality of an historical event. As all eyes are now turned towards this part of Europe, our readers will, we doubt not, be pleased to be made acquainted with the story, which is in substance as follows:

It was in the year 1788. Prince Eugene, the noble knight, lay wrapped in that dark, cold slumber, from which none awake till the judgment-day. The death of the old hero had inspired the sons of the people with courage. They now considered they had no longer any reason to fear the arms of Christendom. The expedition of 1777, which was at first successful, had been brought to an injurious conclusion through the incapacity of Sokoloff Pasha. But of what avail was it that Sokoloff was now in prison, and that the timid Daut Pasha had been beheaded? The Turks had, nevertheless, passed forward into a Mihalacia, and the apostle Bonnaval was celebrating a new triumph.

In the neighbourhood of Karansebes lay an imperial army, in which were the two dukes of Lorraine, Francis and Charles, the sons of the liberator of Vienna. The elder of these two princes, afterwards known as the German emperor Francis the First, had been married in the year 1766 to the Archduchess Maria Theresa, daughter of Charles the Sixth.

The Turks were at Mihalacia. This place, which is known to many on account of the medicinal springs in its neighbourhood, lies about six hours' journey above Orsova, in a narrow defile which extends sideways from the valley of the Danube. The position of the Turks was covered in the rear by the fortified town of New-Orsova. Their outposts had pushed forward up to the river, and their surrounding parties went on the road to the upper part of the pass, which is called the Key to Terogova and Slatina. There skirmishes frequently took place with the imperial marauders, but only at a distance. Sabre and scimitar remained in the scabbard, and the shot came in the most part from such a distance that they appear destined for no other purpose than to awaken the echoes of the woods, and thus give intimation of the prevalence of war in the land, a fact which otherwise there might have been some danger of forgetting.

On the flanks of both armies crowds of desperadoes collected from the surrounding mountains and woods, but they were at this time more anxious for their own security than eager in the pursuit of their usual vocation. The intimation of intercourse injured their killing, but they hoped for a full compensation for all their privations and dangers as soon as the armies had withdrawn. They had at this time powerful opponents in the Turkish soldiers, whose envy they awakened; while on the other hand, the imperialists treated them with all the severity of military vengeance. Whenever they caught an unlucky votary of St. Nicholas, they hung him upon the nearest tree, for the wild beasts of the wood to rest upon his flesh, and the birds to prey upon his head, shoulders, and breast.

The evening sun was shining upon such a poor wanderer, who a few hours before had been thus summarily despatched. He was hanging upon the bare, bare oak on the edge of the wood near the village Slatina, clothed in a short shirt and loose linen trousers full of folds, which presented the appearance of a woman's dress. His weapons, his hat, and his inner garment had doubtless been carried off by those who had rendered the wretches superfluous to him. In order to protect the body a man-of-war.

About a hundred paces off, a woman, in that long gazing at the unfortunate creature, peering out from some thick bushes in which she was anxiously endeavouring to conceal herself. Her desire to avoid observation arose principally from a dread of the wandering dragons, who appeared here and there almost always in pairs, sometimes on horseback with their musket across the saddle, and sometimes on foot with their weapon over the shoulder, and the bridle slung round their arm. The woman, though not very young — being rather more than thirty — was handsome and stately in appearance, with a good figure and large powerful frame indicative of robust health. A pair of bright grey eyes sparkled in her round chubby face. Her short neck, broad shoulders, and well-developed chest, were covered with clean white linen. From her slender waist a pretty sort of gown descended to her ankles, and her feet were encased in a pair of high boots, such as are elsewhere worn by men. A broad-brimmed man's hat overshadowed her brown face. Over her shoulders was thrown a gaudy-coloured coarse woollen cloth, which the Wallachians make use of as a cloak or bed-coverslet. In the skirt, which served as a girdle round her waist, were stuck a sabre and two horse-pistols. The Amazon carried in her hand a Janakury's gun, with long barrel and short stock, but provided with a French percussion lock.

From her hiding-place the armed woman kept anxiously looking round at the river, the wood, the mountain, and the dragons in possession; but ever and anon her attention was drawn with still deeper attention upon the corpse that was dangling in the air. And when at last she began to move off, she muttered to herself, as she clenched her fist and held it up towards the troop in the valley:

"Mariuschka will yet find means to avenge poor Dobru, her faithful messenger. Hadst thou no pity for his youth, thou execrable hangman? Scarcely twenty times had his bright eyes beheld the return of spring. His lip was covered with the first light down which betokened a manly heart. What could I say to his mother, when she asks me what I have done with her youngest and dearest son? I must reply that the Imperialists have murdered him out of mere wanton caprice and violence. He had done nothing to deserve such a fate. He had simply gone out in a friendly country to fetch me some powder and shot, which we cannot dispense with here. He carried armour and weapons, as became a brave man. A consciousness of his innocence alone could have thrown the wary and a wily youth sufficiently on his guard to be thus overruled. He must have thoughtlessly gone and asked the hindings for a pipe of tobacco. This is what I must tell his aged mother; yet before I have well finished the sad tale, I will add, O be comforted, afflicted mother: your Dobru is avenged."

Mariuschka cast yet one more indescribably fierce glance at the hated foe, then shouldered her long gun, and bounded off nimbly and safely as a chamois through the gathering darkness of the night. It was pitch dark before she reached the chert in the rock on the other side of the first hill, on descending which she heard a loud long whistle. A double whistle gave the expected answer. Mariuschka hastened on her way, and soon reached the spot where she was expected. She found there a square-built man, who was enjoying a comfortable dinner on a massive wooden stool upon which he stretched himself out like a great bear.

"You have kept me waiting a long time," said he, yawning. "I had almost fallen in a heap. But where is the young fellow?"

"He is not come yet," replied Mariuschka, in a reluctant tone. "Ask me no more questions, Dschuro-chen, you will learn all at the proper time."

The old man refrained from urging her any further, for he saw plainly enough by her manner of speaking that she had met with some mishap, and he had no wish to excite her temper, which was already not a little ruffled. He could not, however, help saying, after a while: "I suppose you will soon expect me to light the fire, and get you a comfortable bed ready. You must be tired and hungry after the toils of the day, I should think."

"Don't you know yet, that I am never tired?" was Mariuschka's reply. "We must only stay here long enough for me to eat a morsel of food and swallow a draught of something to slake my thirst. It is no use waiting any longer for Dobru. We must go up towards Mlakaberg as quickly as we can."

"You command, mistress, and I obey," muttered Dschuro-chen, in a scarcely intelligible tone. Mariuschka laughed heartily, and said: "You don't like to go to Mlakaberg then, you have not yet made up matters with the beautiful Wartschka. She has set your old heart all in a flame, and instead of soothing your pain, she takes delight in irritating it to the utmost of her ability."

"You are quite right in what you say, only you forget one thing. The lass will not give me her consent, it is true, although her parents are willing, yet she will not let me go free. As often as she sees me at a distance, she smiles at me, and when she comes up, she asks me how I do in a most winning, affectionate way, and keeps on flattering me, till at last all my displeasure changes into a perfect sunshine of delight. Yet, no sooner am I warmed with pleasurable emotion, than she suddenly becomes cold, and her smile of affection is exchanged for a bitter laugh of scorn. Hence, I am glad to get out of her way as quickly as I can."

"It is for that very reason," interrupted Maruszhka, "that I take you to her."

"I don't understand you. What pleasure can it afford you to cause me pain?"

"I will put an end to your pain then. The old one must overcome the resistance of the young lass."

The rough fellow jumped up from his seat more astonished than delighted, great as his joy was. Unable to refrain from expressing his wonder in words, he said: "You don't like to see your folks married. It is a common saying with you, that whenever a fool is to be born, a young girl is married to an old man. Now I am not young, nor am I the greatest favourite with you. Whence, then, this sudden change of feeling towards me? Do you wish to get rid of me?"

"Your head is turned with delight," said Maruszhka, smiling. "Just think, a little soberly if you can, for a moment, and you will need no answer from me. Don't you know why I dislike to see my people get married? Simply, because the first year after a robber has taken a wife, he loses all interest in his occupation. His thoughts are at home as often as he goes out, and if he is wanted for a long expedition, he is no use at all. But with you the case is very different. You are no longer young enough to be killing and ending with your mate from morning to night."

"But what is wanting in youthfulness," interrupted Dschurdschu, "may, perhaps, be made up in labour."

"Wantszka is a good lass," continued Maruszhka, "as any in the neighbourhood. Besides, she is the only child, and will inherit the farm. Young, beautiful, prudent, and rich, is the bride you have in view. Already your heart longs for her, and yet you are afraid to take her. One scarcely knows what to think. Do you tremble at your unexpected good fortune?"

Dschurdschu reflected a while before he ventured to reply. "When the fox sees a hen lying with its legs tied, he is in no hurry to touch it. Easy prey is often only a bait. If I am to follow your advice, you must tell me plainly why you wish me to marry at once. You have some particular reason, and I must know it before I advance a single step."

"If you don't like Wantszka," said Maruszhka, "you may remain single for what I care."

"I have only one more question to ask you," rejoined Dschurdschu. "Against whom is the blow directed?"

"You shall know that too, you old chatterbox," was the reply.

"The blow is aimed at the man whom I call mine. I don't agree with him, I don't like him; he may be set up by his heart upon whom he likes, but not in my domains. Let him keep within his own limits, as I do in mine. I am jealous; it is true, but not of Petra so much as of my territory. Makabera lies in my domains, the sources of the Temu are mine, Ozaria and Motra are unquestionably my brooks. It was so settled when I withdrew with my companions from contention with him. He may hunt where he likes, only not on my grounds."

Dschurdschu asked no further question. He had heard enough to understand that Maruszhka was more jealous of her husband than she chose to admit in words. The impious woman had separate from the haremshah, or rouschid, because he neither could nor could submit to her own conduct.

As the two wanderers descended quickly and silently into the valley which serves as a channel for the waters that spring from the south-west side of the hill, they came to a sudden stand. A glimmer of light shone upon them from the depth of the valley. The yellow spot of light seemed no larger than a lamp behind the window of a hut. But the travellers well knew that there was no human dwelling there; consequently the light must come from a fire in the open air.

"Who can it be," asked Dschurdschu, "that is encamped there? Surely it is not Petra's company."

"A company of gipsies, perhaps," replied Maruszhka; "we shall soon see."

"Shall we go down to them?"

"As if we had any choice in the matter. We have no other means of crossing the water. Let us approach cautiously."

Maruszhka felt in her girdle, to be quite sure her pistols were there ready for use. She took her gun, loaded it, and primed it. Her companion also prepared his weapons for immediate use. Thus armed for whatever emergency might occur, they cautiously went towards the fire.

This emotion was, for once, needless. By the fire lay a single man, who was neither a gipsy nor one of Petra's company, but an able-bodied Turk, apparently about five-and-thirty years of age, in a small waistcoat and large trousers, with his hair cut close and his beard long. He was sitting cross-legged, after the Turkish fashion, on the ground near the fire, smoking his chibouk as comfortably as if he were seated in a tavern at the Golden Horn, where, even at the present day, the sons of the prophet are in the habit of drinking the dark water of wisdom. Yet he was not so completely confident of peace as he would have felt in the coffee-house of a rich Greek or a contemptible Armenian. He had his weapons pretty near him, not excepting even his gun, which was leaning against a stone pillar. Near the gun lay a silver stretched-out, a tender piece of which, rolled up in fat and put upon a spit to the fire, diffused a savoury smell around. The part which the brave Turk was cooking for his solitary meal was the liver. Among his companions he would not have ventured to eat this forbidden part. With his right hand he turned the spit, while he held his chibouk with the left. He seemed to be dreaming over the job, if not asleep; but he was still all on the alert. He heard the footsteps of the two who were approaching. In an instant he exchanged the spit and chibouk for his gun, and, mindful as a wised, he darted into a bush close by, from which he could look out in concealment. But before he had time to see who it was that startled him, a clear voice said, "Fear nothing, Fortunatus; I am alone with old Dschurdschu." The voice sounded familiar to him, and the speaker went close to the fire, that the light falling upon her might remove all suspicion from his mind. "Come forth," said Dschurdschu; "if we had been disposed to do you any harm, you would have had a bullet in you before you were aware of us."

The Turk came out to greet the newcomers, and resumed as quickly as possible his two-fold occupation. Directly he had lighted his chibouk and begun to turn the spit again, he said, "Welcome, friends of old times. I invite you to my meal. You glad to see you once more. Above all, I bid you not to call me Fortunatus any more; I no longer bear—but I live, in future."

Maruszhka and her companion had taken their seats on the green stones. The warlike woman took a short pipe from her girdle and all of it out of a leather pouch. After she had lighted it, she thus replied: "What I have heard, several times, without believing it, is true, then, after all? You have become the son of a father a Christian; you have denied the Saviour of our human race, and changed your angelous name for an ill-omened one?"

"We won't quarrel about that, fair Mrs. Akai," said the Turk; "I think I have made a good exchange. The prophet's name is a happier place than your hearth."

"If one were only sure of it," rejoined Maruszhka.

"Faith is better than knowledge," rejoined the Turk; "I believe in the glory Mahomet preached, as distinctly as I formerly believed in heaven with its angels and saints. I am, therefore, delighted with delight which I never enjoyed before, to see you, the present. What was I but once a year for the sake of Petra's stern command. What am I now? A person who is contented with the present, and of course, one who still lives."

"Yet you are flying far away," said Maruszhka; "you should not come, and fly, were it only to-night, and to see me, and you to the place of our meeting."

"I'll be here, then," replied the Turk; "I'll be here, and you to go with me."

"Are you content?" asked Maruszhka, with a slight smile, "to see whose glance the Turk is directed to?"

"Yesterday I just," said he, "and tomorrow I shall be here."

LARGE ROUNDS.

Make a round loop, the size of this O, and work 30 treble in the round loop.

2nd round: Chain 19, miss 5, plain 1, repeat round.

3rd: Work double crochet in each loop all round.

4th: Chain 5, miss 2, plain 1, repeat round.

5th: Chain 5, plain 1 in the centre of the 5 chain of last round, repeat round.

chain 2, work 1 treble at the top of the next treble of last round you repeat all round the leaf with 3 chain, opposite the 3 chain of last round, and 2 treble at the top of the 2 treble of last round, with 2 chain between them, working both sides to correspond, turn back.

4th: Chain 4 and plain 1 in each lot of the chain of last round, fasten off, which completes the leaf; you then work a stalk to each leaf as follows: chain 5, work 1 treble in the centre of the chain round between the edge and the centre, work 1 treble on the other side, the same turn back, and work the 5 chains plain, fasten off, which completes the stalk; after working the number of each portion required and joining them together, as shown in the illustration, you work a band for the neck-part of the collar as follows.

Work a few plain at the end, then chain 10, and work 1 treble where it requires a treble, and a double where it requires a double, and a plain in the centre of the stalks and rounds as you see the stitches in the engraving, so as to make it lie to the shape of the neck.

2nd row: Chain 2, miss 2, work 1 treble, repeat to the end, turn back.

3rd: Chain 2, work 1 treble at the top of the treble of last row, repeat to the end, turn back.

4th: Double crochet, fasten off, which completes the collar.

SIR CUSACK RONEY.

In the course of a memoir of Mr. William Dargan, which appeared in our pages in January, 1853, and more especially in reference to that gentleman's promotion of the Dublin Exhibition, which has since met with a recognition so universal and so eulogistic at the hands alike of royalty and of the multitude, there occurred, in allusion to the individual whose name heads this notice, some remarks which we take the liberty of repeating, as the best introduction to the observations that are about to follow. Having given some details of Mr. Dargan's early life and subsequent railway prises. Mr. Peto, having had long experience of Mr. Roney's peculiar aptitude of the kind referred to, embraced the suggestions offered, with a promptitude alike flattering to the discernment of the one and confidence of the other, as the issue proved. Forthwith Mr. Roney developed the highly-complicated but most simply-executed scheme, known as the 'Tourist Traffic System,' whereby the requirements of the travelling public were met with a completeness which, all things considered, would have been declared wholly impossible three months before the machinery was in full operation.

proceedings, the biography continued. Towards the end of 1851, the prescient eye of Mr. Roney—well known in England, and whose capacity for administering the affairs of great mercantile companies and associations had long been established—foresaw that there was about to be an 'exodus,' as the saying is, of the British travelling public into Ireland. This idea he soon made apparent to the chairman of the Chester and Holyhead Railway, Mr. S. M. Peto, the affluent and enlightened member for Norwich, whose name is scarcely less known in any country in Europe than his own, owing to the vastness and general diffusion of his railway enter-and which would have been utterly impossible in any other hands. According to the Times of the 18th of November, in its review of Sir Francis Head's 'Fortnight in Ireland,' upwards of 200,000 English tourists visited that country in 1852. This enormous crowd, equal to the entire population of a German principality, or South American republic, made their acquaintance with the island at probably, on an average cost per head, one fifth what they would have been able to do but for the suggestion of Mr. Roney's system; while the country and all the railway companies were immensely benefited, and the foundation laid for the illimitable future extension of the same plan. Ireland was full of English visitors, who expressed their admiration of what they saw, and their delight with the civility and attention lavished upon them by a people whose natural disposition was pronounced to be worthy of their scenery and their soil—and the force of flattery could no further go. The common topic of conversation was, of course, the wonders of the World's Fair the previous summer in Hyde-park, where every one had been, and whence every one had carried some idea to interchange for a neighbour's. A Lilliputian reproduction of the Broidnag structure had been got up at Cork, and with very great success, though confined only to the contributions of the neighbourhood. The souvenir of the desirability of a Great Irish Exhibition, doubtless, occurred simultaneously to numbers all over the country; but, as the poet defines wit to be, what was so these vague, dreamy, and as yet voiceless predilections had to be reduced to form and substance and tangibility; and they were, by Messrs. Dargan and Roney. When, where, or under what circumstances these gentlemen originally came together, we have not heard. But certain it is there ensued from this meeting a mutual recognition of capacity, ingenueness, and determination, which has resulted in a conviction that the two individuals were essential to the completion of the purpose which then germinated, perhaps unconsciously, in the mind of either. Probably the merit, if it be one, of priority, belonged to neither; and spontaneously the conception came forth. There were two Frankensteins at work on the same materials; but such 'faultless monster as the world ne'er saw,' at least in Ireland (the land of phenomena), will, we believe, be the result of the double parentage. Wholly devoid of jealousy, superior to the littleness that would seek the gratification of a paltry vanity by enforcing obscurity on others, as shown by his rejection of a titular honour proffered by the late Lord Lieutenant, Mr. Dargan not only insisted on keeping altogether in the background, but that Mr. Roney, as his representative on the committee, should become the secretary of the undertaking. This Mr. Roney did, stipulating only that his position should be honorary, his services gratuitous, and immediately he proceeded to justify in Ireland the expectations which his English antecedents had already created.

"The unparalleled act of Mr. Dargan in placing £20,000 at the disposal of the committee, would in itself have been sufficient to stamp any project with abundant éclat in any part of the world, and to ensure the donor an universal celebrity. But what lent it the prestige of assured success in the eyes of persons who were to be called upon to send to it those articles which alone could make it what it ought to be, was the knowledge that a practical man like Mr. Roney had pledged himself to realise Mr. Dargan's aspirations, by achieving for Ireland an eminent industrial status among nations, and thus, by one effort, obliterate the odium of ages. Accordingly, his reception on the continent, with many of the languages of which he is well acquainted (he was partly educated in France), was in the highest degree gratifying. The letters he took from our Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs secured him, of course, the co-operation of the whole British corps diplomatique abroad, and procured him admission to circles that would have been otherwise impervious to all private efforts. But in the countenance personally extended to him by the Emperor of the French, the King of the Belgians and of Prussia, and by the various Dutch, Austrian, and other continental authorities, and all the great manufacturing and artistic interests of every kind, in the course of his extensive tours, there was a heartiness and cordiality far more impressive and significant than what any formal introduction, however exalted, could have commanded."

"Mr. Roney, well knowing on whom he had to rely, instead of circumscribing his scope and concentrating his efforts when he saw how brilliantly the scheme was being taken up, put forth fresh feelers, and derived fresh strength and daring from each response. Mr. Dargan added another £6,000 to the original sum. Again the work proceeded; and again Mr. Dargan seconded the efforts of his ally by still another advance of £14,000—making a total of £40,000! Here it has been necessary to stop, not from the exhaustion of Mr. Dargan's liberality, and still less, if that be possible, by a cessation of the consequences we have been particu-rising; but because of the pressure of inexorable time, the necessity of now seeking to mature and perfect what had been so sumptuously initiated. On that object the energies of the Dublin executive are now being brought to bear. The erection of the building is keeping pace precisely with the calculations on which it has been erected. We do not wish to encumber this paper with details of its dimensions and peculiarities, and shall content ourselves with saying that it is after the design of Mr. Benson, C.E., who erected the Cork Exhibition already alluded to. Selected from among twenty-nine competing designs,—the rivalry being provoked far less by the proffered prize of £50, than by the desire to participate in the fame rebounding from a prominent association in such a work—it is uniquely beautiful; and though it has necessarily much in common with the Crystal Palace, it is in no respect a plagiarism of that conception, and abounds in merits of its own that stamp it as thoroughly original. Be the result of the Exhibition what it may—and it is impossible to believe it can fail to be all and everything its projector and creator can expect—the remembrance of 1853 will at least confer an enviable immortality on William Dargan, and for ever 'keep his memory green' with a grateful and admiring posterity."

It is with no inconsiderable satisfaction that the writer of the foregoing, after the lapse of eighteen months, quotes his then anticipations now, and appeals for their confirmation to what has since become matter of history. If the magnanimity of Mr. Dargan was remarkable in refusing at the hands of the Irish viceroy the honour of a knighthood, how much greater must it have been in declining a still higher dignity when proffered personally by the monarch herself? But the favour of the sovereign raised him to a far more exalted eminence than his acceptance of any mere titular appellation could have done. Her Majesty, with a truly royal graciousness worthy of all panegyric, on the occasion of her visit to Dublin last year, proceeded, accompanied by the Prince Consort, to the private residence of Mr. Dargan, at a short distance from the Irish metropolis, and expressed to him and his amiable wife her sense of the admiration with which she had been filled by a contemplation of the superb fabric his truly patriotic munificence had erected on the lawn of Leinster House. Not only did her Majesty do this, but she took care to manifest her feelings towards him in the most conspicuous manner possible within the area of the beautiful building he had created, and repeated inspections of whose varied and extraordinary contents she made in company with him. The success of the Exhibition was great, though it resulted in a loss of not less than £20,000 to the projector—a loss which he estimated as light indeed compared to the enduring good it was calculated to confer, and which it has conferred, on his country.

The main-spring of the éclat that attended the memorable Dublin Exhibition of 1853, was admitted on all hands to be in the secretary. Through his exertions it was invested with its thoroughly cosmopolitan character throughout Europe, contributions from nearly all parts of which were forwarded, principally at his instigation and personal solicitation, to the value of nearly three quarters of a million sterling. There never was a question raised in any quarter as to the paramount credit due to him, not only for his indefatigable exertions in connexion with this great work, but for the tact and discrimination that gave efficacy to those exertions, and imparted to his colleagues a reliance that everything he undertook would be carried out to the letter. So emphatic was this feeling on the part of the executive staff, not only during the continuance of the Exhibition, but after its close, when the mere temporary value of his presence and counsels might be supposed to have passed away, that the "Official Record" of the undertaking was dedicated to him by the chief financial officer of the committee, in terms whose warmth and undesignedness were abundantly justified, as the facts we have enumerated will readily suggest.

Acting in conformity with the voice of public approval, the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, the Earl of St. Germans, on the opening day of the Dublin Exhibition, intimated that, at its close, he proposed conferring on Mr. Roney the honour of knighthood—a piece of intelligence that was received with unqualified approval, not only among his countrymen, but in England, where he had formed a larger circle of friends than almost any private individual not moving in political life or commanding high social station could boast of.

Some of the more influential of these friends having, about the time we speak of, matured plans of immense magnitude in connexion with the development of the resources of Canada and British North America generally, by means of railways, naturally turned their attention to the gentleman who, by common accord, was regarded as in every way the most competent to carry these plans into execution with the utmost promptitude and discretion. Accordingly negotiations were opened with Mr. Roney, by the directorate of the magnificent system of railways, of which the main artery is the Canadian Grand Trunk, extending upwards of 1,100 miles, and connecting the Atlantic seaboard on the English side with the network of the States' railways and the chain of lakes on the west, and requiring no less than eleven millions sterling for its formation. The Exhibition being now in the full tide of its popularity, Mr. Roney closed with these overtures, and in June proceeded to Canada, where his faculty of railway organisation in creating an executive staff and simplifying the arrangements for traffic that was yet non-existent, though certain to be enormous as soon as the requisite facilities should be forthcoming, speedily made itself felt in a mode as satisfactory as circumstances would possibly permit. Having made repeated inspections of every portion of the country and its vicinage about to be embraced in the sphere of the British North American railways, he returned to Europe, and on the closing day of the Dublin Exhibition had conferred upon him, by the Earl of St. Germans, the honour of knighthood, when, to quote the "Official Record" already alluded to, "12,500 of his assembled fellow-citizens manifested their approval of the action by their hearty cheers, which rang through the entire building."

Had Sir Cusack Roney remained in Europe during the entire period the Dublin Exhibition was open, it is believed by those most competent to form an opinion of such matters, that the pecuniary result would have been a considerable gain, instead of a heavy loss to Mr. Dargan. It would be useless now to analyse the probability on which this conjecture was based; but, however we might have rejoiced for Mr. Dargan's sake, had such really been the case, the absence of Sir Cusack Roney from Canada, at the precise period when he visited that most flourishing dependency of the British crown, would have retarded events pregnant with material consequences that are not to be measured by gains or losses of a private nature, however large. His personal acquaintance with Canada and its wonderful resources as a field for his countrymen, and the confidence with which the latter looked up to his judgment, enabled him to direct to the shores of our own North American colonies a considerable portion of that tide of Irish emigration which had hitherto flowed almost exclusively to the United States, even when flowing through the Canadas. Hence, every mail from America brings news of a constantly-increasing proportionate influx of Irish, and not only of Irish, but of English and Scotch immigrants into Canada, the powerful previous attractions of which for labourers of every class, and especially farmers and men of small means, more particularly with large families, have been infinitely enhanced by those stupendous railway works of which Sir Cusack is the director, and the progressive benefits of which to the mother-country and the colony must be inestimable. He remained some months in England, actively employed in the promotion of the onerous duties entrusted to him, and with such success, making so apparent the solidity and self-sustaining nature of Canadian prosperity, that the war, which annihilated so many other schemes of great promise, by diminishing the money-market and sending capitalists from investing, failed to prevent the necessary funds from being raised for the construction of the various sections of the Grand Trunk as rapidly as was desirable.

During his stay in England he was nearly instrumental in getting up one of the most imposing demonstrations of respect and esteem ever shown in the city of London to any individual subject in this realm, with the single exception of the Duke of Wellington. It was a dinner at the London Tavern to Lord Elgin, Governor-general of Canada, who happened to be in this country at the time on leave of absence from the post to which he has since returned with renewed éclat, and where he has just established fresh claims on the gratitude of the Canadians and admiration of the English community. The price of the tickets to the dinner was three guineas and a half per head—a circumstance which we mention, simply for the purpose of showing that the inducement to be present must have been something more than ordinary, when such a cost did not prevent the great room from being crowded to its utmost capacity, with men of the highest station in the metropolis, Lord John Russell being in the chair, supported by nearly one-half the present cabinet, and by several ex-secretaries of state for the colonies, who came forward to testify their concurrence in the conduct of the noble guest of the evening, at the instance of the committee, to whom Sir Cusack Roney acted as honorary secretary—a position anything but a sinecure in his hands. He soon afterwards returned to Canada, in company with Lord Elgin, and accompanied his lordship to Washington, where the noble earl succeeded in effecting a commercial treaty with the United States, that has not only for ever put an end to the perilous disputes which so long endangered the peace and good feeling of the two countries, in respect to the right of fishing within certain debatable limits, but has made free trade and genuine reciprocity the basis of all future commercial relations, whereby each nation will be a most substantial gainer, Canada, in a pre-eminent degree, profiting by the new and never-failing markets thus opened for her tanning and varied produce at her own doors.

It only remains for us to say, in the words of "Dulc's Knight-errant" for the current year, that Sir Cusack Roney, whom we introduce into our gallery as an evidence of what energy, industry, and exemplary conduct will achieve in this country, even when not exercised in the ordinary professional, commercial, or political walks of life, is the "son of the late Cusack Roney, Esq., an eminent surgeon in Dublin, who was twice president of the Royal College of Surgeons there. Born in Dublin, 1810; married, 1837, daughter of Jas. Whiteombe, Esq.; educated in France and at the University of Dublin, where he graduated B.A., 1829, and in the same year passed the College of Surgeons in Ireland; but shortly afterwards abandoned the medical profession. Was secretary to the Royal Literary Fund from 1835 to 1837; subsequently became private secretary to the Right Hon. R. More O'Ferrall (late Governor of Malta), when he was secretary to the Admiralty and the Treasury; was next, for some years, a clerk in the Admiralty at Whitehall; became secretary to the Eastern Counties Railway in 1845; and managing director of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada in 1853; was knighted by Earl St. Germans, Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, for his eminent services as secretary to the Great Industrial Exhibition in Dublin in 1853."

MONUMENTAL FOUNTAIN, IN THE PLACE SAINT SULPICE, AT PARIS.

THIS beautiful work of art, which was raised at the expense of the city of Paris, and of which we present an engraving, stands close to the Church of Saint Sulpice, in the middle of the great square before the doorway. It is of stone, in the form of a quadrangular pavilion, surmounted by a hip roof, which terminates in a flower and a cross. At the foot of the pavilion are three basins, one above the other, the two uppermost of which are connected by four pedestals with two steps. The upper step of each supports a vase with two handles, from which flows a jet of water; on the lower step is a lion couchant with a cartouche in its claws, representing the arms of Paris. The water which escapes from the vases falls in cascades into the lowest basin, which is octagonal in form.

In the niches on the four sides of the pavilion, which are separated by Corinthian pilasters, have been placed the statues of four great pulpit orators—Bossuet, Fénelon, Flebrier, and Massillon. The niches are surmounted by caryatids crowned with caps of ecclesiastical dignitaries, and bearing the arms of the dukes of Meaux, Cambrai, Nantes, and Clermont.

The monument was constructed according to the plans and under the direction of M. Visconti, by whose serene death France has lost a great artist, of whom she may well be proud. It has been criticised with being a little too heavy in general appearance, and there is certainly some truth in this; but the expense of the project was so passed to be, that he felt it necessary to conform to the style set before him in the doorway of the Church of Saint Sulpice. The less room for any such excuse in the case of the statues of Fenelon, Massillon, and Flechier, which are far too heavy. It is

THE SOLDIER RETURNING FROM WAR.

It is a touching scene, and unhappily one that is very opportune at the present time, which our artist has depicted in the work before us. We there see the broken warrior coming back to his native village after long and hard service abroad. His strength is his having his arm still in a sling. He sighs as he contrasts his present exhausted and almost hopeless condition with the cheerful light-heartedness with which he first enlisted in the army. He looks back with a feeling of melancholy upon the day when he first exhausted, his brow is wrinkled, and his look pensive. The stripes upon his arm, which are honourable proofs of his good conduct, unhappily cannot cure his wounds or replace the mutilated hand, from the loss of which he has not yet recovered, as appears from set out from home in all the buoyancy of youth, pleased with his uniform, and full of hopeful aspirations. He remembers the looks of admiration which flashed upon him from gentle eyes as he passed along, the expressions of good-will poured forth by kind neighbours, and the affectionate embraces of dear relatives. Here it was that he parted with his fond mother, who, like all his fascinating illusions, is now no more.

His limbs totter, and yet he hastens on to keep up with the two young guides who go before him. They are his sister's children, who have come out to meet him. The eldest has, with some difficulty, prevailed upon him to let her carry his luggage, and he has scarcely been able to refuse the youngest his gun. They both knew him at once; his uniform was familiar to them; they even knew the number of his regiment. As the girl looks round at him, he is forcibly reminded of her mother, whom he has not seen for years, but to whom he is strongly attached. A thousand emotions are stirred within his breast as he hears the village church-clock strike, and sees the field in which he used to work, the well-known road, and the old house. Scenes long forgotten rush in rapid succession before his mind's eye—the hay-making, the harvest, and all the various occasions of merriment which enliven rural life. Arrived at the home of his youth, he is received with open arms. The children play with his sword and his gun, and amuse themselves by putting on his soldier's clothes; while all the neighbours come to listen to the story of his adventures.

PAUL SCARRON.*

A LITTLE more than a hundred years ago, there was a grand carnival at Maus. It was not such a carnival as we see now-a-days. All was open and above board; there was no concealment. One of the madcaps of the hour was a youth of seven-and-twenty, who desired to be, however, quite disguised. He accordingly plastered himself with oil and then rolled himself in a feather-bed, which certainly gave him a very grotesque and absurd appearance. The whole carnival was taken by surprise at this original mask. People ran after him in crowds; at last, however, the boys became unpleasant in their conduct, and the young man and his three companions plunged into the Sarthe, which was full of ice. A few days later his three companions were dead, and he was attacked by hopeless paralysis of his limbs.

The hero of this scene was Paul Scarron, the most uproarious comic poet and writer of France, author of the "Comie Romance" and other productions of the same class.

Born in Paris in 1610, his father being a counsellor of parliament, Scarron would have had nearly a thousand a year, English money, if the annoyances of a step-mother had not driven him to commit the greatest follies. The above adventure was the last of a series of extravagancies and wild conduct that were leading him to ruin. At his father's death, he pleaded against his step-mother, amused his judges, and lost his case. He was now doomed to obscurity and poverty, but he took it with extreme good humour. He took refuge in a house in the Marais, living "in a chair, having no motion left but that of his tongue and fingers." His deformity was increased by a fall from a horse. He began to live as a poet, and was patronised by nobility. The Duke de Longueville, Gaston d'Orleans, Madame de Hautefort, successively gave him employment. At last, he was presented to Anne of Austria, who offered him a place.

"Madam," said he, "the only post I can fill, is that of official sick man of the crown."

The office was created and a pension attached to it.

"I promise to fulfil my functions admirably," he said.

He wrote away, however, and lampooned everybody. Unfortunately, he did not spare Cardinal Mazarin, who suppressed his pension. The princes, the rebels, and their coadjutors made it up to him in popularity. He asked in vain for the smallest living—a living, even without any parishioners. He could not obtain it.

One evening, a young lady of great beauty came to one of his evening parties. She was very poor. Daughter of a Calvinist, her existence had been a miserable one. Her youth had been spent in prisons and in huts. She became a Catholic to save herself; and when once converted, was abandoned by her patrons. She was driven forth to die without a hope. Scarron saw her, heard her story, and was much moved.

"You must go into a convent or marry," said he. "Do you want to be a nun? If so, I will write poetry until I can pay your dowry. Do you prefer a husband? I can offer you half my bread and the ugliest face in France."

Françoise d'Aubigné preferred the poor cripple to the convent. She married him; and never was there a tenderer wife. In the marriage-contract Scarron described her dowry as "four gold pieces, two fine eyes, a splendid figure, beautiful hands, and much wit."

"What a dowry!" said those who were present.

"It is immortality," said the poet; "the name of Madame Scarron will live for ever."

Nine years of devotion rewarded Scarron. In his house she became acquainted with Turenne, Mignard, and LeVigné. A widow at five-and-twenty, she had reputation, beauty, and every accomplishment; but she refused every offer.

Some years later, there took place in the chapel of Versailles, in presence of the Archbishop of Paris and many witnesses, a marriage ceremony, which reasons of state rendered it necessary should be kept secret. The contracting parties were Louis XIV., king of France, and Madame de Maintenon, the widow of Scarron, who from this hour governed France, and was generally esteemed to be as great an enemy of her early faith, as any of those who persecuted her when a child.

Scarron is recollectcd as a coarse rhymester. His widow holds the position of a queen of one of the greatest of French kings, legally, though not avowedly so.

THE HYÆNA.

ALL the warmer parts of the eastern continent, from India to the Senegal, in Western Africa, are inhabited by great numbers of a singular animal, which appears in some respects to unite the characters of several distinct creatures. This is the common Striped Hyæna (Hyæna Vulgaris), a creature of the most repulsive aspect, and to the full as disgusting in his habits as in his external appearance. At first sight he has a good deal of the appearance of a large, and very ugly dog, and agrees so closely in some of his characters with the dogs, that Linnæus, the great Swedish naturalist, associated the hyæna with these animals (dogs, wolves, and foxes), under the name of Canis Hyæna. Later naturalists, however, have found distinctions which warrant the complete removal of the hyæna from this locality. These are derived partly from the structure and arrangement of the teeth, which somewhat approach those of the cats, and the tongue of the hyæna is furnished, like that of the larger cats (the lion, tiger, &c.), with a number of prickles, serving to rasp the last particles of flesh from the bones of its prey. Unlike the cats, however, their claws are not retractile; and they possess beneath the tail a little pouch, like that which we meet with in the civet, and which, as in that animal, serves as a receptacle for an odorous secretion. The jaws and teeth of the hyæna are exceedingly solid and powerful; and the former are moved by muscles of prodigious strength, enabling the animal to crack bones which one would have thought beyond his power; so firmly does he bite, and so tenacious is he of his hold upon anything that he has once seized, that it is almost impossible to make him let it go. The Moors are said to avail themselves of their knowledge of this circumstance to capture the hyæna. They throw him the end of a long sack, made on purpose, and, when he has seized it, they may drag him wherever they please, without any fear of his losing his hold. Cuvier tells us, also, that the Arabs employ the name of the hyæna as expressive of obstinacy; and the term "stiff-necked" may certainly be applied to this animal in more senses than one; for it not unfrequently happens that the vertebrae of his short, thick neck, become fixed together by a bony secretion, in consequence of the violent muscular action to which they are constantly exposed, so that, in some cases, the whole of these bones are at last united into a single piece. Hence, the older writers, to whom this fact appears to have been well known, were induced to assert that the hyena, unlike other animals, had but a single bone in his neck. The whole fore-part of the body in the hyena is muscular, and well-developed—a structure enabling the creature to dig into the earth with great facility, which, as we shall see hereafter, is of no small importance to him; but the hinder quarters are depressed, the legs being thrown out behind very much, so as to give a very awkward appearance of weakness to this part of the animal. The head is short and thick; the nose broad and black; the eyes prominent; the ears very large, upright, nearly naked, and of a dull purplish colour. The general colour of the animal is a brownish-gray, marked with irregular dark brown or blackish bands on the body and limbs; the tail is rather short and bushy; and along the back runs a strong, bristly mane, which the creature erects when irritated.

The hyena generally lives in caves, where it sleeps during the day, being a strictly nocturnal animal in its wild state. It feeds principally upon the dead bodies of men and animals which it may meet with in those inhospitable solitudes; but, in many cases, venturing nearer to the habitations of man, it seeks its food in a manner which tends more than anything to excite our abhorrence. The creatures prow into the cemeteries during the night, and tear open the graves in search of newly-buried bodies, which they mangle and devour with insatiable voracity. It is not surprising that these facts, perhaps imperfectly observed, and embellished with the warmth of Oriental imagination, should have given rise to an infinity of superstitious tales; one instance of which will, probably, be well known to the majority of our readers—for there is no doubt the Ghoul, in whose company the lady in the "Arabian Nights" indulged her taste for human flesh, is merely the hyena in a supernatural dress. Mr. Bruce, also, the Abyssinian traveller, says that the streets of Gondar were "full of them from the time it turned dark till the dawn of day, seeking the different pieces of slaughtered carcases which this cruel and unclean people expose in the streets without burial; and who firmly believe that these animals are Falasha from the neighbouring mountains, transformed by magic, and come down to eat human flesh in the dark in safety." It is singular, in this case, to mark the close coincidence of superstitious belief in all countries; by merely substituting the wolf for the hyena, and making allowance for the difference in the habits of the two animals, we get at a superstition which was long prevalent in our own land. Disgusting as the carrion-eating habits of the hyena appear to us, especially when manifested in the way last mentioned, we must not forget that, in common with the vultures and many other creatures equally offensive to fastidious minds, he is performing his part in the economy of nature. And this part is by no means one of the least important; for, in the hot climates inhabited by these creatures, none can render more effectual service to their fellows, than those which, undeterred by abominations which would probably turn the stomach of any of the more aristocratic carnivora, clear away dead animal matter, which, if left to the gradual process of decomposition, would poison all the atmosphere in its neighbourhood.

The hyena, however, by no means confines himself entirely to animal food in a state of decomposition—high, as our opinions would, doubtless, term it—on the contrary, he appears not to let slip any opportunity of supplying himself with fresh meat when it falls in his way. Bruce tells us that the hyena was "the destruction of their asses and mules, which, above all others, are his favourite food;" and this traveller had considerable experience as to the habits of the animal. He appears rarely to attack man unless provoked, but then knows how to defend himself with courage, as the following extract from Bruce's work will show. It is also interesting as showing the great variety of objects to which the appetite of the creature can adapt itself. "One night in Maitsha," says Mr. Bruce, "being very intent on observation, I heard something pass behind me towards the bed, but upon looking round could perceive nothing. Having finished what I was then about, I went out of my tent, intending directly to return, which I immediately did, when I perceived large blue eyes glaring at me in the dark. I called upon my servant with a light, and there was the hyena standing nigh the head of the bed, with two or three large bunches of candles in his mouth. To have fired at him I was in danger of breaking my quadrant or other furniture, and he seemed, by keeping the candles steadily in his mouth, to wish for no other prey at that time. As his mouth was full, and he had no claws to tear with, I was not afraid of him, but with a pike struck him as near the heart as I could judge. It was not till then he showed any sign of fierceness; but upon feeling his wound, he let drop the candles, and endeavoured to run up the shaft of the spear to arrive at me, so that, in self-defence, I was obliged to draw a pistol from my girdle and shoot him, and nearly at the same time my servant cleft his skull with a battle-axe."

There is a very general opinion that the hyena is quite untamable, arising, probably, to a great extent from the ferocity and even malignity of his aspect, and this and the opinion acting together, have, no doubt, often prevented the experiment from being made, for the animal, although not much uglier than many bull-dogs, is certainly not one that would be very generally attractive as a pet. Nevertheless, it appears that the hyena is capable of being tamed, and will even exhibit a good deal of the affection of a dog; for Bishop Heber states, that he saw one in India, which followed his master about, and fawned upon him and his friends exactly in the manner of our more amiable-looking canine friends. Another characteristic of the beast, which no doubt is not without its effect in producing the general feeling of dislike towards it, is its singular voice. This sounds like a very harsh imitation of a human laugh, rather, perhaps, of that quality known to theatrical managers as "fiendish," a horrible, unearthly exclamation, which may be heard in almost any menagerie at feeding time. Ill-adapted as the noise is to produce any impression of jollity on the minds of the hearers, so as to attract them into its neighbourhood to see what is going on, there is no doubt that it was this that led the ancients to believe that the hyena possessed the power of imitating the human voice, and that by this means he lured unwary travellers to his den, with many other particulars, which are related by Pliny with becoming gravity. Still more extraordinary was the belief entertained by the ancients that these animals annually changed their sex, being males one year, females the next, and so forth.

Although the form of the hyena does not give promise of much activity, he runs very swiftly when fairly in motion; for some time after starting, however, he is said to halt in his gait to such an extent, as to produce an impression that one of his legs is broken, and it is not until this wears off that he gets to his full speed.

Two other species of hyena are found at the Cape of Good Hope, where they are known to our colonists by the name of wolves. One of these, called the Strand-wolf (Hyena villosa), is of a dark grayish-brown colour, with only a few blackish stripes on the legs; the other, the Tiger-wolf (Hyena coarctata), which appears to be the commoner species, is of a grayish colour, like the striped hyena, but instead of stripes, is covered with black spots. In most of their habits they greatly resemble the striped hyena, but appear to depend for food more upon their own exertions. They pursue and destroy even the larger domestic animals. Dr. Andrew Smith says that the hyena never ventures to attack any animal unless it is running from him: "So anxious is he for the flight of the animals, as a preliminary to his attack, that he uses all the grimace and threatening he can command, to induce them to run." And the Rev. Henry M-thuen informs us that the hyenas "seem invariably to seize their prey in the flank, where neither horns nor heels can be of much avail; and deep scars are often to be seen on oxen and horses that have been caught by them and escaped." Both the authors here quoted, agree that animals which from sickness or other causes are unable to run from the hyena, and are consequently forced to defend themselves, are rarely injured by him. Such a formidable enemy is he to the Cape farmers that every means are adopted for his destruction, and in the neighbourhood of Cape Town, where hyenas were formerly very plentiful, coming in great numbers even into the town during the night, their numbers are now greatly reduced. His cunning, however, often renders him more than a match for his enemies; no ordinary snare will do for the hyæna; during his nocturnal prowlings he carefully examines every unusual object, and if guns are set with cords or leather thongs attached to their triggers, and crossing the hyæna's path, his investigations generally lead to his avoiding the danger by taking a different path. "The farmers," says Mr. Methuen, "have so often observed this result, that they now very rarely attempt his destruction by this means, but occasionally succeed by substituting for cords the delicate stems of creeping plants, which are regarded by him without suspicion, until he has actually suffered by them."

young children of the family. "Scars and marks on the various parts of the body," says the doctor, "often testify to the traveller how dangerous a foe the natives have in this animal." Notwithstanding this ferocity of natural disposition, the Spotted Hyæna is often domesticated by the natives and colonists of South Africa, amongst whom he is said to be even preferred to the dog "for attachment to his master, for general sagacity, and even, it is said, for his qualifications for the chase."

We may add, in conclusion, that, prior to the last geological changes undergone by this part of the world, England itself was

THE STRIPED HYÆNA (HYÆNA VULGARIS).

Although diminished in number in the more populous parts of the Cape colony, hyænas are still very numerous in the Caffre country, where, from their being exposed to so much less danger, they exhibit an unusual degree of boldness. Here, Dr. Smith tells us, they frequently endeavour at night to get within the wattles with which the houses are defended. If they succeed in this object, they next endeavour to enter the houses, where they will devour anything they can find, and not unfrequently carry off some of the inhabited by a gigantic species of hyæna, bearing a considerable resemblance to the Cape species, but attaining nearly the size of the Brown Bear. The bones of this animal have been found in caves, both in this country and on the continent, associated with the bones of herbivorous animals, which had served him for nourishment, actually bearing, in many instances, the marks of his teeth; whilst an additional proof that the caves were really the residence of the hyæna, is derived from the presence of his excrements.

THE MURDER OF THE PRINCES IN THE TOWER.

CALL no man happy till he is dead, says an ancient proverb, and there is wisdom in it. When the babe is born, none can tell what will be its course or when its life will end. The day may break out fine, but rain and clouds and storms may come before night.

These facts are less seldom witnessed, the truth seem almost less true in these days of monotonous civilisation, of rail ways, of reading and writing and the new police. But all history abounds with them. In the past they seem to be but common-

TYRELL VIEWING THE BODIES OF THE MURDERED PRINCES.

Everywhere around us are change, decay, and death. None can boast, for none know what a day may bring forth. Shame may come to honour and honour to shame. Lazarus and Dives may change places. A turn in the wheel may exalt the peasant into a prince. Another turn, and the prince may be a peasant or a lifeless lump of place maxims. In the past, to be great was to be in peril; to be born to a crown was often a sure road to death; to be in a position that all would envy, was the sure and certain prelude to being in a position from which even the poorest and vulgarst would shrink. Let us take an illustration from our own national old tales.

On a bright May morning it was May 4th, 1483—there was a royal procession wending its way from the great north road along the ancient streets of London. From far and near, from crowded balcony and quaint housetop, looked down admiring eyes. London had come forth to greet her young king, though there was terror in its walls nevertheless. The queen and her son the Duke of York and her five daughters were trembling all the while in the sanctuary at Westminster. They trembled, as well they might; for they knew the man who had now placed himself at the head of power, and who, under a mask of seeming loyalty, had but one object in view—the aggrandisement of himself. Richard, Duke of Gloucester, the Protector, has always been considered one of the worst characters in our history. In our childhood we learn his loathsome crimes, and in after-life our national dramatist perpetuates the impressions of our childhood. If we believe many of our historians, Richard III. was a monster in body as well as in mind. “The tyrant king Richard,” says John Ross of Warwick, his contemporary, “was born at Fotheringay, in Northamptonshire. Having remained two years in his mother’s womb, he came into the world with teeth and long hair down to his shoulders.” What he adds is, perhaps, more strictly true. “He was of a low stature, having a short face with his right shoulder a little higher than his left,” a picture which was wrought up into absolute deformity by subsequent historians, but contradicted by the testimony of a witness of undoubted credit—a picture which Shakspeare has made popular in the speech of the Duke himself, where he says

“I, that am not shaped for sportive tricks,
Nor made to court an amorous looking-glass;
I, that am rudely stamped, and want love’s majesty
To strut before a wanton, ambitious nymph;
I, that am curttailed of this fair proportion—
Cheated of feature by dissembling nature;
Deformed, unfinished; sent before my time
Into this breathing world, scarce half made up,
And that so lamely and unfashionable,
That dogs bark at me as I halt by them.”

But, in reality, it seems that Richard’s defects were more moral than personal. It was his mind that was so marred. It was the soul, and not the carcase in which it was set, that was so defective. His enemies reluctantly confessed that Richard possessed personal courage. If I may venture to say anything to his honour, though he was a little man, yet he was a noble and valiant soldier, says one. He was much admired for his eloquence and powers of persuasion, which were almost irresistible; especially when aided by his bounty, which was sometimes excessive. His understanding was good; but he seems to have been a cunning man rather than a great one—impenetrably secret, and a perfect master of all the arts of dissimulation. Ambition was his ruling passion. It was this which prompted him to supplant his hapless nephew, in order to obtain his crown; and, when he had formed that design, he seems to have stuck at nothing in order to secure its success. Coolly and deliberately he murdered the Earl of Rivers, Lords Grey and Hastings, because they stood between him and the crown. His ambition led him to still darker deeds. Between him and the object of his guilty and unscrupulous ambition, were two young princes—chargeable with no crime—innocent of all wrong—the children of his brother and wards of his own. But it was necessary, or it seemed to him such, that they should die, and their fate has ever been the one flagrant enormity—the one damning crime with which all generations of men have associated his memory, and for which they have for ever abhorred his very name. If great men knew in what light history would paint them, or how cold and impartial would be the verdict of posterity, they would less frequently venture to go wrong. But, for Richard, as for every man, there was some excuse in the circumstances by which he was surrounded, and in the character of his age. Most men would have done as he did to obtain power. All men had to wade through seas of blood; yet no one would have suspected, as he rode through the streets of London, bare-headed, before his nephew, calling to the people, “Behold your king!” that to him that youthful king would have to owe not merely the loss of his crown, but of his very life. Many might have envied that young boy, as he was the object of every eye, and as the public vented its acclamations in his praise. To many, such a life must have seemed full of promise of all that the world desires—the dawn of a day that would know no cloud.

In a little more than a month, that power and splendour had passed away. By the Protector’s authority, a sermon had been preached in St. Paul’s Cross by a time-serving clergyman—and such men are always to be had when they are wanted—to proclaim the young king and his brother bastards. The Duke of Buckingham made an eloquent harangue on the same subject to the mayor and citizens of London; and in August the crown had been placed on Richard’s head. But the young princes, where were they? Beneath the stone steps of the Tower, sleeping the sleep of death after life’s little fever of greatness and glory. The murder has been denied; but there seems no reason for doubting it. It has come down to us on the authority of Sir Thomas More, who only wrote five-and-twenty years after its occurrence, when a variety of sources, that he might not be enabled to acknowledge publicly, were open to him for the acquisition of materials. The following is his version:—“King Richard, after his coronation, taking his way to Gloucester to visit in his new honour the town of which he bore the name of old, devised, as he rode, to fulfil that thing which he had before intended. And forasmuch as his mind misgave him, that his nephews living then would not reckon that he could have right to the realm, he therefore thought without delay to rid them, as though killing of his kinsmen might aid his cause, and make him kindly king. Whereupon he sent John Greene, whom he especially trusted, unto Sir Robert Brakenbury, constable of the Tower, with a letter and evidence also, that the same Sir Robert should in anywise put the two children to death. This John Greene did his errand to Brakenbury, kneeling before our Lady in the Tower, who plainly answered, that he would never put them to death to die therefore. With which answer Greene returned, recounting the same to King Richard at Warwick, yet on his journey; wherewith he took such displeasure and thought, that the same night he said to a secret page of his: ‘Oh! whom shall a man trust? They that I have brought up myself—they that I thought would have mostly served me—even those fail, and at my commandment will do nothing for me.’ ‘Sir,’ quoth the page, ‘there lieth one in the pallet-chamber without that I dare well say to do your grace’s pleasure—the thing were right hard that he would refuse;’ meaning by this Sir James Tyrrell.” Accordingly, Tyrrell was sent for, and became compliant. It was a villainy from which he had not the grace to shrink, and it was devised that the two young princes should be murdered in their beds, “to the execution whereof he appointed Miles Forrest, one of the four that before kept them; and to him he joined one John Dighton, his own horse-keeper, a big, broad, square, and strong knave.” And when the time came, More tells us, “all the others being removed from them, this Miles Forrest and John Dighton, about midnight, came into the chamber, and suddenly wrapped them among the clothes, keeping down by force the feather-bed and pillows hard upon their mouths, that within a while they smothered and stifled them, and their breaths failing, they gave up to God their innocent souls, into the joys of heaven, leaving to their tormentors their bodies dead in bed; after which, the wretches laid them out upon the bed and fetched Tyrrell to see them; and when he was satisfied of their death, he caused the murderers to bury them at the stair-foot, mostly deep in the ground, under a great heap of stones.” The stranger who now visits the chapel of the White Tower will see, at the end of the passage which leads from the outer door to the foot of the circular staircase winding upwards to the sacred edifice, the old trunk of a mulberry-tree, reared against the wall in the corner. There stood the stairs; and beneath those stairs, in 1674, were found bones “answerable to the ages of the royal youths,” which were accordingly, by Charles the Second’s orders, honourably interred in Henry the Seventh’s chapel at Westminster. The spot was marked by the erection of the above mulberry-tree, which was cut down a few years ago, when the present passage was opened. Thus the tale was confirmed—if confirmation was required—and when the evidence for the universal belief was of the most convincing kind. Richard waded through seas of blood to the throne. Between him and it stood the royal princes; the way of getting rid of those princes would soon be clear. Once wrong, for Richard there was no alternative but to continue wrong. It was his necessity. The tale was even denied; there seems no reason, however, to doubt its truth. Shakspeare—who, as all the world knows, was a better historian than many a man who would deem play-writing a profane art, and Shakspeare himself little better than one of the wicked—may have set down Tyrrell's very words as he narrated the murder:—

The most arch deed of piteous massacre
That ever yet this land was guilty of.
Dighton and Forrest, whom I did suborn
To do this ruthless deed of butchery,
Albeit they were fleshed villains, bloody dogs,
Melting with tenderness and mild compassion,
Wept like two children in their death's sad story.
'Oh thus,' quoth Dighton, 'lay the gentle babes.'
'Thus, thus,' quoth Forrest, 'girdling one another Within their alabaster innocent arms;
Their lips were four red roses on a stalk,
Which in their summer beauty kissed each other.
A book of prayers on their pillow lay,
Which once,' quoth Forrest, 'almost changed my mind.
But oh! the devil'—Here the villain stopped;
But Dighton thus told on:—'We smothered
The most replenished sweet work of nature
That from the prime creation eye she framed.
Hence both are gone, with conscience and remorse.
They could not speak, and so I left them both
To bear this tidings to the bloody king.'”

But the crime failed to answer its end. Richard had to pay the penalty of his crime by the forfeit of his life, and thus Nemesis was avenged. In the shame attached to Richard's name ever since—in the horror with which all have regarded it—she has had a still deeper and more enduring revenge, and the two young princes murdered in the Tower still live in the page of history and in the sympathies of men.

THE AUTHOR AND THE FRENCH PUBLISHER.

IN 1838, a young author, quite unknown to fame, called one morning early upon the worthy Ambrose Dupont, the celebrated publisher of the Rue Vivienne. The lord of the book-trade was very much in the humour, on that occasion, of a wild boar after a day's chase by fierce dogs. He received the young author literally with a growl, enough to have terrified a timid man out of the house. He coolly pulled out his manuscript, and begged the publisher to read it. Ambrose Dupont, a worthy man, though rough, refused even to look at it. The author insisted. The publisher told him to take it and himself away together. The young man politely declined; and Dupont at last, to get rid of his importunities, told him to leave his book and go.

A week later he called again, and so on for about three months, once every week, to ask the fate of his novel, which, at last, he did hear. It was not a very flattering opinion that was communicated to him. But he only smiled, and went away. About a fortnight later he presented himself again in the ante-chamber of M. Dupont.

“What, sir,” exclaimed he, “again? Methinks I told you my mind last time sufficiently clearly.”

“Sir, you convinced me,” said the young Jesuit: “and I have called to say that, acquiescing in your opinion, I have burnt my manuscript.”

“Ah!” replied the publisher, somewhat surprised, “then I scarcely comprehend the present object of your visit.”

“I have not come on my own account, but if you will spare me a few minutes—”

“Walk into my private room, sir,” said Dupont.

“Sir,” began the other (our readers will recollect the scene is laid in France), “you have heard of Manzoni?”

“Sir, his reputation is European. I would have given him any price for a book.”

“Then, sir, allow me to say that—it is a great secret—I bring you the first volume of a translation of a new work by him.”

“A whole volume?” exclaimed Dupont eagerly.

“Yes, a whole volume,” said the young author.

“Will you leave it a day or two?” asked the publisher.

“No; I can only hand it to you, if sold.”

“But you can read a few chapters?”

“With pleasure.”

“Excuse me a moment,” said Dupont; and he went out and brought a gentleman from an inner room.

The young author read a chapter; the publisher and his friend looked at each other; they smiled. Presently Ambrose Dupont interrupted the reader.

“What do you want for the book?”

“Twenty-five copies, and forty pounds a volume.”

“You agree to that?”

The treaty was made, an agreement drawn up and signed. The publisher was full of admiration. He addressed Soulie, the author, whom he had brought in to listen, in no hesitating language. He declared to him that it was better than any of the celebrated author's previous works: the warm atmosphere of Italy breathed forth in every page. The translator bowed and smiled.

The work went to press, the publisher read the sheets with real interest. At last the eventful day came, when the title-page was placed in his hands. He read with amazement the name of a popular French novel, “Bertrand de Barin.”

“What do you mean?” he exclaimed angrily: “this is the title of the book I refused.”

“Exactly,” said the young man.

“And why have you put it to the translation?”

“It is not a translation. This is the book you refused without reading it.”

Ambrose Dupont burst into a loud laugh, shook hands with the cunning fellow, and published his book, which was very successful. Such a trick would scarcely have been appreciated in England, but as French ideas are, it was considered very natural and was generally admired, as what may be called a shrewd and clever rose.

JAPAN AND THE JAPANESE.

THE intercourse between Japan and China is an interesting feature in the history of these two remarkable countries. They were at one time intimate and active, though not always friendly. The Central Empire, as Japanese writers call China, looked down upon Dai Nippon with great contempt, claiming a sovereignty over it; while, on the other hand, the Japanese looked upon the Chinese as inferior animals, below them in morals, in physical formation, and everything. They are ready to own that in letters the Chinese were beforehand with them, because they actually did receive their literary knowledge from the Celestial Nation. According to Chinese historians, civilisation was conveyed to Japan in a very curious way, by a kind of colony. We are told that, in the second century of our era, the lord of the Central Empire, having been informed by certain learned and worthy philosophers that the herb which gave immortality grew in Japan in abundance, sent over to the island some three thousand boys and girls, who were to discover and bring back the inestimable plant. It appears, however, that the said three thousand boys and girls, being unable to find the valuable vegetable in question, and being all familiar with the summary methods of punishment in vogue in China, remained in Japan and settled there; thus, they all being fresh from school gave the Japanese the benefit of their learning and letters. Japanese writers, however, contemptuously reject this fabled explanation, and say that letters and science came to the Chinese from an explanation neither so romantic nor so striking as this fable, but, apparently, having the advantage of truth.

The claim of China to sovereignty, something like the claim of early popes to jurisdiction over all America, dates from very remote periods, from the conquest of Dai Nippon by Ziu-mu-tan-woo. But we have it recorded that, previously to the Christian era, the great Son of the Moon and Stars sent to the Emperor of the ning head of the Celestial Empire wished to gain a footing by taking one side. It was not, however, until the time of the Mongols, who had conquered China, that any serious attempt was made on Japan.

There had been fighting, it is true, in the Corea; but rather in the form of squabbles than wars.

That there was trade and commerce between the two nations, we know; but the vulgarity of the subject having terrified the grave chroniclers of ancient days, who condescended to nothing less than a the rich; and their expenditure contributed largely to keep up the 750 tea-shops in a town of 750,000 inhabitants.

The study of Japanese literature is rather curious than useful; and yet, as we become more connected with the race, we shall get interested in their history. In the present day, no nation can keep battle, or an embassy, or the death of kings, we have little details; though we do learn, incidentally, that many Chinese came to Japan, because of the free-and-easy life to be led in the tea-houses of the island—so much more at liberty than those of China, which were under severe regulations. These travelled Chinese were, of course, wholly apart; and we have little doubt that the time will come, when it will be considered a part of polite education to be intimately acquainted with the geography and history of all those nations which steam is bringing so close to us.

The earliest specimen of Japanese literature is an account of an embassy to China, in the year 659. It is written by a learned Korean, a professed literary man. It is called "The Journal of Yukino Murazi of Petsi," and comes down to us in a chronicle of the local history from 661 B.C. to A.D. 696, called "Nipponki," and published A.D. 720. It will be seen that the Japanese were before us in learning in those days, for this work is in thirty volumes. If we judged a book as a Dutchman did, by size, it would, indeed, be a great work. The only pity is, that the Japanese have allowed us to go so far ahead of them since. This work, and an historical survey, in seven volumes, published at Ohosaka, in 1795, bring down Japanese history to 1611.

One of the ambassadors was lost at sea; but Kisa and Yukino Murazi, after a nine weeks' voyage, made the coast of China, stopped there as prisoners some time, and returned to Japan, having done as much business as many other ambassadors in times past. In the year 716, two students went to China; and one, Simo-mitsi-no-Mabi, went home, after a residence of nineteen years, and, taking the name of Kibino Daisi, became a most celebrated literary character. The other was induced to remain in China, as Archive Keeper, and kept the office sixty-one years, when he resigned, and, returning to Japan, was drowned, at the age of eighty-seven.

In 1607, the Chinese sent an embassy to Japan. Relations had been broken off in consequence of the patent sent to the Ziogoon Hidayosi, or Tayko-sama. This potent prince was so indignant at being appointed Wang of Nippon by the Emperor of China, that he replied—"Sovereign of Nippon I have already made myself, and, if it comes to this, I will turn over a new leaf, and make Tai Ming my vassal." A terrible war ensued between the two sovereigns. It appears, as far as we can judge the politics of China and Japan, that the emperor of the former country wanted to play the Czar, and, like that potentate in Turkey, caught a Tartar.

The death of the ziogoon ended the war, which must have been rather a personal affair between two kings; for no sooner was the death announced, than the Chinese embassy came to treat of peace and commerce, all the while, however, keeping up a skirmishing little war in the Korean peninsula. There is, further, a very interesting narrative, in Japanese, of the disasters and adventures of a band of Japanese traders, who were made prisoners by the Tartar subjects of the Manchoo Emperor of China. It is kept at Yedo, and is contained in a history of Chao-seën. It commences with great gravity. "From the earliest times," says the adventurer, "the inhabitants of the coast towns Sinbo and Mikuni-ura, in the province of Yetsizen, have been wont, at the close of winter, to pass over to the dependencies of Japan, there to trade." But then it seems that there was a doubt if the so-called dependencies were, indeed, dependencies; the fact being, that Chao-seën, like a refractory daughter, had thrown off all allegiance, and claimed liberty from vassalage. It appears that the traders hit upon a desert place instead of Chao-seën, and at once gave up their commercial speculation. A terrible storm arising, the Japanese made a vow that, if they were preserved, they would throw away—sacrifice to the deities—all their defensive weapons. It immediately after happened, that they were attacked by a horde of enemies, and all the famous Japanese bows and arrows being at the bottom of the sea, the adventurers had, of course, no means of resistance, and all but fifteen out of fifty-eight were slain. But, for this massacre, the Tartars, a kind of Bashk Bazouks, were well chastised. There is a curious passage illustrative of Japanese manners. When the governor "questioned us by signs; whereupon Fiosayemon, taking out his nose papers, blew away a leaf to indicate that we were driven to this coast by the wind. He then sat down in a peaceful attitude, to intimate that we were merchants."

Japan is known as the empire of 3,850 islands, and takes its name from the Chinese form of Nippon, Jih-pun, origin of the sun, according to the learned Klapproth. Marco Polo calls it Zipangu, a corruption of Jih-pun-kwo, kingdom of the origin of the sun. Authentic records give Zin-mu-ten-woo as the first mortal monarch, who founded the rule of the mikados. He appears to have been a Chinese conqueror, or invader; but as he lived 660 B.C., we have not very detailed accounts of his parentage, which some ascribe to the terrestrial god who preceded him, the last of a long line of divine monarchs.

The mikados, relying on their divine right—which notion has pervaded every savage nation in early times—were despotic, though abdicated young. At last, one mikado abdicated in favour of his son, three years old, whose mother was daughter of a powerful prince. This father-in-law usurped authority until Yoritomo appeared, and after a time restored the old mikado, who appointed him ziogoon. In future, the mikado was only supposed to rule, the ziogoon holding all the power in his hands. The ziogoon, as well as the mikado, became at last an hereditary office.

Hence followed all the elaborate military, civil, and religious orders, which make Japan one of the most oddly-governed countries in the world, though always remaining a semi-religious, semi-military monarchy, upheld by the bows and arrows of the soldiers on one hand, and the priests on the other. The priestly influence in Japan, however, appears to have been even above the military. In savage countries, where the two influences appear to mingle, in general the religious will be found to predominate. The particular priest, of whom an engraving is given (p. 29), is one of the high priests of the sect of Buddha, called by the Dutch travellers "Buddhadienst, Seete zee-sjii," or of the sect Senju. This sect have made great way in Japan without having gained any political power. The surrounding features of the cut are ornaments worn by the high priest of this religion. The chair occupied by the worthy father is curious.

BURIED ALIVE.

THERE was not a better young fellow in the Canton de Vaud than Louis Fischer; perhaps there were handsomer, wiser, and more polished striplings—doubtless there were; but when we say better, we mean more thoroughly honest, straightforward, and good-hearted. You could not beat Louis at this. You might equal him perhaps; let us hope, for the sake of the canton, that this could be done over and over and over again; but you could not go beyond him.

And the same thing might be said of Lucy, the herdsman's pretty daughter, for Lucy was as pretty as she was good, which is saying a great deal—for sincerity and kindness and thrifty homely ways she could not be surpassed. In many respects she was better than Louis, and in her own sweet comely person was a realisation of the Alpine proverb—the hen is the better bird all over Switzerland.

Why do we talk about Louis and Lucy in the same paragraph, and bring them thus so closely together; why? They loved one another. You are not surprised at that; at all events you would not have been surprised if you had known them—nobody was who did. They lived in the same village, met every day, and many times a day since they were little children wondering at the snow mountains. They had played together, worked together, learnt together, worshipped together, and they loved each other now; friendship had ripened into love; the playfellows had become warm friends, and the friends lovers. Who could blame them? Within a circuit of ten miles, measuring from the little village church, there was only one who harboured anything but love towards them for their love to one another. This was Pierre Joseph.

A young man, maybe three years older than Louis, was Pierre Joseph. Some people thought he was better looking, and, perhaps, they were right. He had a higher forehead and a more symmetrical figure; he wore a smarter doublet, and had gold in his pouch, he had received a better education and had seen more of society; people said he knew the world better. Perhaps he did. But fine feathers do not always make fine birds. There was not that open-hearted honesty in Pierre that was always to be found in Louis; and as to his acquaintance with society and knowledge of mankind, we are apt to say men know the world when they only know the worst part of it, and this, or report spake falsely, was the case of Pierre Joseph.

However other people liked him, supposing that there were any who did, and giving Pierre Joseph the full benefit of the doubt, Lucy had no love for him. He had turned his attention towards her for a long time, had come over to the village—for he lived further up in the mountain—many and many a time, had brought her flowers in the summer time, and gossiped by the roaring fire in the winter; had laid himself out, as it were, to please, even to his costume like Malvolio, with his cross garters; had talked and sung, and, to do him justice, he could sing very fairly; had recounted his own strange adventures, described Milan and the city of the sea, and done all that he fancied would win her admiration and esteem. But it did not answer his expectations. Whatever he did or said, it centred in himself. He appeared to labour under the idea that he was behaving very handsomely and with considerable condescension, and appeared to intimate that a match with himself would be a decidedly good thing.

Well, it is an old story; here was a rich lover, and there was a poor one. Blind love holds the balance, and ducats, dollars, guineas kick the beam. Lucy plighted her faith to Louis, and the wedding-day was fixed. Pierre Joseph withdrew in high disdain. He was heard to threaten mischief on the blithesome couple, and seen to frown that horseshoe frown of his, which made him look like Scott's "Red Gauntlet." But what of that? words are but breath; let him threaten—let him frown; the sun will shine as brightly, and days and nights will come and go, as if he had no being. So the wedding-day came. It was a lousy day in the village, and a happy day. Preceded by an old musician and the bridesmaids, the young people walked to church, followed by a woman with a basket of flowers—a bit of nature for the festal day. When they entered the church, they were all surprised by noticing Pierre Joseph. There he sat, in a dusky part of the church—quite away from the sunshine—moodily watching all that took place.

Never mind. Pierre Joseph cannot stop the way; he can only watch with his dark frown and his bright eyes; he can only follow like a dark shadow, as the company go back, and the flowers are scattered in their way. When all is over, he turns away to the mountain-road and goes moodily homeward, plucking a flower to pieces, leaf by leaf, as if he were going through the old charm of "love me, love me not," which Marguerite tries in the play of "Faust."

So time went on; and the young bride became a thrifty housewife, labouring with her husband bravely at all the duties of a peasant's life, and never flinching from work for a moment. While the young man's axe rang in the forest, and here and there a stately tree wavered and tottered and fell; while his bright scythe glided over the rich greensward, and with right good will he delved the earth, till the perspiration, in great drops—labour's bright jewels—stood on his brow, his busy, bustling, thrifty wife was binding up the vine to the poles on which it grew, twitching off superfluous leaves and tendrils, gathering in the orchard fruit, and making, in her cleanly dairy, the finest cheese that was ever placed on table.

They were very happy; still happier when a little one was born—"a well-spring of pleasure, a messenger of joy and peace." They heard no more of Pierre Joseph—they almost forgot him; perhaps, indeed, they sometimes recollect— but always kindly—how friendly he had once appeared. As to his later conduct, his threatening, his visit to the church, and the rest of it, no reference was ever made. But trouble came. Lucy's father died; and with their grief on this account came the discovery that he was much poorer than they thought for; that he was in debt—deeply in debt—and, worst of all, in debt to Pierre Joseph. What could be done? They saw that at any moment all that was owing could be demanded; they saw that what little property the old man possessed would not meet a tithe of the sum due; they felt that to allow matters to take their course, would be to dishonour the memory of one whom they dearly loved. So Louis resolved to ride over to Pierre Joseph and attempt to make some arrangement with him.

He was received coldly, but with respect. Pierre professed to deeply regret the death of the old man. The money, he said, had been owing a long, long time—long before the marriage; that, of course, he could have no demand on Louis or his young wife. After talking a long time, Louis made the proposal which he had come to make. Would Pierre allow the matter to stand over for a year, if he became answerable for its payment? Pierre would advise him not to do that. Better think of it again. Better not, for the sake of a foolish pride, involve himself in other people's difficulties; especially when those other people were under the soil. Dead men tell no tales, and, doubtless, are heedless of all tales told. What if the villagers lost somewhat of their old respect for him; he would still sleep soundly under the daisy-quilt? No. Louis was resolved. Would the other grant him the time required? No. Yet, stop; for old acquaintance sake, he would. They parted more cheerfully than they had met; and, as the young man rode away, he did not observe the horseshoe frown that came upon the other's forehead, or how he muttered to himself, that it would work bravely yet.

Spring, summer, autumn, winter, the year was over and past, but it was a year full of disaster. On the anniversary of the agreement, Louis stood once more in the best room of Pierre's residence. There was a deep flush, a red spot on his otherwise pale cheeks as he bowed to the other when they met. He told in a few words the story of his disaster. Not a sentence from Pierre. He mentioned how sickness had been in his house, and his wife and child were but slowly recovering even then. Not a word. He told of bad crops, bad vintage, accident and disaster. Not a syllable. He begged for time. Time! not a day, not an hour. Time! no; he had waited long enough. The tide had ebbed. Let Louis be prepared for the worst. Pierre did not raise his voice, but he spoke in a calm, measured strain, without biting his eyes, and without betraying any emotion; except that the horseshoe frown was on his face, he was the same quiet man as he had been that day twelvemonth.

And the worst came. Louis and his family were turned adrift. They had to leave their old home, give up all they held dear, resign everything into the hands of their inexorable creditor. It was not for nothing he tore the flower leaf from leaf long ago. It is a hard thing to quit a place that we love, a place that is associated with our earliest recollections, where every leaf and flower, every blade of grass and creeping plant is eloquent, and tells the story of our early life. There is a sacredness in home, a first home. To the earliest places of human worship there clings—so goes the Arab legend—a guardian sanctity; there the wild bird rests not; there the wild beast may not wander; it is the hallowed spot on which the eye of God dwells, and which man's best memories preserve. There is some such feeling clinging to a first home, and to quit such a home after long years of happiness is sometimes sad and bitter.

As a hired labourer Louis obtained employment far up in the mountains. His home was now a poor rough place, but very dear to him. He had a good heart and hoped—hoped on; hoped ever! One evening he was returning from his daily labour, singing softly to himself an old stave that he had often sung in happier days. The sun was sinking fast, and flung its red rays on the ice mountains, and as Louis turned a corner of the circuitous path, he noticed a stranger mounted on a mule, and riding slowly along.

He had scarcely perceived this figure, when a sort of rushing sound, not very loud, but steadily increasing in its strength, was heard. Louis stopped; he knew too well what it meant. The stranger in advance stopped also, and as they glanced around their eyes met—it was Pierre Joseph.

"Stop! stop!" cried Louis, "the avalanche is upon us!" Steadily, but with tremendous velocity the snow-drift was advancing. At first, a narrow line of blue up in the white surface of the snow, it gradually assumed a more terrible appearance, there was no time to move or to attempt any escape; it was upon them. Man and mule rolled over, the feet of Louis slid from beneath him, amid the mass of drifting snow they were hurried forward, till some projecting rock became a barrier, and they were cast against its rugged side. After a few moments of terror, Louis aroused himself and found, although bruised severely, he was otherwise uninjured. He looked about him for Pierre, and discovered him not far off. His first movement was towards him, and he found he lay there quite senseless. Aware that this drift of snow was in all probability but the forerunner of another, and perhaps more disastrous one, he endeavoured to rouse the fallen man, in order that they might, if possible, seek some shelter. That shelter was not far off. There was a rough cabin or chalet, built in the rock, which was thought to be a safe retreat in such circumstances.

Unable to restore Pierre, Louis made a vigorous effort and supported him to the place of security. Having gained this refuge, he attempted to restore the unconscious man, but as he did so, the same rushing sound was heard again, louder, and louder still, with the crashing of pine trees, the wild cry of the mountain birds; the sound came nearer, it passed by; but was soon again renewed with even greater violence.

Presently Pierre recovered. He was greatly injured, and full of alarm. Even Louis had upon him an undefined dread, a dread which took a defined character when he perceived that the ice and snow, the fallen trees and masses of rock, had settled all about the chalet, blocking them in as effectually as though bolts and bars had Pierre forgot his old grudge, saw the folly of his old enmity in a new light, and, touched by the tender kindness of Louis, begged that the past might be forgiven. Of course, it was not in the heart of Louis at any time to resist such an appeal. He wrote injuries, as wise men always write them, in the dust. Now they talked together of poor Lucy—both called her by that name—and of the child who would be her only support now. But relief came. Bold hearts and willing hands found out the chalet, and the buried alive were rescued.

Where was Lucy? Driven almost to distraction, she had wandered over the most dangerous snow-passes, climbed where the eagle builds its nest and the chamois seeks its home: at last had been drawn upon them. There was no means of escape. The horror of their position presented itself to both. It fell most heavily on Pierre. There he was, with a man whom he hated, and whom he had deeply injured—alone, without food, buried alive. It is unnecessary to dwell upon what followed. For more than five days they saw no hope of rescue. The little food which Louis had with him was carefully portioned out and shared between them; but what were they to do when that was gone? And gone it was, all gone, at the end of the third day. For two days they tasted no food at all. During this time Louis had made every effort to effect some means of escape, but altogether without success; he had talked with Pierre when Pierre was rational; but his mind wandered very often—and they had become friends. Buried alive, turned her face homewards—not her new home—but her past, her old home. So they sought her there, and found her in the churchyard, the quiet resting-place of those whom she had loved. There they found her, kneeling at her father's grave, with her little child beside her. She heard her husband's voice, and, with a wild cry, ran to meet him. And what more need be said? The lost were found—the dead were raised—the clouds which were about them rolled away—and henceforth happiness was theirs. They always had one constant friend, who grew to be a gray-haired man, and whose delight it was to sit beneath their cottage porch on a summer eve, or by their blazing fire on a winter's night, and tell to some anxiously-listening group of bright-eyed children, the oft-repeated story of Buried Alive.

COBLENTZ.

COBLENTZ owes its name to its position. It is situated at the confluence of the Rhine and the Moselle, and the Romans, who built a fortress there thirteen years before the Christian era, called it Confluentia, or Confluentis. From this Latin appellation, slightly Germanised, is derived Coblentz; the name by which the town

Verdun, A.D. 843, were discussed at an imperial diet in the cathedral at Coblentz. After having formed part of the Kingdom of Lorraine, in pursuance of this treaty, Coblentz was returned to the empire of Germany in 978, by Otto the Great. During the next two centuries, though the town nominally part of the occupying the same site is now known. At the time when Antoninus wrote his "Itinerarium," the fortress contained about a thousand inhabitants. After the Romans came the Franks, whose kings built a palace at Confluentia, called Cophtlanzi. When the three sons of Louis the Debonnaire divided among themselves the empire of Charlemagne, the preliminaries of the famous treaty of hands of several possessors, the inhabitants, grown rich by their wealth and freed in mind at length they shook off the yoke of this wing of the yoke of subjection, and gave Coblentz as one of the chief centres of commerce in Germany. It is situated on a rocky ledge below Ehrenbreitstein, left about the left bank of the Moselle, where may now be traced the remains of the city walls.

Towards the end of the thirteenth century, the archbishops of Treves wished to fortify Coblenz, nominally to protect it against foreign attack, but, really, to increase their power and recover the liberties which the people had extorted from them. At first, the people were rather favourable to the project, and voted funds for the construction of an outer wall; but afterwards, seeing the snare that was laid for them, they opposed it with equal zeal. The result was, a violent insurrection, followed by a bloody war which lasted two years, and ended in the capture of the town by the archbishop, under whose successors it remained till the middle of the fourteenth century. Baudouin of Luxembourg, the last of these, agined absolute authority over the town, but was also its great benefactor. He surrounded it with fortifications; enlarged Ehrenbreitstein, then called Hermannstein; built the old bridge over the Moselle; destroyed all the castles within his territory from which the barons and knights emerged to waylay and plunder the defenceless traveller, and established peace and order throughout the district; leaving Coblenz a flourishing, if not a free town. After his death, in 1367, Coblenz experienced great alternations of fortune. During the Thirty Years' War, it was thrice taken by the Swedes, the French, and the Imperialist forces. In 1688, Boufflers, having failed to take it, reduced it to ashes. During the revolutionary war at the close of the last century, it was the chief asylum for French emigrants. In 1794 it was taken by Marceau, and made the chief town of a French department.

Since the conclusion of the peace in 1815 Coblenz has belonged to Prussia, and it now forms the capital of the Rhenish provinces, upon which France is perhaps not unfairly suspected of looking with an evil eye. The population amounts to 20,000, or, if we include Ehrenbreitstein and the garrison, 26,000. In a military point of view, Coblenz is not without importance. Since it has been united to Prussia, much has been done to render it proof against attack, and it is now considered one of the strongest defences of that side of the Prussian dominions. The fortifications, which are constructed on the most improved principles, extend over a large space, and are capable of containing as many as 100,000 men. Ehrenbreitstein, on the other side of the Rhine, which is connected with Coblenz by a bridge of boats, being also strongly fortified, adds still further to the strength of its position as a bulwark of the Prussian kingdom.

The interior of the town presents few objects of interest. The old town—that is, the part nearer the Moselle—is rather animated; but the streets are narrow, crooked, and dirty. Though the new town, which extends behind the Royal Castle—a building raised by Clement Wenceslas, the last bishop elector of Treves—has regular and straight streets, the number of persons to be seen there is so small that it appears at first sight uninhabited. But, to see Coblenz fairly, it is necessary to disembark from the steam-boat, and go behind a frightful wall, which, without answering any useful purpose, completely hides from view the quay, the Royal Castle, the government palace, splendid hotels, and fine private houses. One must also go across the bridge of boats—more than a quarter of a mile in length—and ascend the fortress of Ehrenbreitstein, on the neighbouring heights of Pfaffendorf, from either of which positions may be obtained one of the most beautiful views on the borders of the Rhine. At your feet you have the Rhine, which has only just issued from the mountains, and, joined by the Moselle, rolls along its waters, unmingled at first with its own, with graceful meanderings at the foot of smiling hills, which skirt its right bank as far as the distant chain of mountains lost in the horizon. At the junction of the two rivers Coblenz, enriched by her commerce, which is increasing every year, seems already too much confined by the limits of the fortifications. Every quarter of an hour the bridge, over which an incessant crowd of people are passing, opens, to let either a steamer or a number of towing-vessels go through. On the left you see Fort Alexander and Fort Constantine; on the right Fort Francis, which is on the left bank of the Moselle; and beyond the Moselle and the Rhine a vast plain, interspersed with villages, extending westward and northward as far as the volcanic mountains of Maifeld and Eifel. While beholding the cultivated richness of this undulating plain, one cannot help calling to mind the numerous battles which have been fought there, from the time when Caesar marched triumphantly over it, to the day when Marceau and Hoche were buried there. Byron, in his "Childe Harold," thus alludes to Coblenz:—

"By Coblenz, on a rise of gentle ground
There is a small and simple pyramid,
Crowning the summit of the verdant mound;
Beneath its base are heroes' ashes hid—
Our enemy's—but let not that forbid
Honour to Marceau! o'er whose early tomb,
Tears, big tears, gush'd from the rough soldier's lid,
Lamenting and yet envying such a doom,
Falling for France, whose rights he battled to resume.

Brief, brave, and glorious, was his young career,
His mourners were two hosts, his friends and foes,
And fitly may the stranger lingering here
Pray for his gallant spirit's bright repose;
For he was Freedom's champion, one of those,
The few in number, who had not o'erstept
The charter to chastise, which she bestows
On such as wield her weapons; he had kept
The whiteness of his soul, and thus men o'er him wept."

MY FIRST EVENING IN WALLACHIA.

BY A HUNGARIAN.

My readers will recollect the melancholy occasion on which the picked men of the Hungarian army, after the two extraordinary days of the 9th and 13th of August, 1849, were compelled to abandon all hope of liberty, and to escape the monstrous cruelty of Russia and Austria, by emigrating into Turkey. That day was a bright day for the Sultan—it was a bad day for Russia. The men who were driven by the force of Russia to seek refuge on the territories of the Turk, are those who since have drilled and organised the Turkish forces, while many of them are at this moment burning for the time when they shall come into the field against Russia. It matters not how, nor why—but I, in those days, was in the service of the Hungarian revolution.

I was at Hatzeg, just recovered from a wound, when I received the fatal intelligence of the surrender of Lazar and Török, and of the inexplicable day at Villagos. I, like all my companions, cried out with fury against the treachery of Görgey. But rage and lamentations were too late. The only thing we could do was to join General Bem. All was confusion and doubt. Some said all was over; some thought that there was falsehood in much of what was said. None would decide. I decided for myself. I had a good horse, a warm cloak, arms, and a portmanteau. I accordingly, knowing the country tolerably well, determined, alone and unassisted, to join the general and ascertain from his lips what was to be done.

Had I waited a few hours longer, I should have found that Bem was at all events trying to resist, trying to save the nation from the fearful blow it had received. I took my way towards the Iron-gate. I travelled at night, for fear of meeting with Austrians or Russians, though I chiefly dreaded the former. I succeeded in reaching the Iron-gate about twelve at night. I passed it and made for Weislowa. This city was calm and still, as if the savage dogs of war had never been loosed, and as if a nation's liberty had not been crushed under the iron heel of the ruthless Czar, against whom few in high places then cried as they do now, though he was the same ambitious despot he is now. I mistrusted the stillness, and sent my horse dashing through the streets without halting.

I soon, however, pulled up, as I found myself in the very act of falling into an Austrian corps of observation. Luckily I drew up just as the first sentry came in view, and walking my horse slowly back, I retreated into a little wood, where I chose a close thicket, fastened my horse to a tree, and took some refreshment. I found that, by standing on my horse's back and holding on to a branch, I could just see the Austrian tents. I determined, therefore, to keep very close until these fellows removed from the neighbourhood. Being an officer, my name known, and legally in the service of the empire, death awaited me if taken. I accordingly wrapped myself in my cloak, after cutting a good handful of grass for the horse, placed my pistols under my head, laid a carbine I had provided myself with by my side, and sought repose. I slept until nearly midday, when I awoke much parched, having had no drink but raw branly since I started. I knew not what to do, and was about to rise to seek for water, even in some pool, for myself and horse, when I heard the steps of a man and horse, the clanking of heavy boots, the rattling of a cavalry sword, and other alarming signs, close at hand. I cocked my gun.

"What is that?" said a voice as of one exhausted and worn out—a gentle voice too.

"A friend," I replied, recognising a Hungarian uniform, and hastening forward.

"Heaven be praised!" continued the stranger, who was sinking with exhaustion. "I have been chased ten miles by five Austrians, but a trumpet calling them, they joined some comrades."

"Some comrades," said I—"an army. The knives will bring a cloud upon us. We must to horse."

"I can go no further now," replied the stranger, who was not more than eighteen, and yet an officer; but this was nothing in Hungary, where boys did deeds of manly valour.

"But death will be our portion if taken," I said.

"I can but die once," he continued, sinking on the ground.

"What is in that gourd?" I said almost fiercely.

"Water."

I snatched it, drank a draught—oh, how delicious to my parched lips!—and then held it to those of my companion, this time mixed with the coarse brandy of the country. The stranger would have resisted, but his strength was gone, and I forced the liquid down his throat. I then moved away and watched, for I heard the Austrians moving. But it was the whole division and in the direction of the Iron-gate.

I returned to my companion; he lay still upon the ground, and I understood he asked for food. I gave him bread, meat, and a knife. He began slowly to eat, and as his strength revived, I thought I had never seen so handsome a youth. The small Kossuth hat, the hussar uniform, set off to advantage a regular and rather effeminate visage, on which there was not even a sign of down. He explained that, having fled from Lagose, he too was proceeding to join Bem, when a patrol of Austrians with a sham flag of truce chased him, and drove him to this extremity. Having said thus much, he wrapped himself in his cloak and went to sleep.

I woke him immediately it was dusk, and saddling both horses, assisted him to mount, and away we sped towards the point where we believed Bem to be. We avoided towns and villages; we halted before turning a corner. We were making for Kavanscher.

In the middle of the night we found a roadside inn, and here we heard for the first time that all was over, and that all those who had to dread Siberia or the gallows from the tender mercies of Russia and Austria had determined on emigrating to Turkey, convinced that the Turks would treat us far better than either of the two emperors. This was horrible—this was fatal news.

"What is to be done?" I said wildly.

"Go to Turkey," replied my companion, gently.

"But how?"

"By what means we can. On!"

And the young man struck his spurs in his horse's flanks, and led the way. It was a stupendous journey for two men to perform, across the mountains of Moraul, the volcanic ridges of the Carpathians, up hill and down dale. But death by the Austrian hangman was worse, and we neither of us then or now utterly despaired of Hungary.

We took still more care than ever to avoid any communication with the people about this part, they being that slavish peasantry called the Mantzen, who are so attached to Austria; but that morning we found a hut, where a man, recognising us as Hungarians, cheerfully offered to give us shelter. My companion hesitated, and shook his head. I laughed at his fears, and he agreed to chance it. We accordingly locked our horses in a small out-house, after giving them food which we paid for, and went up into a kind of loft to rest. We wrapped ourselves in our cloaks, saw that our primings were all right, and laying our heads on a bundle of straw, slept.

I was awake at last by the sound of several voices conversing in a mysterious whisper. I moved not, but I listened. We were in a room which could only be approached by a ladder; it was steep; at its foot were about a dozen of the rascally Mantzen discussing who should go up first. I had my pair of American pistols, which I brought over in 1847 from America. I cocked one and peered through a crack. They were eleven men, armed with knives, old pistols, pikes, while two held cords to tie us with.

I rose to my feet with a bound, rushed to the head of the stairs, and fired my five discharges as rapidly as possible. Yells and roars succeeded, and then the house was cleared. My companion was by my side; we rushed down stairs, and I again led fly at the retreating crowd. Four were severely wounded, amongst whom was our treacherous host; I could not but feel glad that his case was hopeless. We then walked out into the open air, and while I levelled my trusty carbine at the scoundrels, my companion brought out our horses. We mounted, and giving the fellows another volley, rode off.

We sought no more hospitality after that. When in force, we took food and paid for it.

One day we were in the mountains, climbing a rocky path, when, suddenly reaching the crest of a hill, we saw beneath our feet a small army—hussars in front, a carriage next, a staff, several carriages, some infantry, and then two squadrons of hussars. We knew what it was: it was the sad remnant of Hungary's heroes. The reader may imagine our hurry to descend the hill, which we did by a mountain path that brought us out on the road ahead of the army. We were in an instant made prisoners, and taken back to the front carriage, in which sat a man in a gray blue coat, with gold embroidery, torn by bullets and sabres, with a Kossuth hat on his head. It was Bem.

"Good day, lieutenant," said he to me, and then his eyes dilated with surprise: "Miss Katerina B—, have you escaped?"

"Miss!" I exclaimed, wild with surprise, while my companion smiled and blushed, and the old general and his staff laughed heartily at my unfeigned astonishment.

I was overwhelmed with confusion, but it would have been pleasant to remark the change in my manner to my companion in misfortune. I treated her at once as a woman, and was rejoiced when she joined a party of refugee ladies. I then heard that, after joining the army with her brother and father, she was, by the death of them, left alone in the world; she would not leave the army, and her sex and courage had been universally respected.

Our journey over those hills, through the Carpathian mountains, those glorious scenes, our dangers, and our difficulties, are historical. At last we crossed the Turkish frontier, were welcomed gladly by the peasantry and authorities; and will the reader be surprised to learn, considering her forlorn position in that country, that I found a priest, and was married to my present good and gentle wife, on the very first evening I spent in Wallachia?

SKETCHES OF DOGS BY LANDSEER.

THE JEALOUS DOG.

"O, beware, my lord, of jealousy;
It is the green-eyed monster which doth make
The meat it feeds on."

IAGO was right for once. Nothing makes a man more wretched, feel more unutterable terror, and do more absurd or abominable things, than jealousy. When it once takes possession of the mind, all happiness is for ever gone; the world becomes accursed, life a burden too bitter to be borne. Man delights not, nor woman either. Jealousy plays strange pranks with mortals. You go to tea with the friend of your bosom, merely to talk a little scandal and eat a few muffins, when, somehow or other, the green-eyed monster steps in uninvited, and you hurry from the room with an indignant step and an aching heart. You take your adored Julia (to whom you have written so many sonnets, for whom you have gone to so much expense—to Brighton or Wind-or, for a day's fresh air, and in the same carriage sits a fine gentlemanly young fellow with the clear skin and handsome features which all women love to see; and because he pays your adored some few attentions, which she receives with the mild coquetry that is part and parcel of female human nature, you sit fuming all the while, execrating the trip, wishing you had stopped at home, thinking your charmer the most heartless of her sex, and all the while consigning the innocent cause of offence to a locality unmentionable to ears polite. Can our readers forget the little tea-party at Dotheboys' Hall, in the absence of the respected proprietor thereof? It is a fine specimen of jealousy, Nicholas Nickleby, Miss Squeers, Miss Price, and her betrothed, John Brodie, sit down to a game at cards. Miss Price becomes the partner of Nicholas. The immortal Boz shall tell the rest:—

“The deal fell to Nicholas and the hand prospered.

“We intend to win everything,” said he, clenched fist, as if to keep his hand in till he had an opportunity of exercising it upon the features of some other gentleman. And Miss Squeers tossed her head with such indignation, that the gust of wind raised by the multitudinous curls in motion nearly blew the candle out.

“I never had such luck, really!” exclaimed, coquettishly, Miss Price, after another hand or two. “It is all along of you, Mr. Nickleby, I think. I should like to have you for a partner always.”

“I wish you had.”

“You’ll have a bad wife, though, if you always win at cards,” said Miss Price.

“Not if your wish is gratified,” replied Nicholas. “I am sure I shall have a good one in that case.”

“To see how Miss Squeers tossed her head and the corn-factor flattened his nose while this conversation was carrying on. It would

THE JEALOUS DOG.

“Tilda has won something she didn’t expect, I think; haven’t you, dear?” said Miss Squeers, maliciously.

“Only a dozen and eight, love,” replied Miss Price, affecting to take the question in a literal sense.

“How did you are to-night?” sneered Miss Squeers.

“No, indeed,” replied Miss Price; “I am in excellent spirits. I was thinking you seemed out of sorts.”

“Me?” cried Miss Squeers, biting her lips, and trembling with very jealousy. “Oh, no!”

“That’s well,” remarked Miss Price. “Your hair’s coming out of curl, dear.”

“Never mind me,” muttered Miss Squeers; “you had better attend to your partner.”

“Thank you for reminding her,” said Nicholas; “so she had.”

“The Yorkshireman flattened his nose once or twice with his

have been worth a small annuity to have beheld that, let alone Miss Price’s evident joy at making them jealous, and Nicholas Nickleby’s happy unconsciousness of making anybody uncomfortable.”

So much for jealousy in the human animal. The jealousy of Othello takes a grander form: the jealousy of Miss Squeers is that of common every-day life. The one is tragedy, the other is a farce. This ends in a cry, that in blood. The one is a summer cloud, the other a thunder-storm with death and desolation in its track. Little natures can feel the one, only colossal ones the other. But in its mildest form it is an unpleasant companion. It makes your tea sour and your muffin indigestible. It spoils your good looks and the amusements of the evening. Oh, reader, beware of jealousy — we must quote Shakspeare again — “it is the green-eyed monster which makes the meat it feeds on.”

Now for jealousy in dogs. In general it is as irrational as that of the Smiths and Jones's of real life. Can we say more? For instance, as our artist has put it. A young girl, innocent of more dangerous objects of attraction at present, or, as Macaulay sings, with “Fair young face that had not learned

To blush at gaze of man,” is surrounded by her darling pets: a kitten full of liveliness and play; a cat all maternal affection; a monkey disposed, as monkeys generally are, to make themselves as agreeable as they possibly can, in this respect, at least, showing how different they are to men. Why should they not all be happy—happy as the family of birds and beasts exhibited daily to an admiring public in Trafalgar-square? Happy as we are all to be in Mr. Robert Owen's New Moral World? Why not? we repeat. The answer is soon given if we look at the picture. There is a dog—certainly not the sort of angry and jealous as he is, has no cause for it. The maiden will not pet him the less nor love him the less. She would be glad if, instead of snarling and showing his teeth and making the monkey uncomfortable, he would join them in their play, and be happy whilst he can, and make the best of the little span of time he calls his life. But he will not do so, absurd jealousy prevents him. Why the dog is almost as foolish as many men. Let us now turn to our second engraving, which represents

THE LIFE PRESERVER.

“Oh, whether are we driven o'er the waters so free,
With the vapours all around and the breakers on our lee?
Not a light is in the sky, not a light is on the sea.
Ah me! ah me!
We are hurried to our doom. Oh, how wild and how strong
Are the billows on whose bosom we are heaving along!
And the tempest he is calling (hark, how terrible his song!)
For thee, for me.”

dog a girl should love, but ladies do take strange things to their bosoms at times—a dog of ill-breeding and sadly degenerate, that gets jealous because every one else is happy, and that cannot forgive its little mistress her unintentional neglect, and he shows his ill-nature by venting it on Jacko, who has done nothing to deserve it beyond, perhaps, playing off—as monkeys are wont to do—a harmless practical joke. It is a sad thing such dogs exist. It is a pity that dogs cannot rise superior to such petty feelings, and take more comprehensive views of life. “Love to beings,” said Edwards—and Godwin repeated it in his “Political Justice,” a book which was to have upset the world, but which now sells for waste paper—is virtue.” Evidently the dog of our picture does not think so. He takes a very different view of virtue. It simply consists in love to himself. We fear the idea is too common. That it is not confined to dogs, but extends to men as well. Yet the dog,

The thunder is awakened—he is talking to the night,
And see what cometh flooding down in catracts of light,
’Tis his paramour, the lightning—she withereth my sight,
Ah me! ah me!

So sings Barry Cornwall. We can almost riddle the scene. The stout strong ship drifting away without aid for dismasted, robbed of all her finery, an utter wreck—despair in the faces of her crew, some of whom curse, some of whom pray, and some of whom drink in intoxication to forget the terror of the hour and to defy the destroyer Death. When that good ship was launched, it was on a bright summer day. Thousands came to see the sight. Beautiful the shape of woman, named her; and canvas tacked, and planks waved, and drums beat, and the people cheered, as she sailed her way to the element on which to a time she came to separate, and so to fly to float. And then, with a cog-iron and a rudder with seamen known for experience and skill, and with passengers hopefully leaving the old land, where competition is rife and everything valuable but man, for more congenial climes, she gaily left the port as if danger was an idle dream. But the storm came, and the giant waves arose in their fury, and nearer and nearer came the black, iron-bound coast, to touch which was death, and the gallant bark became a hideous wreck.

"Then rose from sea to sky the wild farewell;
Then shriek'd the timid and stood still the brave;
Then some leap'd overboard with dreadful yell,
As eager to anticipate their grave;
And the sea yawned around them as a hell."

It is the hour of the power of death. There is no hope. Heaven and earth alike seem to refuse their pity and their aid. The only answer to the prayer of the dying, as one after another they are swept away, is the roar of the everlasting sea, as sullenly and relentlessly—spurring neither sex nor age, neither the tenderness of woman, man in his prime, nor the gray hairs of age—it vents its irresistible rage. Like death, you can never satiate the sea. Its cry is still, "More!" Down in its deep lie the loved, the beautiful, the young—the great, the pure, the good. It has gathered to itself, and holds with a miser's clutch, the gems of art, the treasures of nations, the jewels of imperial diadems. Oh, what a revelation will that be, when the command shall go forth, and the sea shall give up its dead!

But the wreck to which we have referred shall yet have its chronicle. One victim is snatched from the jaws of death. The sacrifice of life is not complete. One escapes the common lot. The dog, faithful to his master when all other ties are broken, when all other obligations are torn asunder, rescues him from a watery grave. Possibly just as he was sinking, just as he had become helpless and weary, his faithful companion bears him to safety and life once more. Such cases are not isolated: we have heard of them times without number. They teach us that, if man be but little lower than the angels, many of the animals in faithfulness and courage are but little below man.

And so our hero is once more restored to life. He lies there all unconscious and seemingly dead. But life will come back to him; the red blood will dance in his veins as of old; he will wake up as from a fearful dream. Once more he will rejoice himself in the light of the sun and in the society of his fellows; the world, with its charms, will appear to him as attractive as ever. In a short time, it may be that all the terrors of the scene through which he has passed may be completely erased from his mind. Such is human nature. "What a piece of work is man!"

Men who have been on the point of drowning, and have been saved just before the silver cord was loosened and life became extinct, have told us that in the last moments, before consciousness was gone, all the buried past rose before them in all the reality and majesty of life. Then came back to them childhood with its innocence, the mother with her love, the father with his manly care, the brotherly companionship, the sisterly caress. Then came back to them the passionate love of early youth, the very smiles and words perhaps of one long sleeping in her quiet grave. All that they had ever thought, or felt, or done, or said, seemed at that moment to come back to them at once. If we remember aright, De Quincy states that this was the case with him, in his "Confessions." One moment seems sufficient for the review of a life. With what a lightning glance must the mind review the past! We don't forget things; we only bury them. They lie in our hearts awaiting a re-errection morn. And that body snatched from death has just passed through such a crisis. Out in that roaring sea, with angry winds singing in his ears, or the shrieks of the dying borne onward on the gale, he may have heard the village bells of his boyhood sounding for Christian worship; or he may have listened to his mother's voice; or it may be that his own little ones, sleeping safe on shore, may have come and whispered in his ears; or that in fancy he may have clasped once more to his bosom the wife of his youth, and he may have sunk down pleasantly, with peace in his heart and a smile upon his lip, forgetful all the while of the death following in his wake. Drowning men, we are told, have Elysian dreams.

Well, it is to be hoped that the seemingly lifeless corpse here may find the waking up equally pleasant, and that he will honour the noble animal to whom he is indebted for his life in a fitting manner. That dog should be kept in clover for the rest of his days; he should wear a brass collar; he should be introduced to the best company; he should become an honorary member of the Royal Humane Society; his portrait should appear in the Royal Exhibition. Why not? Every dog has his day.

In conclusion, our engraving suggests two remarks. Our first is, that Horace was right when he says, that he was a bold man who first trusted himself at sea. Our second is more practical. When you do go to sea, be sure and take a Life Preserver with you. If it be possible, let it be a fine powerful dog, such as we have engraved.

PORTSMOUTH DOCKYARD.

Of all the interesting sights in and about Portsmouth, perhaps there is none so interesting as this immense establishment; and yet perhaps none is so difficult to describe or to convey an idea of in print as this same dock-yard. Wherever we turn there is something to strike us with wonder. The great dimensions of everything around; the yard itself seeming like a manufacturing town; the immense ships upon the stocks in course of building; the anchors lying along in a continuous line of five or six abreast, and of some 400 or 500 feet in length, and some of them weighing upwards of five tons; cables to match these anchors, some of them the thickness of a man's waist; the masts lying along the floor of the Mast-house, showing themselves in their true size, no longer looking the slender rods we fancy them when seen in the ships; while the "tops," those small (?) platforms placed at the junction of the lower mast and the top-mast, upon which it has often made us giddy to see sailors standing, we now find to be large enough for a very comfortable quadrille. Everything seems magnified. "Manning the yards," too, we had always looked upon as a species of tight-rope performance; to see the sailors standing upright on these mere bits of stick, as they appear, and never falling off, seemed wonderful. But that is over now. We saw at the dock-yard several of these yards lying about. Wonderful to stand upright on those great beams of timber! Nonsense!—we could trot a horse along a considerable portion of their length, and think no great things of our horsemanship after all.

But let us proceed with our inspection of the different departments of this truly wonderful establishment.

Close to the entrance gate is situated the Mast-house. Here, as its name implies, the immense masts of which we have spoken above are made, and also the yards, bowsprits, etc., for ships. These yards and masts are of necessity made of several separate pieces of timber, which are accurately joined together and then hooped with iron, the hoops being put on while hot, so that the contraction of the metal on cooling compresses the whole forcibly together. Hanging up in the Mast-house, the lovers of relics may feast their eyes upon what, with this official guarantee, we suppose we must consider to be a genuine piece of the wreck of the Royal George, sunk at Spithead on the 29th August, 1782. We say we suppose this to be genuine, and as such must look upon it as a rarity; for it is a pretty well-established fact, that enough walking-sticks, snuff-boxes, and other articles have been manufactured from "genuine pieces of the wreck of the Royal George" to build two or three ships of the size of that vessel. However, whether this be genuine or not matters, we suspect, but little; there are things awaiting our inspection far more interesting than any old weather-beaten log of wood, though it were proved to be a genuine relic of the Argo itself, with a bit of the Golden Fleece to be seen adhering to it.

Leaving the Mast-house and proceeding to the left—or, if our readers prefer our speaking geographically—to the west, we see an extensive pile of buildings, upon the top of which is a lofty round tower, surmounted by a semaphore. This instrument—a really interesting relic now—something to show us what telegraphs were before the very lightning was made to carry our thoughts along the magic wire; this instrument, we say, still may be seen throwing its arms out in the strangest forms, as if declaiming fiercely against electricity for taking away its business, while it telegraphs messages to the shipping in the harbour and at Spithead (for which purpose it is now employed), and defies the electric wire to interfere with that. The pile of buildings beneath the semaphore consists chiefly of the Rigging-house and the Sail-maker's loft.

In the former of these we see the workmen busily engaged in fixing together the various ropes, blocks, and all the infinite varieties of articles comprised under the name of rigging. There are, also, stores here, where the "fitted rigging" is kept, to be ready when required.

In the Sail-maker's loft we see the canvas cut out, sewn together, bound, the ropes sewn around the edge of the sail; and, in fact, the whole business of sail-making. Here, too, the same feeling of bigness seizes the mind, and the men sitting down sewing these immense masses of canvas with a needle and thick twine, struck us as being in most admirable keeping with the rest of the establishment. Here, as everywhere else, we might fancy the workmen a race of Gullivers who had fallen somehow amongst the Brobdingnagian workshops, and the group before us seemed to have picked up some fair lady's needlework, on which they were engaged with all their might. In one room we saw a lot of boys stitching away—these, we were informed, were naval apprentices, who were sent there to learn to sew and to mend sails—a very requisite accomplishment sometimes. In this same building there are also stores of sails, each ship's canvas being stowed away by itself, with the name of the ship to which it belongs painted over it.

Near to this building is the "testing machine"—a powerful hydraulic press used for testing the chain-cables, mooring-chains, etc. The chain-cable store is also close by. Here we witnessed the process by which chains, which have become rusty, are cleaned. It consists simply in putting them into a revolving cylinder, together with several small pieces of iron of different shapes; the cylinder being then set in motion by a steam-engine, the chain and the bits of iron so rub over and over against each other that the rust is rubbed off, and falls through small holes in the cylinder. The noise made by the immense chain rolling about in the hollow cylinder is absolutely deafening, and let any one wearing a good coat beware how he goes within some yards of it—unless he wishes to be covered with the rust.

Leaving this corner of the dock-yard, we pass on between some more storehouses, until we come out not far from the Mast-house we have before visited, then walking onward towards the interior of the yard we see on our right a long building, along the side of which are arranged the gigantic anchors, of which we have spoken. This building is the rope-house. It measures 1,097 feet in length, and the floors being very low, the perspective, as we look from one end to the other, seems absolutely interminable. Here, in different stories, we see the hemp spun into yarn, and the yarn again twisted into ropes or strands, and these again into cables, of all sizes. The effect of these ropes, with the men at work on them at the extreme end of this long building, is very strange.

Before, however, the yarn is twisted into ropes, it has to be thickly coated with tar. This is effected in the tarring-house close by. On entering here the smell of the tar is almost overpowering to the visitor. The workmen, however, who are breathing that atmosphere for several hours in the course of the day, seem not at all to mind it; one, indeed, assured us that he liked it very much. The yarn is brought from the rope-house wound on reels, from which it is unwound on to other reels by steam-power, passing on its way through a large cistern of boiling tar. Each workman manages two reels at a time; holding some hemp in each of his hands he grasps the yarn, and thus wipes off the superfluous tar, and at the same time guides the yarn properly on the reel.

Still proceeding in a northerly direction from the tarring-house we pass the docks, where we see the ships which are in course of repair. These docks are provided with immense flood-gates, which are closed when the ship is brought into dock, and the water is then pumped out by means of large chain-pumps worked by steam. The ship while in dock is kept in an upright position by propping it in every part with large pieces of timber against the sides of the dock, which follow the outline of the ship.

Just beyond these docks we come to a department of peculiar interest, from the beautiful machinery to be seen working there. We allude to the block-making machinery. Here we see the numerous blocks, or pulleys, used in the rigging of a ship, made in all their parts, from the rough-hewn timber to the finished block. The whole of the varied and intricate processes by which the peculiar shape of each block is given to it, are effected by the different machines in this building. A seventy-four-gun ship requires no less than 1,430 blocks of various sizes, the whole of which can be made at this establishment if necessary in one day, by the aid of the machinery we have mentioned, with the superintendence of only four men. In one part of the building we see circular saws driven at an immense velocity; a solid piece of timber is presented to the saw, and is almost instantly cut up into square pieces the size required for the block. Another machine then turns this square piece into the shape required. Others again make the groove in the block for the reception of the rope by which it is to be fastened to the rigging; cut out the space or spaces in the centre of the block for the "sheaves" (the wheels of the pulley); bore holes for the pins of the sheaves to go through; and, in fact, as we have said before, from the rough wood turn out a finished block. Several of these machines are in principle the same as the lathes, but the peculiar shapes required to be given to the different parts of the block, of course necessitate the application of apparatus very different from that employed in ordinary turning. It is in this which makes the machinery so beautiful. We see the great blocks whirling round with such velocity, the splinters and dust flying away in all directions, and the cutting tools eating their way into the very heart of the block, as though nothing but the absolute cutting away of the whole mass could stay their progress. We feel that another moment and the block must be cut completely through; but at the instant we see the operation stopped as if by magic, and the block turned out with exactly the amount, to a hair's breadth, cut from it that was requisite. In another part of the building are the different lathes for turning and shaping the sheaves. These are made of lignum vita, the hardest wood that can be procured, and they are turned, grooved, and polished, with a precision which only machinery could attain. In the centre of the sheaves, where the pin goes through, a socket of brass is let in. The machine for cutting the groove for this socket is very beautiful; so perfectly and exactly does it cut it to fit the brass. When the brass socket is fitted to it, the whole is placed in a kind of lathe to be planed and polished. Here the same tool cuts away both the wood and the brass, never exerting too much force, so as to cut too deeply in the softer part, and never lacking force to cut quite deep enough when operating upon the metal. Then there are machines for smoothing and polishing the iron pins which form the axes of the pulleys. All these different machines are driven by a steam-engine of thirty two horse power. Close to the block-making machinery is a large sawing-house, where circular and vertical saws may be seen constantly at work, cutting up large pieces of timber into planks of any thickness required, and with an almost surprising rapidity. These saws, like all the rest of the machinery, are worked by steam, and with such precision do they work that the planks seem scarcely to require the carpenter's plane.

From this department we walk on and view the building slips. Here we see the vessels in course of construction and in every stage of their progress. We went inside of one of these—a vessel of 120 guns. She had only her principal timbers laid down, the decks not having been put in nor any of the framework finished. To describe this sight—or rather the feeling it inspired—when we were standing, as it were, within the skeleton of this mighty monster of the deep, would be no easy task. It seemed indeed to us more like the skeleton of some great animal than anything else we could compare it to. The keel, running right along the centre, made of so many pieces of timber, formed a very fair representative of some gigantic vertebrae; while on both sides, throughout its whole extent, sprang out the timbers of its sides—the ribs of the great creature.

Further on we come to the Anchor-smiths' shop. Here is a new scene of wonder: the dark, grimy, smoky atmosphere of the place, relieved every here and there by the fierce glowing of the forge fires, as they are acted upon by the enormous bellows; then the dim outlines of the workmen, as they are seen moving about through the mist and smoke that hangs over the whole; the immense masses of iron heated almost to incandescence; and the sounds of the ponderous hammers striking these masses, and shooting off thousands of brilliant sparks in every direction—a perfect pyrotechnic display. The steam hammer is well worthy of notice, as an instance of the perfect subjection under which the giant steam is held by man. This enormous hammer can be made to descend upon the iron placed beneath it with a force of ten tons at every stroke; and yet so docile is it, that it can be made to crack a nut without injuring the kernel. And from these two extremes it can be regulated to strike with any amount of force required to the most exact nicety. Anchors, bolts, and other wrought-iron work are forged in this department; and the visitor is shown how the old scrap iron is tied up in bundles, placed in the furnace, and then forged at the hammer for new uses.

Near to the Anchor-smiths' Shop is the New Steam basin, a very large basin used for the repairing of steam-vessels, of which it is capable of containing a very great number. It is a handsomely constructed basin, faced with granite, and having dry docks attached to it, in which steamers undergo repairs that could not be done in the basin. Some very large steamers are often to be seen in course of repairing.

Not far off is a very handsome new range of buildings devoted to the Steam Engine Factory. Here, as the name implies, the various parts of steam engines are constructed. It is a curious sight. Large masses of iron are turned in lathes, as if they were the softest wood; holes are drilled in immense plates of the same metal with the most perfect facility; and a piece of iron is smoothed by means of a plane, the shavings curling up and falling off, just as we see them at the carpenter's bench. In fact, we see in this factory iron, copper, brass—anything, in short—cut up, bored through, smoothed, and planed, as though the hardness or softness of the material worked upon were immaterial to the mighty agent which sets the machines in motion.

And well might it be so, when we look at this agent itself. A large steam-engine works in an engine-house near to the factory, and gives motion to all the various machinery within it. This engine, which is the largest in the dock-yard, is one of Boulton and Watts' construction. It is of eighty-horse power, has a seven-foot stroke, and the fly wheel measures twenty-one feet, six inches in diameter and weighs twenty-five tons.

Some very extensive smiths' shops are erected close to this engine-house by Messrs. Fox, Henderson, and Co., the well-known contractors for the Exhibition building. The roof is supported by iron columns, in which we see the same principle carried out as that employed in the Crystal Palace, the columns being hollow, so as to carry off the drainage from the roof.

The foundry is an interesting sight. Some of the metal castings are of great size, as they must be to be employed in the immense ships for which they are designed.

Returning from the northern part of the yard, and observing a new battery recently erected, where guns are mounted for the defence of that portion of the establishment, we pass the residences of the principal officers of the establishment. There is, also, here an extensive pile of buildings used as a school of naval architecture, a chapel, a surgery, etc.

In addition to the varied objects we have thus endeavoured to point out, there are innumerable store-houses filled with the various stores required for the naval service; large cisterns, in which the timber is boiled or steamed before using it; immense stacks of timber in course of seasoning, all marked with the description of the wood, and the date when stacked; joiners' shops, carvers' shops, blacksmiths' shops; a canvas shed, where the canvas for hat-way-cloths, hammocks, etc. is painted; boat-houses and boat-ponds, where boats are kept in constant readiness for use. And at almost every corner of the yard are those most important articles—fire-engines and buckets.

Our space, however, warns us that we must quit the dockyard. We have done our best to convey an idea of the numerous and varied processes carried on there. We have felt the difficulty of describing these processes with anything like completeness; still, if we have conveyed any notion of how matters are managed in this great national establishment—if we have imparted to this article any portion of the interest which an inspection of the place cannot fail to afford—our visit to the Portsmouth Dock-yard has not been quite in vain.

CARDINAL BEAUFORT'S CHANTRY IN WINCHESTER CATHEDRAL.

WINCHESTER CATHEDRAL.

WINCHESTER is one of the few cities in England at the present day, to which one may safely apply the epithet, invulnerable. A large cluster of ennobling memories seems to have settled upon that ancient place. Its history can be traced up to the time of the Britons. The Romans built many edifices in it, in the second century of the Christian era. The monarchs of the West Saxons, in the days of the heptarchy, made it their capital, and spent large sums in embellishing it; though their works were frequently destroyed by the ravages of the Danes. Egbert, the first king of all England, was crowned in it; so was William Rufus, and so was the lion-hearted Richard, when he came back from the holy war. Most of the monarchs of that day left London at Christmas and Easter, and here celebrated both these festivals in great state. Here Henry V. held his parliament before embarking at Southampton to spread terror and devastation through France. Here Queen Maud, being greatly pressed by her rival, Stephen, spread abroad the report that she was dead, and disposing her fair limbs in a coffin, was carried safe and sound through the midst of the besieging army. Here, too, a gallant army of cavaliers shut themselves up in 1642, and held the town and castle against the roundheads for a long time, till being driven out by Sir William Waller, one of old Noll's generals, the fortress was destroyed, all except the chapel.

The castle and chapel were both famous places. In the chapel Hubert, the pope's legate, sat as judge, in 1072, in the dispute between the rival sees of Canterbury and York, and awarded the supremacy to the former, from that time forward and for evermore; and when the castle disappeared, the assizes were held here; and still are the Nisi Prius judges sitting under the identical round table at which the famous knights of Prince Arthur sat and feasted, and quaffed their sack, and passed their quips, and cracks, and gibes, and jests, goodness knows how long ago. What a revolution! Mr. Sergeant Ponderous supporting a denurrer, or moving for a rule nisi, against some lawless railway company, with his horsehair rubbing against the spot whereon Sir Lambert du Lake, Sir Tristrain, Sir Pelleux, Sir Gawain, Sir Gareth, etc. satisfied the cravings of their knightly appetites.

Nor was the place less famed for piety and learning than for warlike renown. It had, it is said, fifty parish churches at one time, of which only a very small number remain. An abbey, too, there was, renowned for its sanctity and wealth, and so early as 1300, John Pontissard, of pious memory, bishop of the diocese, founded a college, dedicated to St. Elizabeth of Hungary, which, however, was destroyed in the general wreck of religious houses consequent upon the change of creed of Henry VIII.

But none of these edifices could compare to the abbey and cathedral. The present edifice was commenced in 1079 by Bishop Walkelyn, a Norman, improved and enlarged by the good William of Wykeham, and finally retouched by Bishop Fox. The convent consisted of a prior and forty-two monks, and flourished in splendour for nearly nine hundred years, until it was dissolved by Henry VIII., who instituted the present foundation, and dedicated it to the Holy Trinity. The length of this splendid fabric from east to west is five hundred and forty-five feet; of these Our Lady's chapel includes fifty-four, and the choir one hundred and thirty-six. The length from the iron door, near the entrance of the choir, to the porch at the west end, is three hundred and fifty-one feet; the length of the transepts is a hundred and eighty-six feet; the breadth of the body below the transepts is eighty-seven feet, and of the choir forty. The vaulting in the inside is twenty-six feet high; the exact height of the tower is one hundred and thirty-eight feet and a half, and its breadth fifty feet by forty-eight. The prospect from the west end of the middle aisle to the east window, beyond the choir, is striking and impressive in the highest degree. It needs but to be once seen to make evident the wonderful adaptation of the Gothic architecture to the production of those feelings of reverence and solemnity and sublimity which are closely akin to religious awe.

The republican soldiers under Sir William Waller played sad havoc with several of the rich decorations of the interior, but enough survived, and enough has since been added, to make it one of the grandest monuments which England contains, of the piety, taste, and enthusiasm of our ancestors.

Behind the altar is the royal vault, which contains the bones of the Saxon kings, and one or two Danish and Norman. Canute and William Rufus, the Conqueror's son, lie side by side. The latter was brought, a bleeding and "unwholesome carcase," in a peasant's cart from the New Forest, where Tyrrel shot him, and was here buried silently and without ceremony.

The church contains several chantries, the erection of piety, or gratitude, or affection. That of Cardinal Beaufort, which we have chosen for illustration, is probably more remarkable than any, not only for its own intrinsic beauty, but for the many historical reminiscences which surround the name of its founder. We shall describe it in the words of Mr. Britton:

"Beaufort's chantry consists of clustered piers, with a pannelled screen at the base, an open screen at the head or west end, and a closed screen at the east end. There are doors on the north and south sides, and the whole is surmounted by a mass of canopies, niches, and pinnacles, which bewilder the sight and senses by their number and complexity. Beneath this gorgeous canopy is an altar-tomb in the centre of the enclosure, with the statue, . . . Milner says, 'that the figure represents Beaufort in the proper dress of a cardinal—viz., the scarlet coat and hat, and long depending cords, ending in tassels of ten knots each.' The low balustrade and tomb, the latter of which is lined with copper, and was formerly adorned on the outside with the arms of the deceased, enlaced on shields, are of gray marble. The pious tenor of his will, which was signed two days before his death, and the placid frame of his features in the figure before us, which is probably a portrait, lead us to discredit the fictions of poets and painters, who describe him as dying in despair.' Regarding the statue, Mr. Britton says in another place, 'The effigy of Beaufort is a vulgar, clumsy piece of workmanship, even worse than its near neighbour, that of Sir John Clobery. We cannot otherwise account for the extreme badness of this statue than by supposing that it was placed there at a time much later than the building of the chantry, indeed since the Reformation. It seems rather the workmanship of a stonemason than of a sculptor.'

It would be an unpardonable omission to dismiss the subject of the chantry without saying a word or two as to the cardinal himself, especially since Shakspeare has immortalised him, in his drama of "Henry VI." He is there, however, represented as the very pink of insolent priests, proud, luxurious, covetous, and a despiser of the truths he professed to teach. In the very first scene in the play, Gloucester is made to say to him:—

——— "Thou lov'st the flesh,
And ne'er throughout the year to church thou go'st,
Except it be to pray against thy foes."

Further on we meet with him in a brawl on Tower-hill, in which Gloucester calls him "a pil'd priest," "a manifest conspirator, who gave indulgences to rogues," "a Winchester goose," "a wol in sheep's array," "a scarlet hypocrite;" and the bishop, with rather unbecoming warmth for a man of his cloth, threatens "to have Gloucester's heart's blood." In the third act, in the parliament-house scene, Gloucester sums up his character as follows:—

"Presumptuous priest! this place commands my patience,
Or thou should'st find thou hast dishonour'd me.
Think not, although in writing I preferred
The manner of thy vile outrageous crimes,
That therefore I have forg'd or am not able Urbatum to rehearse the method of my pen;
No, prelate; such is thy audacious wickedness,
Thy lewd, pestiferous, and discentious pranks,
As very infants prattle of thy pride,
Thou art a most pernicious usurer;
Froward by nature, enemy to peace;
Lascivious, wanton, more than well becomes
A man of thy profession and degree."

* Britton's "History and Antiquities of the See and Cathedral Church of Winchester," pp. 95, 96. † p. 81.

The general opinion now is, however, that the poet, taking Holinshed for his sole authority, did the prelate wrong. Proud, ambitious, and ostentatious he was, no doubt; but these are vices too common amongst men in power to warrant us in picturing the cardinal as a monster of undiluted iniquity. The times he lived in were turbulent; men's ideas of right and wrong had not yet assumed that fixity they now have. The duties of ministers of religion were not so clearly defined as they now are. The assumption of the cowl did not necessarily involve a real and veritable repudiation of worldly cares and pursuits. High-born priests of rank were still turbulent barons; base-born priests of no rank were often drunken, ignorant louts.

Beaufort was the son of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, by his third wife, Catherine Swinford. He studied law at Oxford, and afterwards at Aix-la-Chapelle, but on entering the church, his royal extraction procured his speedy elevation to the prelacy. In 1397, he was appointed to the see of Lincoln; 1404, we find him Lord Chancellor of England, and Bishop of Winchester. He had been three times Lord Chancellor by 1417, and some idea may be formed of his wealth from the fact that he lent the king Henry V., his nephew, twenty thousand pounds—an immense sum in those days—to assist in carrying on the war against France, for which he received the crown as security. He was sent on various important state missions to the Continent, and was present at the Council of Constance. His influence in England was at this time all powerful. He was appointed one of the guardians of the young king, Henry VI., during his minority, and in 1421, was a fourth time Lord Chancellor.* In the year 1425, however, the dissensions between him and Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, the Protector, which ended in the death and ruin of the latter, and which agitated all England, first came to a head. Their first outbreak is thus quaintly described by Holinshed: "Somewhat before this season fell a great division in the realm of England, which of a sparkle like to have grown to a great flame. For whether the Bishop of Winchester, called Henry Beaufort, son to John, Duke of Lancaster, by his third wife, envied the authority of Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, Protector of the realm; or whether the duke disdained the riches and pompous estate of the bishop; sure it is that the whole realm was troubled with them and their partakers; so that the citizens of London were faine to keep daile and nightlie watches, and to shut up their shops for fear of that which was doubted to have ensued of their assembling of people about them." To decide their differences, the bishop called upon the Duke of Bedford, his nephew, then Regent of France, to arbitrate between them. The latter came over, but shifted the responsibility off his own shoulders by calling an assembly of the nobility at St. Alban's, known as the Pachina of Bats, because the partizans of either party came to the spot armed with clubs, weapons of steel being forbidden them. The duke, however, compromised the matter by taking the great seal from his uncle and handing it over to the Protector. On his return to France, Beaufort accompanied him as far as Calais, and in the church of that town received a cardinal's hat, with the title of St. Eusebius, sent him by Pope Martin V. He then returned to England as papal legate, and made his entry into London with great pomp. He soon after, in 1427-8, raised a body of men for a crusade against the Bohemian Hussites, but was compelled by the council, in the first instance, to employ them in the war in France. He afterwards, however, fulfilled his original intention, and served in Bohemia until superseded by Cardinal Julian. During his absence, his old enemies were busily at work, and poured innumerable charges against him into the royal ear; and attempts were even made to deprive him of his bishopric—so that on his return to England he thought it necessary to procure, under the great seal, a pardon for all crimes and misdemeanours that might be alleged against him from the beginning of the world down to the 26th of July, 1437. The remoteness of the period to which he thought it necessary to ascend, is a singular proof of the extent of his fears, and his opinion of the avenging powers of his enemies. He showed himself, however, rather lax in not taking precautions for the future also; for it would have been quite as easy to have convicted him of an offence to be committed in the year 1900, as of one which took place in the days of the patriarch Methuselah.

Notwithstanding his vigilance, however, the indefatigable protector again drew up articles of impeachment against him in 1442, and presented them to the king, who referred them to his council. The council being mostly composed of ecclesiastics, were of course inclined to favour the cardinal, and delayed their decision so long, that Gloucester lost patience, and abandoned the prosecution. He was murdered in May, 1447, it was suspected with the complicity, if not at the instigation, of the cardinal. The latter survived him only a month. He is said to have died in a agony of remorse and despair, bewailing his crimes, confessing his manifold sins and wickedness, and offering untold sums for an hour of life. Shakespeare, in the third act of the play to which we have already referred, draws a moving picture, into which all his mighty powers are thrown, of his last hours, as those of a despairing murderer and traitor, without one pleasant memory in the past, or one bright hope in the future. As the passage is doubtless familiar to most of our readers, we shall refrain from quoting it, and shall content ourselves with giving Holinshed's summing up of the cardinal's character, as a specimen of that worthy chronicler's powers of invention, as well as of English "undiletted," which many of our writers at the present day would do well to imitate. "During these doings, Henrie Beaufort, bishop of Winchester, and called the rich cardinal, departed out of this world. He was son to John, duke of Lancaster, descended of an honourable lineage, but borne in haste; more noble in blood than notable in learning; hartie in stomach and high of countenance; rich above measure, but not verie liberale; disdainfull to his kin, and dreadfull to his lovers, preferring monie before friendship; many things beginning, and few performing, save in malice and mischief; his insatiable covetousness, and hope of long life, made him both to forget God, his prince, and himselfe. Of the getting of his goods, both by power legatime and spirituall briberye, I will not speak; but the keeping of them, which he chiefly gathered for ambitious purpose, was both hurt to his natural prince and native countrie; for his hidden riches might have well holpen the king, and his secret treasure might have relieved the communitie when monie was scant and charges great."

Though in this harsh judgment most English historians coincide, they all agree that by his death Henry lost one of his best and most faithful counsellors, and that from that day the state of affairs became worse and worse. Whatever use of his riches he might have made during his life, his disposal of them after his death was most praiseworthy. He left an enormous sum to the prisons of London: he ordered two thousand marks to be distributed amongst the poor tenants of his diocese, and forgave the rest all they owed him. He founded an hospital at Winchester, and endowed it with the sum of £158 13s. 4d. per annum, according to the value of money at that time, besides some lands for the maintenance of two chaplains, a master, thirty-five poor men, and three nurses. He left jewels and plate of considerable value to nearly every cathedral church and monastery in England. He lies buried in Winchester cathedral; but of the inscription on his tomb nothing remains save the words Tributor, si visirem misericordius tuus—"I should be sorely troubled, did I not know thy mercy."

LETTER FROM COPENHAGEN.

June 1, 1854.

THERE is no part of Europe where so much is thought of the war as in Sweden. We are, as it were, on the spot, and the events in the Baltic have roused us to a pitch of enthusiasm quite novel. The presence of the English and French fleets has set all our statesmen devising plans for the aggrandisement of Sweden. Our military men are getting up a war fever, which would be almost ludicrous did not the future actually present contingencies which may make Sweden play a very important part in the coming events of this unfortunate struggle. Sweden is perfectly aware that the progress of Russia, unchecked and unshaken, would have ended in the entire absorption of her territories; and it is more with a view to prevent this than for the value of Finland, that we hear of nothing else here but the roving conquest of that territory, and the uniting of the Fins to this country again. Should this be decided on, the fate of Cronstadt and St. Petersburg is, as it were, sealed, for the aid thus afforded to the allied fleets would be incalculable.

Of course, a country which was united to Sweden for more than six hundred years must contain within itself the elements of restoration. There are the seeds of union. The Finlanders hate the Russians; they are wretchedly oppressed by that power, and are ruthlessly torn from their homes to serve the great northern despot by sea and land. The immense importance of this territory in relation to Russia will be seen by an examination of the map; and as, in all probability, this comparatively unknown country will be the seat of important military operations by the Baltic forces, a sketch will not here be out of place.

It is a very large district, being about 500 miles long by 250 wide, uneven, mountainous, full of valleys, and almost wholly without plains. It is a kind of Russian Switzerland, and some of the scenery, though rather bleak, is very striking and magnificent. Its actual area is about 7,000 miles, and it is placed in a very high northern latitude, a portion of it being almost arctic in its situation. It is bounded on the north by Norway, on the west by Sweden and the Gulf of Bothnia, to the south by the Gulf of Finland, to the east by three Russian provinces. Its population is not very far from two millions. A large and influential portion of this population are connected by marriage and tradition with Sweden, to which country they look with hope. The Russians have a party, but not very influential in point of numbers. The great body of the people are of the patriotic party, the pure Fins, who desire to be neither Russians nor Swedes, but Finlanders.

There are several very lofty mountains, and numerous elevated chains of hills. There are a great many rivers with names of celebrity in the history of the country, and lakes are of very frequent occurrence. The climate is not tempting; it is very cold and inclement; and the winter is very long and harsh, in some places lasting nine, in others six months. The air is said to be wholesome; and with civilisation, culture, and the introduction of drainage, the climate itself is said to be becoming warmer. It is very differently peopled, according to the climate, the southern portion being more thickly populated than the northern. Lapland is scarcely peopled at all.

The country is partly agricultural. Sweden looks to it as a valuable colony, which would be improved by trade and commerce, and give a fine field for enterprise, if it were restored to its ancient connexion. There is no doubt that its resources might be considerably developed. The country produces rye, barley, wheat, and oats, to a very great extent. Potatoes are reared to the extent of about six million bushels per annum. Hemp, flax, and tar are the chief exports, with pine and birch wood. These are the articles which it is believed might be developed by a genial government. Russia, it is true, lays Finland rather extensively under contribution for all these articles, but not in a way that is at all satisfactory to the poor inhabitants of the Grand Duchy, which, though it produces the best and hardest sail-cloth of the empire, is none the less oppressed and misgoverned.

Since the commencement of the war, a perfect carrière of cattle has taken place. The Russian contractors for the army, or by whatever crack-jaw name they call them, have not been very delicate in their mode of appropriating the cattle, horses, sheep, swine, and goats, which feed on the somewhat rich pasture and meadow lands of the country. The rublers, which are taxed, have hitherto, from their northern position, escaped the rapacity of these gentlemen, who are even worse than Turkish tax-gatherers.

With such resources as Finland possesses in this way, it is not surprising that the production of butter is great, while wool is very productive and long in staple. The horses remind one of the mustangs of Texas, and these wild creatures which Herodotus picturesquely describes in the Pampas. They are not so wild, however, and though small, do good service to their owners. Though the amount of produce is small, the tin and copper mines are valued in Russia; while attempts have been made to introduce cotton and glass mills. They do not, however, employ a very large section of the population.

It will not surprise many of your readers, when I say that the export trade of this obscure country, is considerable. A land which depends so much on natural resources, which is rich only in raw materials, must necessarily, to share the general luxury of the world, export its own growth in exchange for the manufactures of others. It employs nearly two hundred large vessels and nine hundred cesters, which convey its plank, tar, potash, cattle, tallow, &c., to the markets of Europe and to the ports of Russia. Every encouragement has been given to the development of trade for obvious reasons.

The official language of the country is Swedish. Nearly all the Fins are Protestants; Russia has not been able to force the impostures of its Greek creed upon the people. It is supposed to be governed by its own laws, but Russia takes care never to summon those who should make and administer these laws. It retains its constitution, but this is not allowed to work. It is suspended, though not suppressed; and the suspension is as perpetual as the fabled one of Mahomet's coffin. There are very few Russians in the country, and these chiefly officials residing at Helsingfors, the new capital. The native troops, according to the usual Russian policy, have been sent to Poland, a country of which they know little, and Finland is garrisoned by Russian soldiers.

There is an archbishop, who resides at the old capital, a university, several academies and schools; and by these means much progress in education has been made; but this is rendered of no avail from the fact that all books are prohibited now by the Russians, save a few elementary chemical and agricultural works. All works of the fancy, novels, poetry, all works of general history, are virtually excluded; so that the Finlanders live in happy ignorance of the state of the rest of the world, in a happy state of things, of course very conducive to the civilisation, and at all events to the quiet government of the country. The theory of the Czar appears to be, Mind your own business, dig, hoe wood, draw water, go to school, learn to read, but don't attempt to make any practical use of your acquisitions. As long as the despots of Russia are able to keep up this state of things will they be able to rule so many millions. But as certain as that no government has any right to keep its population in abject ignorance, so surely will this system end in some terrible convulsion. Education and religion, after all, are the only true safeguards of society.

The Finlanders, by the exercise of these arts, have been brought to regard the English and French as a very sanguinary race; but this delusion cannot last, especially as many of the Fins have been long voyagers, and will be able satisfactorily to dispel such absurd delusions.

There are several mining-schools lately established, I am assured, with a view to increase the produce of the tin and copper mines, which hitherto have been rather rudely worked. The absence of British and French engineers and professors will be much felt. I find that many British merchants have appointed American correspondents in Russia, and that an attempt will be made in this way to introduce machinery. A close blockade will be the only means of entirely crippling the enemy. Loss of men is no punishment to the Czar. Material and money are the chief objects.

Such is the country which Sweden dreams of re-annexing by the aid of the allied powers; and it is probable that many parts of it will soon be familiar to you, as the scene of the operations of the British and French fleets. The policy of England and France is very popular here with the masses, who do not at the time when Sweden made such a noise in the military history of the world; while the thinking and educated classes view with terror the prospect of any Russian success, which would certainly be the prelude to a Russian occupation of Sweden. Russia has for some time considered Sweden as a potential power, and Sweden seems determined not to lose the opportunity of shaking off Moscow's influence.

I send you a country news, as you will perceive that through the usual channels. By the month of March, King Oscar the King to 150,000 men; at present it is only 25,000 men. But a few weeks will probably decide the policy of the government, which is not much inclined to leave that of the party which make Gustavus as their polar star.

GERMAN CHARIOT OF THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

THERE is scarcely any history more replete with interest or more rich in valuable instruction, than the history of invention and discovery. It is curious to trace the gradual advances which have been made from the rudest implements of barbarous times, to the complicated machinery of a highly civilised age, and to mark how the guessed and imperfect attempts of one period reappear in another, developed to a degree of perfection of which the originators had not the remotest conception. How striking, for instance, is the contrast between the steam-engine of the Marquis of Worcester, in the middle of the seventeenth century, and those now in use. Had the noble projector been told of the high state of perfection to which his invention would be brought in the middle of the nineteenth century, he would have rejected the idea as utterly absurd. A similar remark would apply to a thousand other cases of this sort.

The art of locomotion is one in which we have made greater progress than almost any other. Yet it cannot be said that the men of past ages failed for want of industry in attempting to improve.

In several special works upon the history of chariot building, and improvements in locomotion in the fifteenth and two following centuries, we find it stated that a mechanist of Nuremberg, named John Hansteh, "made chariots which moved by a spring, and went two thousand paces an hour." We present our readers with an engraving of one of these singular vehicles from an old German plate. The person standing in the chariot is Hansteh himself, driving, or rather conducting. In spite of much active research, we have not been able hitherto to ascertain with any degree of clearness or precision what kind of springs the skillful contriver employed. In all probability the mechanism was something like that of a watch or meat-jack, and required to be wound up at certain intervals. If so, the invention was more curious than useful. At any rate, we doubt not, our readers will be glad to see an exact representation of this curiosity, which persons properly qualified might find worthy of attentive consideration.

GERMAN CHARIOT OF THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

RELIGIOUS CUSTOMS OF THE KALMUCKS.

On a former occasion* we furnished our readers with some particulars relative to the Kalmucks and their mode of life. It is, therefore, unnecessary for us now to enter into any minute detail on the subject. All that we propose to do, is to give some account of their religious customs, particularly their sacred festivals.

Like most of the Mongolian race, the Kalmucks are Buddhists, or rather Lamists; but their Buddhism is very much modified by the admixture of other notions and practices. They have a great number of idols, most of which assume the form of woman. They recognise one supreme God, to whom all other divinities, whether good or evil, are completely subject. They believe in the transmigration of souls, which they regard as affording a probationary course of discipline, more or less protracted, that every creature must go through, before admission to the presence and society of the sovereign judge. The saints, with whom every Buddhist may aspire to be associated, will be recompensed by eternal repose and happiness, without sacrificing their individual existence.

The Kalmucks celebrate three great festivals every year, each lasting for a fortnight. The most important is that by which they celebrate the return of spring; the second takes place in June, and is devoted to the blessing of the waters; the third is the feast of the lamp, and is celebrated in December.

Bergmann has given an excellent description of the feast of spring called sachou-zon. Priests headed the procession, playing strange airs on large trumpets, such as are seen in our illustration. In the rear came persons carrying sacred chests, containing divine images, which they placed on an altar raised in the open air. Shortly after followed the Lama in a palanquin. He was set down before the altar, and then the curtains which concealed the gods being removed, all present, people, priests, and princes, bowed down three times. The vice-khan took his place near the Lama, under a large red umbrella. A dinner, in the course of which they consumed many sheep and a great quantity of tea and cakes, formed part of the ceremony. It lasted till sunset, and was intermingled with prayers and various evolutions connected with religious worship.

In the religious music of the Kalmucks, high and low notes follow each other alternately, and the time also changes in succession from slow to quick and quick to slow. According to the traveller from whose sketch our engraving is taken, this strange alternation of tone and time is not altogether without some kind of harmony.

Yellow and red are the religious colours of the Kalmucks. Their temples are generally decorated with richly-dyed silk, and a multitude of images, among which the bronze idol of Buddha Shaktiamoni occupies a prominent place. There are also a great many offering-cups, filled with various sorts of grain, and a vessel of holy water in which peacocks' feathers are placed. The priests sprinkle the people with this water, which is mixed with saffron and sugar. They also drink part of it and wash their faces with the remainder.

Although the Kalmucks do not believe in eternal punishment, the priests have endeavoured to impress upon them the belief that endless torments will be the portion of those who have committed any one of the following sins—irreverence towards God, sacrilege on the plunder of the temples, want of respect towards parents, murder, and offences against the clergy.

PEERS AND M.P.'S.
OR,
LORDS AND COMMONS.

PARLIAMENTARY ORATORS AND ORATORY

LORD BROUGHAM thus speaks of Canning, in his contests with whom he won his proudest laurels: "His declamation, though often powerful, always beautifully ornate, never deficient in admirable diction, was certainly not of the highest order. It wanted depth. It came from the mouth, not from the heart."

If this be true of Canning, still more is it true of the name we next mention. Sir Robert Peel was hardly an orator at all. It is rather as a statesman that he will be known to posterity. It is true, as Disraeli writes, that he played upon the House of Commons as an old fiddler, but he did that because he knew the house well—because he spoke to every section of it—because he made it his great aim to be the first man in the house. Possibly he might have been an orator if he had tried, but such was not his object. He lived in a transition age, and his speeches all bear marks that such was the case. Apparently candid, he was in reality cautious and reserved—gradually feeling his way, never abandoning himself to a lofty impulse or a noble principle—never borne aloft in divine ecstasy. He spoke as a cold, prudent man of the world. One would think such a man never could have been an orator. Yet he was of a portly presence and noble air. He would have been an orator had he had the motive power. The best description we have seen of Sir Robert was that by Mr. Francis, when Sir Robert was prostrate. Sometimes a sturdy radical or an indignant agriculturist determines to catch the cod by the tail and skin him. He puts some plain direct question, and demands an answer. "You think Sir Robert must now be fairly posed his veil must be rent—parties must resume their old habits, for he must say something positive on which a war-cry can be raised. He rises, leans forward on the table, playing with his glasses, or puts his hands under the tails of his blue frock coat, and, in the most open and candid way, declares his determination frankly to answer the question that has been put to him. This is satisfactory; it propitiates. All are on the quâ-eris. There is hushed silence; all heads are stretched forward in expectation of the announcement of policy. Meanwhile the soft, bland voice has poured itself forth, its faintest tone heard in the most remote corner; the bearing bespeaks a full consciousness of the responsibility of the duty of the moment; the face wears the placid expression of innocence. You are fairly possessed for such a man. But what is he saying? By that cheer from Mr. Cobden and his Sander, Mr. Bright, he appears to have said something pleasant to the manufacturers. But that roar of delight from the other side? Oh, he has convulsed the country gentlemen by some well-turned compliment to agriculture, not as yet the object of his ridicule. And now another cheer, more general, is the reward of some pompous maxim of the public good. It is clear the house has warmed to him. The more kindly they entertain, the more candid grow the speaker's tones, the more earnest is he to do the best which the state of things allows. An elaborate statement follows of the three courses open to him, of their several advantages and disadvantages, in all of which he adroitly raises the prejudices slumbering for a moment around him, and establishes a sympathy with each; centring hopes in himself and setting old battles anew against each other; until, having thus led the various parties into a mental nébule, he winds up with "upon the whole," leading with pompous affectation of resolve to a declaration of what he means to do, which in fact comprises—in an artful wood of phrases, sounding but bodiless—almost everything that he does not mean to do. Meanwhile, he has skillfully diverted the attention of all from the real point at issue to their mutual jealousies and asperities. Ten to one he sits down amidst loud cheers, having uttered much but avowed nothing. At times Sir Robert was more than this—at times he soared, and was almost an orator.

Far more oratorical power belonged to Daniel O'Connell. You must have had a clear head and cool heart not to be carried away when he spoke. Sir Robert Peel is said to have expressed his high appreciation of O'Connell's parliamentary abilities. One day, while the Reform Bill was under discussion, the speeches of its friends and foes were canvassed in a fashionable drawing-room. On O'Connell's name being mentioned, some critic fastidiously said: "Oh, a brooding Irish fellow, who would listen to him? I always walk out of the house when he opens his lips!" "Come, Peel," said old Lord Westmorland, "let me hear your opinion." "My opinion candidly is," replied Sir Robert, "that if I wanted an efficient and eloquent advocate, I would readily give up all the other orators of whom we have been talking, provided I had with me this same brooding Irish fellow." Shill is said to have remarked of O'Connell, that "he flung a brood of sturdy ideas upon the world without a rag to cover them." With a strong sturdy frame, with a ready flow of humour, or invective, as the occasion required—with a requish twinkle in his eye, as if he were bamboozling you all the while—O'Connell was the bonaparte of a popular orator. The most unyielding audience could not choose but listen when he spoke. He excelled in clear and forcible language, in ready and dexterous reply, and in bold and defiant denunciations of tyranny. His invective was frequently powerful; it sometimes, however, degenerated into commonplace personal abuse. Like his great countryman, Curran, he was unequal. He could soar to the loftiest heights of parliamentary debate, or talk down to the level of the lowest democratic audience. A writer in the "New Monthly," some years ago, gave the best account of O'Connell we have yet seen. He says: "His great art is in stating a question. He places it on the most invincible ground he can select; and the iron vigour of his intellect is seldom concealed beneath any holiday wreaths. Unlike Mr. Stanley, he owes all the effect of his oratory to his apparent sympathy with all generous emotions. When he indulges in them his eye glistens, and the deep music of his unrivalled voice seems to halt and falter. This may be the result of his art—for he is a most experienced artist—but it has the semblance of nature. Never, perhaps, has he produced a more triumphant effect over his audience than the one when, replying to Mr. Stanley, on the Irish Coercion Bill, he arrested himself suddenly from the course of fiery invective on which he had prepared you to suppose he was about to enter: "But the right honourable gentleman," said he, with a changed and softened tone, "has declared that Ireland is 'dear to him.' I thank him for that assurance. I retract whatever I have said harshly. I forbear whatever more of angry emotion was about to rise to my lips. The man who can tell me that Ireland is dear to him, ceases to be my enemy." Throughout the whole hostile majority there was a painful movement; there was scarcely a man among them who did not seem touched.

The mention of O'Connell reminds us we have forgotten Grattan. Brougham, who must often have heard him, says: "His eloquence was of a very high order, all but of the very highest, and it was eminently original. In the constant stream of a diction replete with epigram and point—a stream on which floated gracefully, because naturally, flowers of various hues—was poured forth the closest reasoning, the most luminous statement, the most persuasive display of all the motives that could influence, and of all the details that could enlighten his audience. Often, a different strain was heard, and it was declamatory or vehement—or pity was to be moved, and its pathos was touching as it was simple—or, above all, an adversary sunk in baseness, or covered with crimes, was to be punished or to be destroyed, and a storm of the most terrible invective raged, with all the blights of sarcasm and the thunders of abuse. The critic, led away for the moment, and unable to do more than feel with the audience, could, in those cases, when he came to reflect and to judge, find often nothing to reprehend; seldom in any case more than the excess of epigram, which had yet become so natural to the orator, that his argument, and his narrative, and even his sagacious unfolding of principles seemed spontaneously to clothe themselves in the most pointed terseness, and most apt and felicitous antithesis. From the faults of his country's eloquence he was, generally speaking, free. And if he had some peculiarity of outward appearance, as a low and awkward person, in which he resembled the first of orators, and even of manner, in which he had not, like him, made the defects of nature yield to severe culture; so had he an excellence of the very highest order, in which he may be truly said to have left all the orators of modern times behind: the severe abstinence which rests satisfied with striking the decisive blow in a word or two, not weakening its effects by repetition or expansion; and another excellence, higher still, in which no orator of any age is his equal, the easy and copious flow of most profound, sagacious, and original principles, enunciated in terse and striking, but appropriate language. To give an example of this latter peculiarity would be less easy, and would occupy more space; but of the former, it may be truly said that Dante himself never conjured up a striking, a pathetic and appropriate image in fewer words than Mr. Grattan employed to describe his relation towards Irish independence, when, alluding to its rise in 1782, and its fall twenty years later, he said: 'I sat by its cradle—I followed its hearse!'"

THE TOAD.

"The toad, ugly and venomous," says Shakspeare, echoing the common sentiment of mankind in all ages regarding this harmless reptile. It would, perhaps, be difficult to find a popular notion more deeply-rooted than this of the venom of the toad; and there are doubtless many of our readers who will smile with incredulity when we tell them that this cherished belief has no foundation in fact. The first part of our great poet's description of the toad does not admit of denial; there can be no doubt that it is one of the ugliest animals breathing. It is this hideous aspect, no doubt, that has led to the popular belief in its malignity; for we find no such property ascribed to the frog, although the two animals are so nearly allied in every respect. The real natural history of this curious animal, however, presents so many interesting points, that we may easily console ourselves for its destroying our faith in the wonderful tales with which the credulity of our ancestors was amused; but there is one story told by Erasmus, "so curiously ridiculous," to use Dr. Shaw's expression, that we cannot resist giving it here, especially as it turns upon two equally singular notions—the voracious nature of the toad, and the enmity supposed to exist between the spider and this animal.

"There was a monk," says Erasmus, "who had in his chamber divers bundles of green rushes, wherewithal he strowed his chamber at his pleasure: it happened one day, after dinner, that he fell asleep upon one of those bundles of rushes, with his face upward; and while he thus slept, a great toad came and sat upon his lips, bestriding him in such a manner as his whole mouth was covered. Now when his fellows saw it, they were at their wits' end; for to pull away the toad was an unavoidable death; but to suffer her to stand still upon his mouth was a thing more cruel than death: and therefore one of them, espying a spider's web in the window, wherein was a great spider, he did advise that the monk should be carried to that window, and laid with his face upward right underneath the spider's web, which was presently accomplished. And as soon as the spider saw her adversary the toad, she presently wove her thread, and descended upon the toad, at the first meeting whereof the spider wounded the toad, so that it swelled; and at the second meeting it swelled more; but at the third time the spider killed the toad, and so became grateful to her host which did nourish her in his chamber." This is wonderfully circumstantial, considering that there can hardly be a word of truth in the whole narrative. However slight may be the foundation for all these marvellous stories, there can be no doubt that the history of the toad affords an excellent illustration of the truth of an old proverb, referring to the effect of "giving a dog a bad name."

Few of those who start with a sort of instinctive shudder when the toad crosses their path in a summer's evening, are at all aware of the wonderful changes which this creature undergoes before reaching the form in which it exhibits its disgust and abhorrence. During the breeding season, the toad, which at other periods is a terrestrial animal, visits the waters, and here the females produce a great number of eggs, which are arranged in long strings, looking like necklaces of black beads imbedded in jelly. These, when hatched, produce an animal very different in appearance from its parent; furnished with a broad head, a long thin tail, and possessing no traces of legs. Still more remarkable is the fact that in this condition the young toads, like fishes, which they much resemble, breathe the water, through which they move, by means of little tufts or gills attached to the broad head. Presently limbs begin to sprout from the little creature, the hinder ones appearing first, and when these are complete, the tail is got rid of, and the perfect toad is fitted to commence its existence in another element. But for this purpose a great internal change is also necessary, and this has been going on simultaneously with the alterations in the external form just described. The gills, which served it for a aquatic respiration, are useless in the air, and accordingly lungs have been developed in the cavity of the body, and the temporary breathing apparatus is at last dispensed with as no longer necessary. But although no longer an inhabitant of the water, the toad always remains in moist situations; continued exposure to a dry atmosphere would, in fact, soon be fatal to its existence. The experiments of Dr. Townson show that these creatures require the presence of a great deal of moisture in their bodies; in some instances he found that more than one-third of their weight was lost by transpiration when left in dry air for a day or two, and that they recovered it again in the course of a few hours when placed in water. They are commonly met with in our gardens and fields, but not infrequently find their way into cellars, where they have been known to live for years. Unlike the frog, whose jumping motion must be familiar to every one, the toad, from the comparative shortness of its hind legs, can only crawl, and this not very elegant mode of progression has no doubt assisted greatly in producing that feeling of aversion towards this animal to which we have already alluded. Its food consists entirely of insects and worms, and it never touches any but such as it believes to be in motion. Dr. Townson tells us that the only way in which he could get a "favourite" toad of his to feed during the winter upon a large stock of dead flies which he had collected for his support, was by breathing gently upon them when lying before the creature, and then it immediately seized and devoured them.

It is assisted in the capture of animals, which one would imagine might have set the toad at defiance through their inactivity, by a very curious arrangement of the tongue. On this subject, we cannot do better than quote the remarks of Professor Bell:—"The toad, when about to feed," says the Professor, "remains motionless, with its eyes turned directly forward upon the object, and the head a little inclined towards it, and in this attitude it remains until the insect moves, when, with a stroke like lightning, the tongue is thrown forward upon the victim, which is not fairly drawn into the mouth. So rapid is this movement, that it requires some little practice as well as close observation to distinguish the different motions of the tongue. This organ is constructed as in the frog, being folded back upon itself, and the under surface of the tip being imbedded with a viscid mucous secretion, the insect is secured by its adhesive quality. When the prey is taken, it is slightly pressed by the margins of the jaw; but as this seldom kills it, unless it be a soft, tender body, it is generally swallowed alive; and I have often seen the muscles of the toad's side twitch in a very curious manner, even in the tickling movements of a hard coleopterous insect in the stomach."

Still more extraordinary are the accounts that have been given of this animal's being found completely enclosed in stone, trees, and other localities, where they must, in all probability, have remained for years in a condition of almost total deprivation of all the necessaries of existence. In fact, in many cases, the circumstances under which the creatures are supposed to have been discovered would lead one to infer that they had been living without food, air, or moisture; but these stories must be received with some allowance for exaggerations naturally induced by the tendency of human nature unconsciously to make the most of any marvellous fact which falls under its notice. We are told that toads have been discovered imbedded in masses of stone, or in growing trees, in such a manner as to preclude the access of air; and, of course, in such cases, the creature would find it perfectly impossible to obtain a particle of food during its solitary confinement. But, to use the words of Professor Bell:—"To believe that a toad enclosed within a mass of clay, or other similar substance, shall exist wholly without air and food for hundreds of years, and at length be liberated alive, and capable of crawling, on the breaking up of its matrix, now to some a solid rock, is certainly a demand upon our credulity which few would be ready to answer!" We must certainly in these cases adopt Dr. Shaw's opinion, that much of the incredible in these stories is owing to "neglect of minute attention at the moment to the surrounding parts of the spot where it was discovered." Deduction made for all this exaggeration, however, enough still remains to excite our surprise; for the fact of toads having been found alive in situations where even the air necessary for their respiration would find some difficulty in penetrating, rests upon too good authority to admit of any doubt.

The toad appears to be rather a long-lived animal; fifteen or twenty years being assigned as its ordinary period of existence, whilst Pennant mentions a pet toad, which lived forty years under some steps in a garden, and even then its days appear to have been shortened by injuries done it by a rone raven, which probably thought it an excellent stroke of policy to get rid of a rival and fill his belly at the same time. During the winter it becomes torpid, retiring into some hollow tree, or under large stones, where it remains until the genial influence of spring recalls it to activity and love. It changes its skin annually; and this process, according to Professor Bell, is attended by some curious circumstances. The skin splits down the middle of the back and belly, into two halves, which are gradually wrung off by the twisting of the animal's sides and the thrusting out of its tongue. When the whole skin is fully off, the creature curls up into a little ball with its feet protruded in front, and stands thus for a while.

Two species of toads are found in this country, the common toad (Pipera vulgaris), which is met with almost anywhere, and the Newmarket toad (Pipera latior), which is far less common, as is tributed. The former is common in its proper habitat, but the latter species, although it breeds in the same locality, is not so common. The eggs of the latter are very large, and are covered with a layer of a peculiarly thick mucus. The skin of the latter is much more thick and the organs that separate the cutaneous evolution already referred to. The eye is exceedingly beautiful. The Natter-Jack is also brown, clouded with dull olive, and a yellow line runs down the middle of the back. Our engraving contains representations of both species, but the artist has unfortunately selected a large specimen of the Natter-Jack, and a small specimen of the common toad. To give a correct idea of the proportions of full-grown individuals of the two species, the sizes ought to be reversed.

JOHN HUNTER.

In the history of the pursuit of knowledge under difficulties, John Hunter has very appropriately a place. He was a rare example of what industry and perseverance can accomplish—of success achieved comparatively late in life. He was not brought up to his profession; he entered it late. He began his education when the accomplished youth of our medical schools are finishing theirs; but he persevered, and won for himself an immortal name.

John Hunter, the youngest of ten children, was born in the beginning of the last century, at Long Calderwood, in the county of Lanark.

taking thirty drops of kaulimum. From school, having acquired but little information, Hunter removed to Glasgow, where he lived with his brother-in-law, a cabinet-maker. But his brother-in-law having failed, Hunter was again thrown upon the world. Fortunately his brother William had acquired some reputation in London as a teacher of anatomy. To him he wrote, requesting that he would allow him to come to London on a visit, making, at the same time, an offer to be his assistant in his anatomical researches, or, if that proposal should not be accepted, expressing a wish to go

PORTRAIT OF JOHN HUNTER.

His father was a small landed proprietor, and on his death, which happened when he was ten years old, John seems to have been left to do as he pleased. If ever a boy stood a fair chance of being ruined, it was he. He was sent to the grammar-school, but not having a turn for languages, and being spoiled by indulgence, he neglected his studies and spent the greater part of his time in country amusements. Afterwards he felt the consequences of this neglect acutely. Giving lectures was always particularly unpleasant to him. It was with the greatest difficulty that he could be persuaded to speak in public. He never delivered the first lecture of his course without into the army. His brother sent him a kind invitation, and he reached London in September, 1748.

We are inclined to believe that the difference between a successful and an unsuccessful man in life is, that the one misses his opportunities while the other improves them. This was especially the case with Hunter. His brother, who was anxious to form some opinion of his talents for anatomy, gave him an arm to dissect for the muscles, with the necessary directions as to how it was to be done, and he found the performance such as greatly exceeded his expectation. Hunter was next employed in a dissection of a more difficult nature

This was an arm in which all the arteries were injected, and these as well as the muscles were to be exposed and preserved. The way in which this was done gave his brother so much satisfaction, that he at once declared that his brother would become a good anatomist and that he should not want for employment. Henceforth Hunter laboured at anatomy assiduously. In the summer of 1749 Mr. Cheselden, at the request of his brother, Dr. Hunter, permitted him to attend at Chelsea Hospital, and there he learnt the elements of surgery. The following winter he was so far advanced as to assist his brother by teaching dissection to his pupil. In the summer of 1750 Mr. Hunter again attended the hospital at Chelsea. In 1751 he became a pupil at St. Bartholomew's. The following summer he went to Scotland, and brought up his sister Parthena; and in 1753 entered as a gentleman commoner at St. Mary's Hall, Oxford. In 1754 he became a surgeon's pupil at St. George's Hospital, where he continued during the summer months; and in 1755 was appointed house surgeon. He had previously become a partner with his brother in lecturing. All this time he worked assiduously at anatomy. With the view better to understand the human structure, he extended his researches amongst the inferior animals, and laid the foundation of his collection in comparative anatomy. So eagerly did he attach him to this pursuit, that he sought by every means in his power the opportunity of procuring it with advantage. He applied to the keeper of wild beasts in the Tower for the bodies of those which died there, and he made similar application to the keepers of travelling menageries. He purchased all rare animals that came in his way, and those with such others as were presented to him by his friends, he entrusted to the showmen to keep till they died, the better to encourage them to assist in his labours. His fondness for animals made him keep several of different kinds in his house, which, by attention, he made familiar with him. Occasionally, however, this familiarity was attended with danger, as in the following instance related by his biographer, Sir Everard Home:—"Two leopards, which were kept chained in an out-house, had broken from their confinement and got into the yard among some dogs, which they immediately attacked. The howling thus produced alarmed the whole neighbourhood. Mr. Hunter ran into the yard to see what was the matter, and found one of them getting up the wall to make his escape, and the other surrounded by dogs. He immediately laid hold of them both and carried them back to their den; but as soon as they were secured, and he had time to reflect upon the risk of his own situation, he was so much agitated that he was in danger of fainting."

In 1760, Hunter's health was so much impaired by excessive attention to his pursuits, that he was advised to go abroad, consumptive symptoms having made their appearance. In October of that year, Mr. Adair, Inspector-general of Hospitals, appointed him a surgeon on the staff, and, in the following spring, he went with the army to Bellisle. Hunter served, while the war continued, as senior surgeon on the staff, both in Bellisle and Portugal, till the year 1763; and in that period acquired a knowledge of gun-shot wounds, on which he wrote a treatise, published after his death. On his return to England, he settled in London, where, not finding the emolument from his half-pay and private practice sufficient to support him, he taught practical anatomy and operative surgery for many years. In the first eleven years of his practice, from 1763 to 1774, his income never exceeded a thousand pounds a year. But it gradually improved. In 1778 it exceeded that sum; and for several years before his death it was five thousand a year—the year before his death it was more. No sooner had Hunter come back to England, than he returned, with unabated ardour, to the study of comparative anatomy; and, as his experiments could not be carried on in a large town, he purchased for that purpose a piece of ground near Brompton, at a place called Earl's Court, on which he built a house. We have already related an anecdote connected with this retreat. His collection of birds and animals here was very extensive; but his familiar study of them and their habits was not, as we have already seen, always unaccompanied with danger. The fierce animals were those to which he was most partial; and he had several of the bull kind from different parts of the world. Among these was a beautiful small bull he had received from the queen, with which he used to wrestle in play and tussle up himself with its exertions in its own defence. In one of these contests the bull overpowered him and threw him down; and had not one of the servants accidentally come by and frightened the animal away, this frolic would, most probably, have cost him his life.

In 1767, Hunter was chosen a Fellow of the Royal Society. His desire for improvement in those branches of knowledge which might assist him in his researches, led him at this time to propose to Dr. George Fordyce, and Mr. Cuning, an eminent mechanic, that they should adjourn from the meetings of the Royal Society to some coffee-house, and discuss such subjects as were connected with science. This society comprised several eminent men, such as Sir Joseph Banks, Dr. Solander, Dr. Maskelyne, Mr. Watts of Birmingham, and others. In 1768, Hunter became a member of the College of Surgeons; and, in the year following, was elected one of the surgeons of St. George's Hospital. In 1771, his treatise on "The Natural History of the Teeth" was published; and in July of the same year he was married to Miss Hone. The expense of his pursuits had been so great, that it was not till several years after his first engagement with this lady that his affairs could be sufficiently arranged to admit of his marrying. In a short time his private character and professional reputation advanced rapidly. His family also began to increase; but still as much time and more money than ever were devoted to his collection. The whole suite of the best rooms in his house were occupied by his preparations, and he dedicated his mornings, from sunrise to eight, entirely to his favourite pursuits. In the winter of 1773 he formed a plan of giving a course of lectures on the theory and principles of surgery, with a view of laying before the public his own opinions on that subject. In the winter he read his lectures gratis to the pupils of St. George's Hospital, and in 1775 gave a course for money, upon the same terms as the other professors. In 1776, Hunter was appointed surgeon-extraordinary to His Majesty. Other honours were heaped upon him. Learned societies at Edinburgh, Gottenburg, Paris, and America, enrolled him amongst their members; and in 1792 he was appointed surgeon-general to the army; he had previously been deputy. And then came the end. Hunter died of angina pectoris, in the 65th year of his age, on October 16th, 1793. When in his usual state of health, he went to St. George's Hospital, and meeting with some things which irritated his mind, he went into the next room; turning round to one of the physicians of the hospital, he gave a deep groan and dropped down dead. He was buried in the parish church of St. Martin-in-the-Fields.

Hunter was of a short stature, uncommonly strong and active, and capable of great bodily exertion. His countenance was animated and open, and in the latter part of his life deeply impressed with thoughtfulness. When his portrait was shown to Lavater, he said, "That man thinks for himself." In his youth, writes Sir Everard Home, he was cheerful in his disposition, and entered into youthful follies with others of the same age; but wine never agreed with his stomach, and for the last twenty years of his life he drank nothing but water. His temper was warm and impatient. His disposition was candid and free from reserve. His mind was perpetually on the alert. He used to say it fettered him to be long in a mixed company, which did not admit of connected conversation, more particularly during the last ten years of his life. He required less relaxation than most other men, seldom sleeping more than four hours in the night, though almost an hour after dinner.

In his writings Hunter displays extraordinary powers. One of his most important papers was that on the muscularity of arteries, but his grand discovery was that of the life of the blood. More than of most men is it true of Hunter, that his works yet live. His collection of comparative anatomy was purchased by the parliament for 115,000. This collection must be considered as the great object of Hunter's life, and as a surprising proof of his talents, assiduity, and labour. It is an attempt to expose to view the gradations of nature, from the most simple state in which life is found to exist, up to the most perfect and most complex of the animal creation—man himself. Hunter, by means of preparations, was enabled to preserve the parts of different animal bodies intended for similar uses, so that the various links in the chain are readily followed and clearly understood. This collection is arranged according to the subjects they are intended to illustrate, which are placed in the following order: first, parts constituted for motion; secondly, parts essential to animals respecting their own internal economy; thirdly, parts superadded for parts connected with external objects; and fourthly, parts for the propagation of the species and maintenance or support of the young.

Hunter's museum was offered to the College of Physicians, which declined the trust. It was then committed to the care of the College of Surgeons, Lincoln's-inn-fields, where it is open to the inspection of the public during the afternoons of Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. The corporation has enlarged the museum, instituted professorships for the illustration of it, and is now forming a library. The most valuable part of the collection is that in the area of the great room, consisting of upwards of 2,000 preparations, which were the result of Mr. Hunter's experiments on the inferior animals, and of his researches in morbid human anatomy. All these originally were arranged as illustrative of his lectures. The first division alone, in support of his theory of inflammation, contains 602 preparations. Those illustrative of specific diseases, amount to 1,984. There are, besides, 752 dried specimens, consisting of diseased joints, bones, and arteries. On the floor there is a very fine collection of the skeletons of man and other animals: "and if the council of the college," says the writer of the life of Hunter, in the Gallery of Portraits, "continue to augment this collection with the same liberal spirit which they have hitherto shown, it will be creditable to the nation." The osteological specimens amount to 1,936. But the most interesting portion, we might say, one of the most interesting exhibitions in Europe to a philosophical and inquiring mind, is that which extends along the whole gallery: there the glory of his system shines. Let us take one small compartment in order to understand it. "Suppose," says the writer we have already quoted, "it is wished to learn the importance of the stomach in the animal economy. The first object presented to us is a hyatid, an animal, as it were, all stomach—being a simple one with an exterior absorbent surface. Here we have the polypus, with a stomach on a membrane, and a lining superadded or not. Next in order is the book, in which is to be seen the beginning of a complexity of structure. Then we advance to the various forms in which the stomach is complex, we find the tubular membranous stomach; then the stomach with a crop attached to moderate and prepare the food for digestion; then a muscular stomach; and finally, all the appendages as necessary to the various classes of animals." When Hunter died, the museum consisted of 70,000 preparations, and was valued to have cost him £10,000. Hunter bequeathed the catalogue, &c., &c., before his death. He bequeathed to the world, in the form of a volume of MS. material, a writer, either by himself or at his dictation, and there is little doubt, of the most valuable kind. Most MSS. were burnt by his brother-in-law, Sir B. Rowley, for no other apparent reason than that Sir Edward feared his own plagiarisms from Hunter's MSS. would be discovered. This irreparable injury has been done to Hunter's fame. "Every year," writes one, "his life's museum is more closely studied, proves that Hunter had been well aware of facts, for the discovery of which others have since his death received the honour." Happily, however, Hunter's fame has survived even so scandalous an act. "Every year there is a grand day at Lincoln's-inn-fields," Warriors and statesmen, poets and artists, men of celebrity in every walk of life, are found among the audience. The president is the orator. Referring to the fitness of the day for the subject, the title of February, and the birthday of John Hunter, he proceeds, in a notice of his life, to show what the college and the profession and the world owe to this illustrious man. Surely no more fitting place could be found for such a theme. Under the bust of Wren we read, "Seu amentum respicitur circum pler." Under the portrait of Hunter in Lincoln's-inn-fields the same may be written. Everything around speaks of Hunter's talent, energy, and power.

ROMAN MONUMENTS AT TURBIA.

TURBIA is one of the principal points of interest in the doubtful and disputed territory between Nice and Monaco. On leaving the village we begin to descend; Monaco lies directly below, and looking upon it from the terrace of Turbia, we feel almost inclined to take a leap downwards; but it would be a dangerous thing to do, for the perpendicular height is more than 1,500 feet. The path is cut like a staircase in this awful declivity, and if this is the ancient way, as it appears to be, modern progress has judged well; for, commencing at the same point as this frightful break-neck path, there is a fine post-road, running parallel with the coast, and descending so gradually towards Italy, that it only reaches the plain at the distance of three leagues. As at the extremity of the mountain, below which Nice is situated, the eye hovers over France, so here Italy, with its gulfs, its windings, its hills, and its mountains, lies spread out before us. When the atmosphere is sufficiently clear, we may distinguish Corsica, and the jagged peaks of the Apennines beyond Genoa, stretched out afar upon the horizon. Most striking is this glorious spectacle, it seems evident that we here pass from one country to another.

Tradition would make it appear that it was upon the very soil of Turbia that Augustus vanquished the people of the Alps, and, in fact, the possession of this decisive spot seems worthy of dispute. But we imagine, that even had not Turbia been the theatre of war, its towering position, which rendered it visible from the coast of France as well as from the coast of Italy, would have sufficed to determine the conquerors to erect there the trophy of their victory. We know very little of this war of the Alps, which nevertheless had such important results, since it confirmed the Roman dominion in these countries. Historians are singularly laconic on the subject. Suetonius, in his "Life of Augustus," merely says, "He subjugated the Alpine nations." Appian says: "He subdued by force all the barbarous and warlike nations which inhabit the summits of the Alps." We find that this war was concluded in the year of Rome 739, or B.C. 14. Several witnesses show that Augustus was assisted by Drusus, Tiberius, and Varro. It may be conceived that a war which involved all the population of the mountain, from the Adriatic to the Danube, would be very uncertain, and require several campaigns. The war itself was a natural consequence of the extension of the empire by the conquests of Julius Cæsar. Rome could no longer tolerate independent nations between the two Gauls, nor that this communication should be long exposed to the turbulence of the mountains. Her astonish that, having been masters of Provence so long, she should have believed it still now to reduce Liguria to obedience. Perhaps, with its traditions of patience and perseverance, the senate had judged it wise to attend first to the most important. This is the opinion of Appian. "I think," said he, "that the state is anxious first of all to secure to Rome the right of passage through the Alps."

However that may be, we learn from Dion, that in order to preserve to posterity the memory of this great event, the senate commanded the erection of a monument upon the summit of the Alps, and Pliny has preserved to us the inscription in full which was placed upon it. This monument is the tower of Turbia. The names injured by the barbarians to claim any interest in a specimen of art, it is, nevertheless, interesting to study. When all we see upon these crumbling stones, the infinite construction of a wall below, the horizon of France on one side, and on the other that of Italy, and feel no interest in reflecting on the various modes of the past, which predict so many for the future.

The monument has undergone such numerous vicissitudes, that it is from the hand of destruction, but also more chance, that it is in its present state. It is difficult to form any exact idea of its present condition, and what it must have been originally. It now consists of no other than a mass, which appears to have been formed by a quadrilateral, surrounded by a tower which has been on three different occasions only a half-buried structure. It is built on the lower stratum of the hand of the primitive architect, and bears the marks of the construction of the tower, but a series of steps, which lead to the summit, indicate the work of the middle ages. We have, however, the witness of historians, to prove that the monument upon the the barbarians, by way of revenge, were pleased to inflict the injuries of mutilation, was changed into a fortress in the time of the Guelphs and Ghibellines. Thus even its greatness, which would seem to have been its guarantee against the action of time, became the principal cause of its ruin. We find in the "Nouveau Théâtre du Piémont et de la Savoie," printed at the commencement of the eighteenth century, a fine engraving of this curious fortress; but it would be difficult to distinguish there any trace of its antiquity. The quadrangular structure has been simplified so as to form the base of a rampart, from the four angles of which spring quadrangular turrets, and a circular tower crowns the whole. Long the subject of dispute between the rival parties, this citadel was destroyed at the end of the sixteenth century by Marshal Villiers, upon the instigation of the Prince of Monaco, the frontiers of whose territories it threatened. But these remains still shed over the country a ray of the past, and preserve there the great name of Rome.

After examining the ruins still remaining on the spot, or scattered over the village, and comparing them with the account of it preserved in some authors, it may be conjectured, that the monu-

If the heap of rubbish which has accumulated around the monument were thoroughly examined, no doubt some important remains would be found; for, although the statues have been broken, they have not been taken away. As for the inscription, the adjoining reputation will show what remains of it. What has become of the other fragments? Reduced to the condition of building-stones, they serve perhaps for walls to other ruined houses, the owners of which were not ambitious of affixing white marble to their doorway. Probably also the stones of the arch, upon which no letters are visible, would, if reversed, bring to light the remainder of the inscription. It would, perhaps, be worthy of the city of Nice to remove these stones, and place them in the Museum library; but to us their present situation seems so full of instruction, that we should regret to see them removed.

Aided by the text of Pliny, it is not difficult to find the value of each fragment presented to us by this doorway. The principal part belongs to the first and second lines of the list of vanquished nations — "Gentes Alpine devictæ: Trumpilini, Cumani," etc. We read upon the stone over the left pillar the lower part of "Alpi," preceded by an s, the final letter of "Gentes," and above that— for ment consisted of a quadrangle surrounded by Doric columns, adorned with statues of the lieutenants of Augustus, and those of the vanquished barbarians, and surmounted by a colossal image of the emperor.

M. P. Boyer, a Frenchman, who visited Tivoli in 1585, relates that he discovered in the enclosure of the fortress a colossal head of Augustus, terribly mutilated, but sufficiently preserved to allow him to take its measurement, from which he calculated that the entire figure must have been twenty-eight feet in height. He discovered also the upper part of the torso, and studied it sufficiently to deliver a dissertation upon the costume. He supposed that the rest of the statue had been cut away to furnish material for two large tombs, one of which then served for a horse-pond. Another interesting discovery was a knee clasped by two hands, appearing to have belonged to the figure of a captive, from which he concluded that the image of the emperor was not the only decoration of the monument. Towards the end of the last century, a fine head of Drusus was dug from the ruins. It was purchased upon the spot by the prince of Denmark, and placed by him in the Museum of Copenhagen, where it may still be seen.

the letters are upside down — "trumpilini" of "Trumpilini." Upon the right pillar, the letters XOS belong to the word "Venostes," the only word of the list in which this syllable is found. The syllable XI, which we read upon two stones, cannot be exactly determined, for in the list given by Pliny there are ten names which have this termination. However, if we suppose all these stones belong to the first lines of the inscription, the letters may belong to "Cumani," to "Bucini," or else to the final of "Trumpilini." But that is of little importance.

We have only to remark that the stone on the left pillar may serve as a commentary on the too concise passage left us by Pliny. As naturalists, by the aid of one bone, can reconstruct the entire animal, so may we endeavour by the help of this single piece to restore the whole tablet.

In the text of Pliny there are two distinct things to be noticed: 1st. The dedication to Augustus, "Imp. Cesar, dno . . . quod ejus ductu auspiciisque, etc." "To the emperor Cesar Augustus . . . because it was by his command, and under his auspices, that all the Alpine nations of the upper and lower sea were subjugated to the empire of the Roman people;" 2nd. The list of the vanquished nations, "Gentes Alpina devictæ, Truimpilini, Camuni, Venostes, etc." It is probable that these two inscriptions, of so different a character, occupied different situations upon the monument.

We, however, have only to notice the list of vanquished nations, since of the others we have no remains. The inscription upon the stone of the left pillar will assist us to calculate the length and breadth of the whole. The letters "Aluin," occupying a space of nearly four inches, it is easy to determine that "Gentes Alpina devictæ" upon the same scale, would occupy more than nine feet. This, then, would have been the breadth of the tablet.

The length, or height, of the inscription may be calculated by the measurements of Pliny, compared with the dimensions of the characters employed. The height of the letters is seven inches, that of the space between the lines four inches, whence it follows that the space occupied by the forty-seven names, with title and margin, would be about forty-five feet. Perhaps this long inscription was divided into two tables, and placed upon the front of the monument. But be that as it may, it must have been of colossal magnitude.

It may, perhaps, be contended that the names of the nations, instead of occupying each its own line, were placed one after another, which would much diminish the height of the tablet; but that each of the names occupied its own line can admit of no doubt.

There is enough to stimulate the zeal of amateurs; and we wish that these lines, meeting the eye of some one of our countrymen, may help to cure him of his illness, by inspiring him with the idea of exploring this precious mine of archaeology, and the fine arts.

RUINS OF THE TOWER OF AUGUSTUS AT TIVOLI.

THE WALLACHIAN ROBBER.—II.

MARUSCHKA gave no answer to Selim's ambiguous remark, yet it was evident these words of the renegade fell upon her like sparks upon gunpowder. He, however, said to himself, "Be very careful, Selim Baschi. The capricious soul of woman often desires what it once disdained. They flee that they may be pursued, and when the pursuit is over the game sometimes turns hunter. Thus Maruschka may, perhaps, have changed her refusal into a tardy consent because she thought herself a medlar, which must be fully ripe to taste well."

This musing was interrupted by a question which the old robber put. "How is it," said he, "young apostate, that you roam about alone as a wanderer in our mountains?"

"Do I not know these hills as well as you?" replied Selim. "I have not lost my way hunting, but merely staid out rather late, and am now preparing some refreshment that I may make my way back with renewed vigour. I have a reason for hunting beyond the pleasure of it. We are all fond of game, and every deer I get improves my position with my superior."

"You take a good deal of trouble," observed Maruschka, "to please your commanders."

"It is the only way to obtain promotion," was the apostate's reply. "Even Turks are not above studying what is expedient for the attainment of their object. I am earnestly endeavouring to get into favour; and if a bold attempt of mine is successful, I shall then have powerful advocates who will appreciate my merit as it deserves. Mark, Maruschka, if you were in a position to assist me in a brilliant exploit against the Imperialists, then — But what do I say? You are a zealous Christian, and, consequently, devoted in your attachment to the double-headed eagle.”

“Hush!” interrupted Marusshka, with great impetuosity. “The eagle is as hateful to me as spiders and toads. If you are disposed to venture upon an attack, I will assist you both with advice and in action, and I think I can render you great service, so that you may take half a dozen dragoon’s heads to Meladia. I am prepared to look out for a favourable opportunity, and hope soon to succeed.”

Selma nodded and smiled with satisfaction, and the two were soon deep in conversation about the position and movements of the Imperial forces.

While the Wallachian female robber and the apostate were preparing their secret schemes by the fire in the wood, Zdenku, the Mlakaberg peasant, was sitting at ease upon a bench in his kitchen, which served both for a sleeping and sitting room. There was a maple-wood bedstead in the room, on which he often lazily stretched himself, after the manner of the inhabitants of these parts near the Danube, who are all alike in idleness and cowardice, whether they call themselves Servians, Wallachians, or Croatians. He was looking lazily at the curling wreaths of smoke from his pipe, while his wife and daughter were getting ready the supper at the fire. The wife, an active woman, was as repulsive and dirty as her husband. The daughter bore some resemblance to both, but yet had rather a different aspect. Her fresh countenance, which inherited the prominent features of her father’s, was attractive to behold in its youthful bloom. The short figure, which she derived from her mother, combined with her plump roundness to produce a model of symmetry and activity. And to crown the whole, the beautiful Wantscha united to all the attractions of health, youth, and loveliness, a purity of heart such as is rarely to be found even among those who have enjoyed the highest advantages in point of education and example.

“Wantscha, my child,” said the peasant, all at once aroused by the savoury odour arising from the fire, “tell me what you have there cooking.”

“A delicacy, father,” replied the daughter, “four bear’s feet.”

“Indeed! How came you by them? Have you taken the grim monster by the ear?”

“You will not guess, father. When I went out to-day to take the herdsmen their dinner, they were just killing the bear which had fallen into the trap in the course of the night, and I brought home the feet and hocks.”

“The men may have the rest, themselves,” said Zdenku, smiling; and then turning to his wife, added, “we have a clever lass there, that is very clear.”

“She is not active, at any rate,” muttered the woman; “in that she takes after her father.”

Wantscha was ready in a moment to defend herself from her mother’s reproach. She thought it was only prudent not to wish to be married to an old robber, and was about once more to justify her reluctance, when the entrance of a stranger interrupted her just as the first word was on the tip of her tongue. This unexpected visitor was so tall that he was obliged to stoop a little to avoid knocking his head against the upper part of the door. Yet with all this unusual height of stature he was as square-built and compactly-formed as the merest dwarf, while neither symmetry nor pliancy of limb was at all deficient in his gigantic bulk. His countenance, like his person, bore traces of a stern kind of beauty. Beneath his lofty forehead and overhanging eye-brows shone forth a pair of dark eyes. The nose was broad and large, with wide nostrils. Over the lips grew a thick arch of black mustaches, which united with the whisker and stretched out at the ends more than an inch each way. The dress, as well as the form and countenance, of the giant was strange and striking. It consisted of a close-fitting doublet without arms, a sort of open waistcoat of blue cloth richly adorned with silk cool, and red trousers which terminated in laced half-boots. The back and left side were covered with a bear-skin hunter’s coat also, corded and fastened under the right arm, so as to leave that arm quite at liberty. His right hand grasped an osakata or Hungarian axe, a dangerous weapon when skilfully wielded. In his girdle were stuck a pair of horse-pistols and a short sabre. Beneath the coat on the left side hung a long sword, and a gunstock on which to fix a pistol, if necessary.

The weapons were in excellent condition. The dress, although it had evidently been long exposed to wind and weather, served as an ornament to the wearer — at least in the eyes of the beautiful Wantscha, who, deeply blushing, could not refrain from exclaiming in a half-audible tone, “What a pleasant surprise!”

“Praised be the Holy Virgin!” said the visitor as he entered, sprinkling himself with the holy water at the door, and making the sign of the cross after the manner of the Eastern church.

“All praise to the whole company of saints in heaven,” answered the three inmates of the house. The woman added, “Why so late at night, robber-chief?”

The latter laid aside his outer coat, made himself comfortable upon a seat, and then replied: “I wished to visit my wife and then go to Mlakaberg. But Marusshka was not in her retreat. She had gone, they said, to meet her messenger, the active Dolan, whom she had sent out for some gunpowder. I waited for her to come back because she had promised to let me have a pound of powder as soon as she got any. But I waited in vain, she did not come, and at last I went away. Hence I am a late visitor here, but not to late, I perceive. I have come just in time for supper, and my nose tells me it will be a good one, too.”

“Perhaps we expected a visit from you, Petru Bazyu,” said Wantscha, laughing, “and have, therefore, prepared something very nice.”

“Take away,” was the robber’s reply; “I have swallowed many a nice morsel intended for another without being any the worse for it.”

“It would not answer for you to be a robber,” said Czinka, “if you were not always on the watch to snap up what belongs to other people.”

“Better be a Wallachian robber,” rejoined he, “than a Croatian thief.”

The conversation continued in a strain of social jocularity. In the eyes of the peasant and his family, robbery was a sort of profession or handicraft to which they need entertain no unfriendly feeling, as long as their own property was respected. Still the wife felt some expressions which were not altogether without bitterness. She had remarked that Petru had for some time past considered himself as a Turk, and although he made use of the holy water, might, like any other unbelieving Moslem, be disposed to take a second wife, if not three or four. Petru understood what she meant well enough, but abstained from any reply. With a quiet serious air he put his hand into his knapsack, which he hid on the bench with his fur coat and sabre, and pulled out a large flask, saying, “Let us drink, I have better stuff here than any pasha can get to drink.”

Czinka smiled in a good-natured way, and accepted his invitation without any reluctance. The lazy Zdenku was all of a sudden as brisk and active as any waiter at an hotel or coffee-house. Even Wantscha did not scorn the tempting offer, but took more than one draught with much pleasure. The bear’s feet were brought to table. The meal passed amid plenty of talking and joking, and though Zdenku might at first have felt a little annoyed when he found a visitor had come to partake of the rich dainty, he consoled himself as well as he could with the flask, and was the more contented when Petru promised to leave it behind him.

At last the robber chief rose to go. “It is getting late,” said he, “and I have a long way to go.”

“Won’t you stay for the night?” asked Czinka in astonishment.

“I should be glad to do so,” was the reply, “but I cannot; I am expecting a messenger to-night, who will, perhaps, bring good news.”

“Only perhaps?” said Zdenku, yawning; “for a perhaps I would not stir my little finger.”

“You are right enough, to take it easy,” replied Petru; “you have a good home, a wife, child, and servants, with plenty to eat and drink; and may sit here watching the birds from morning to night, without any anxiety. But I have a dozen months to fill by my own exertions, in these hard times. Business with me is very bad, and rather dangerous, besides. As I cannot make myself so comfortable as I should like, I am now going from Meladia to Orsova upon a mere uncertainty.”

He went to the door, accompanied by Wautscha, who conducted him to the outer gate. There they remained, hand in hand, for some time; said good night, more than once, and yet lingered on the spot. He was waiting for her to go back into the house, and she to see which way he went.

"Shall you be back again soon?" asked Wautscha.

"I wish I were already back," was his reply.

"Why, then, would you not stay?"

"Of what use would it be, Wautscha? I should only grieve all the more over to be separated from you. If you would but—"

"Hush!" interrupted the girl; "have I not forbidden you to pain me by any such talk?"

"In my thoughts I tell you of everything, and more than of anything; how, then, can I control my tongue in your presence, of whom I am thinking day and night?"

"We are very unfortunate," sigh'd the maiden.

"If we are unfortunate, I am lucky indeed," whispered he, opposing still nearer to her. She made no objection to this movement, though she said—"You men are all alike; you care for nothing but your own happiness. If you consider yourself lucky, I have reason to be so much the more unlucky in my own estimation."

The conversation was here interrupted in a very unexpected and unpleasant way.

"What makes you so unhappy, my dear?" said a woman's voice. "You would like to have a husband to yourself alone, would you not?" Such a one is here for you, my darling."

It was Maruschka who said this. She and her companion had come in, or, without being observed, to hear what Wautscha said. The two who were thus surprised, started back from each other.

"Good evening, husband," said Maruschka. "You expected no here, I suppose?"

"Not here," replied he; "but I waited for you at your place till I could wait no longer."

"Because you were afraid to be out in the wood late at night," cried Maruschka, laughing.

Wautscha heard no more of the conversation between them, but slipped back into the house.

The old woman soon followed her, accompanied by Dschurdschur, but without Petrus, he having gone off. Maruschka did not look exactly pleased. It is true she was glad at heart to have caught her husband holding a familiar conversation with the girl. The reproaches, which she now felt she had a right to utter against him, were a sort of protection against those of her own conscience. Still these and other similar considerations were not sufficient to give her restless spirit perfect repose, and she gladly seized the opportunity of giving vent to her fury.

The peasant and his wife received her in a cruel and disdainful manner. They had treated her husband cordially, but without any great show of respect. Now all was changed. A good deal gets one done, a savage dog two; and Maruschka could always do more than others. Indeed she was the mistress of the place. The house, the yard, the fields, and even the life of the peasant and his family were dependent upon her pleasure.

"Our poor nose is pulled down for you," said Zdenku, bowing and crossing his arms over his breast.

"Wautscha will make haste," added Zinka, "and get you a nice supper."

With suppressed indignation Maruschka heard these and similar remarks, in which, amid professions of submission and subservience, they showed all kinds of attention.

"I don't wish to take anything," said she as she walked away; "I only want a night's lodging with you, not because I am tired, but because I have to be here early in the morning. And yet I am doubting whether I ought not to prefer a night's rest in the wood to staying in your house."

"Why do you hesitate, mistress?" interposed Zdenku, submissively; "do you suppose anything, you wish would be done by us here?"

"You are a cowardly well-to-do soul," said Maruschka. "But you have no strength of purpose, no energy, no perseverance. You are like a reed trembling with every breeze."

"I receive the reproof in all humility," replied Zdenku, in a penitential tone.

"Change for the better," cried the impetuous Annet; "and you will gratify me far more than by your humility. Even now it is not too late; repentance may yet produce good fruits."

"I will improve," declared the abject man; "your good counsel shall be to me inviolable law; but my understanding does not keep pace with my good intentions. Good-morning, mistress, to bid you the adieu percut in what he has had the misfortune to offend you."

"Don't pretend to be more simple than you really are," rejoined Maruschka; "don't imitate the shopkeeper at Moscow, who shams deafness when he wishes not to hear."

THE MARQUIS OF LANSDOWNE, K.G.

It is sometimes said that the age of statesmen has fled—meaning thereby, that the growth of statesmen has ceased, or passed away. It is recorded of Sir R. Peel, that one of the contemplations that filled him with distrust of the future of England was the fact, that towards the close of his career, or at least after he had spent a long life in the service of his country, he saw no appearance of that younger race of political capacities which, in the natural order of things, should give promise of worthily filling the public stage as he and his contemporary actors quitted the scene. And really, the reasonableness of this foreboding strikes one most seriously in glancing at the majority of men now in office—recalling the duration of their return—were to take up a journal or periodical, and read of Lord Lansdowne making a speech in the peers, or assisting in the deliberations of the cabinet, or, still more, of giving a magnificent fashionable fête in Berkeley-square, with half the patricians in Burke or DeBrett figuring there, he, the said returned voyager, would conclude, as a matter of course, that the individual in question was the son of that Marquis of Lansdowne who was a most aged and patriarchal politician when the arctic explorer had set out on his expedition. He never could conceive that the Marquis of that era was the Marquis of this; that after all the mutations in systems and circumstances, an individual who had been a prominent duties, and looking forward in vain for others competent to discharge those duties as well, or anything like as well, though those now discharging them have attained ages which, in any other occupation in life than that of governing the country would have entitled them to all the ease and unruffled honours of retirement long, long ago. To no man in the ministry—though the head of it, Lord Aberdeen, is himself a phenomenon on the score we are speaking of—to no man out of the ministry, with the single exception, perhaps, of Lord Lyndhurst, whose intellect is as sharp, and physical stamina as strong, to all appearance, as if he were merely in ripe middle age, do these remarks apply with such force as to the distinguished nobleman whose name heads this page. If a returned voyager from the Franklin Expedition—whence, alas! there is no legislator for the fathers, the grandfathers—ay, the great-grandfathers—of the present generation, could still be in office, still looked up to, and his advice and assistance be deemed absolutely essential to the guidance of the political concerns in which he still takes a conspicuous personal part.

One can hardly realise the immense sweep of time over which the life, the active political life, of Lord Lansdowne extends. People are accustomed to hold up their hands and open their eyes in astonishment as they are told that Lord Palmerston was a nimble player through the greater part of the Peninsular War, and filled the prominent and highly responsible office of Secretary at War during that period, and for several years afterwards. And certainly, as one reflects on these facts, and then looks at the noble viscount, still buoyant and vigorous, and with a score of sessions in his constitution, it does make one despair of the likelihood of such a race of men as the member for Tiverton belongs to ever again becoming known to our history. But he is a mere chicken compared to the Marquis in point of official standing. We of this age think that the period of Earl Grey and the Reform Bill is somewhat distant; that Canning is among the classics as to time; that the Liverpool and Castlereagh days belong to the mists of history; and as for Pitt and Fox, why, we regard them with something of that veneration in respect to antiquity with which we look upon the early records of the house of Hanover; while as to meeting with any one who ever saw either of these celebrated personages, such a thought never occurs to us; or, if it does, we think of such venerable individuals as we do of the "oldest inhabitant" of the newspapers, as of one who sits mumbly and dozing in a corner, entertaining his own senility with garrulous gossip of things his father before him had told him, rather than of matters within his own cognisance. What, then, must be our astonishment as we confront in Lord Lansdowne a person with whom Pitt and Fox were not merely traditional celebrities, who were quitting the sphere of politics as his boyhood was beginning to comprehend the sort of men they really were, but one who was an opponent of one and a colleague of the other of them. Lord Lansdowne was actually a cabinet minister in the days of Fox; he was Fox's Chancellor of the Exchequer, three years before the present one, Mr. Gladstone, and one year before the late one, Mr. Disraeli, was born! Of course, he must not only have been of full age when he was appointed to that office, in the very crisis of a war still more formidable than that we are now engaged in,—for the whole continent was allied against us, and the nations that occasionally took heart of grace to fight for themselves had to be paid by us for their patriotism,—but he must also have been a party man of long standing, and one who had given great evidence of aptitude for that species of business which can only be acquired by experience. On the occasion of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer coming into the post, he now fills, he spoke of himself as a veteran officer, of one whose office-life dated back twenty years, and talked like one whom age had given a prescriptive right to lecture the virid and comparatively immature, and therefore, perhaps, frivolous critics who are captious about occurrences that are incomprehensible or distasteful to them merely from their novelty. How, then, must it be with the Marquis, who, as we have just said, was an experienced and distinguished official before Mr. Gladstone was born! "I was a man when Hector's grandsire sneaked," says Ulysses in the drama; and certainly the saying might be paraphrased with some truth by Lord Lansdowne if applied to some of his cabinet colleagues, say the noble Privy Seal, the Duke of Argyll, for example.

Long as his life has been, it has ever been free from taint or reproach of any kind; even from the taint which in these days is hardly felt to be a reproach—that of inconsistency. Spring of a lineage of liberals, coming before the public as the protégé, friend, companion, and colleague of liberals, he has never once deviated from the path of progress, nor have his actions ever given warrant for the supposition that he did so. Even now, as one of a cabinet composed in part of men whom he had for years and years opposed as reactionists, his presence is the pledge of progress; and the public feel, that though at his years it is wholly impossible he should materially influence any line of policy, still his sanction of the policy which is being pursued implies that that policy is of a more English and liberal nature than would be that other policy which his refusal to make part of the present ministry would have entailed upon the country. The character of the Marquis is one of which the whole English nation may be justly proud; it is the realisation of that ideal character which the warmest panegyrist of our patrician institutions might select for portrayal. In the first place, it is as purely disinterested a character as can well be imagined in one of his position, and is perhaps the most disinterested which our whole party political history affords—much more so than that of the Duke of Wellington, whom it is customary to regard as the type of personal magnanimity in such matters. The duke was an exceedingly ambitious man, greedy of political power, not only for its own sake but for his own sake; and the records of the formation of the ministry of 1828, and of the events which led to the downfall of two preceding administrations, show, that if the first consideration of his grace was to secure an advantage for his party, the next consideration was to turn that advantage to his own individual aggrandisement. True, his transference of the premiership to Peel on the second occasion of being at the head of affairs, and his retention of nearly all the seals of all the offices till Sir Robert's return from Rome in 1834, is suggestive of great seeming indifference to official ambition. But it is to be recollected, that at that period the duke had come to the conclusion that the first minister of the crown should belong to the Commons, not to the Peers' House of Parliament; and, moreover, it was a matter of notoriety, of which none was more conscious than his grace himself, that the main stay of the ministry was the name of Wellington, and that his word was as much law in the cabinet as it would have been were he in camp. Very different, however, has the conduct of Lord Lansdowne ever been. Self is the last thing he has ever thought of. Though possessed, as we have seen, of unrivalled experience—though a man of great natural ability, aided by the highest culture and incessant study—though one of the richest men in the peerage, commanding the highest social position in right of his wealth, taste, and the unbounded personal respect in which he has ever been held—he has never sought to obtrude himself on the public or parliament; has always been content to fill a subordinate post, and satisfied if, in the capacity of a comparative cypher, he can contribute to the sum of human happiness, in the interest of those principles with which his name has ever been most honourably identified. Nor has he sought to indemnify himself for this forbearance in public by the indulgence of the love of intrigue in private, as has been the case with men somewhat similarly situated in all ages, and as is said to be the case now with Prince Metternich, who is alleged to have the same power behind the Austrian throne, in privacy, as he had so long before it; and as was also the case, according to popular belief, with Lord Bute, in the early part of the reign of George III., secretly influencing councils for the results of which he was not responsible.

Intrigue, trickery, plotting, and scheming of every kind are foreign to Lord Lansdowne. Noble alike by nature, position, and the circumstances that have surrounded him, or rather that he has created for himself, he has gone through life so purely as to have been untouched even by the breath of calumny; and amidst all the accusations which party malice directs against its objects in times of political strife, none has ever impugned the integrity of his declarations on public subjects, or hinted that a sordid, unworthy, or even personal motive of any kind has influenced what seemed to be his sense of duty. Hence, on the occasion of his quitting office, to all appearance for the last time, at the break-up of the ministry of which Lord John Russell was the head, in 1852, everybody felt that the glowing eulogium pronounced upon him by his political rival and then successor to the ministerial leadership in the upper house, the Earl of Derby, was something more than a routine courtesy, something very far beyond the mere conventional compliment prescribed by custom. It was admitted on all hands that the Marquis had deserved everything that was said of him; and the best proof that he did so was conveyed in the circumstances which soon after followed. When the Derby-Disraeli government were overthrown, the Sovereign and the leaders of the two parties embraced in the coalition ministry that was then in a state of formation, simultaneously resorted to the advice of Lord Lansdowne, knowing that they would find in his wisdom and unselfishness the very best guidance through the unparalleled party predicament in which the country was then placed. Nor were they disappointed. It was at Lord Lansdowne's suggestion that his life-long friend and almost pupil, Lord John Russell, agreed to merge all minor differences between his old foe, Lord Aberdeen, and himself, in the common cause of seeming to the country the greatest aggregate of administrative ability which could be rendered available. It was at Lord Lansdowne's instance that Lord Aberdeen, who had never before been politically associated with any of Lord Lansdowne's usual friends, agreed to meet Lord John in a generous spirit of mutual forbearance, compromise, and acquiescence; and it was at Lord Lansdowne's instance that her Majesty agreed to accept for ministers men who had hitherto been looked upon as the representatives, if not of exactly diametrically opposite principles, at least of opposite plans for giving expression to those principles; for even under the modern liberalism of the Peelites, their maxim has been to do everything for the people on the Austrian model of governmental machinery, whereas the precept of the elder and consistent reformers is to let the people do that for themselves which the law and the constitution allow them. Nor did the good offices of Lord Lansdowne stop here. When differences arose between the reform section of the cabinet, when the views of Lord John Russell and Lord Palmerston on certain points clashed, or were said to have clashed (for the real facts never transpired), Lord Lansdowne was appealed to by each, and succeeded in reconciling both; and by a singular coincidence, the noble viscount, at the time the disagreement came to a rupture, was on a visit to Bowwood, the seat of the Marquis—the confidential friend and guest of the man with whom he had his first political quarrel not far short of fifty years before—namely, at the election for the University of Cambridge, when he defeated the noble Marquis, then Lord Henry Petty, in 1806, Palmerston then representing the principles of Pitt, and his competitor, of course, those of Fox. This reminds us that it is now time to say a few words chronologically of the career of the subject of our memoir.

The family of the noble Marquis, Petty, traces its ancestry to a very remote period, the eleventh century, when one of the race figured considerably in the wars of Strongbow, in Ireland, where they obtained vast possessions, and where at the present day the family still own immense tracts of fine territory, especially in Kerry, which gives the title of earl to the eldest son of the Marquis of Lansdowne. The present eldest son of the Marquis is, however, Earl of Shelburne—the Earl of Kerry being dead some years—and why the eldest living does not take the title of his defunct brother, is a puzzle to our very limited heraldic sagacity. The family of Petty was altogether obscure and unknown in England, and very insignificant in Ireland, if, indeed, they could be said to be known at all there, for many generations, till the middle of the sixteenth century, when William Petty, the son of a clothier in Romsey, in Hampshire (where Lord Palmerston was also born), attained wealth and subsequently great public distinction by his proficiency, first in mechanical and afterwards in medical pursuits. These latter he followed with infinite profit in Ireland for many years, investing his gains in land and attaining the dignity of knight himself and a barony in her own right for his wife, Baroness Shelburne. One of his sons became the Earl of Shelburne, and famous as a politician in the reign of George II., and is described by Mr. Disraeli in "Coningsby," as one of the greatest politicians in our annals, though the history of what he did is all but unknown to posterity. The earl's son (father of the present marquis), was himself for some time prime minister to George III.; so that we see the subject of our sketch has large hereditary claims to political eminence—a quality, however, which does not seem to be further transmissible, for his son, the present Earl of Shelburne, of whom we have just spoken, though long in parliament for the family borough of Calne, in Wiltshire, and for a brief period a Lord of the Treasury, has never acquired the smallest prominence as a speaker or otherwise. The present Marquis was born in 1780, and consequently is in his seventy-fifth year. He was educated first at Westminster School, subsequently at Edinburgh, where, in common with many others who have since reached prominent stations, he was a pupil of the celebrated Dugald Stewart, and afterwards at Cambridge, where he became a Master of Arts. Availing himself of the brief Peace of Amiens, he made a hurried run through France with M. Pimont, and then took his seat for Calne; his maiden speech being full of promise, which his after efforts fully realised, especially on the impeachment of Lord Melville, for the malversation of public moneys as Treasurer of the Navy. In the first election for Cambridge, which he contested with Lord Palmerston about this time, he succeeded—in the second he was defeated; the latter being owing to his advocacy of civil and religious claims, in contrast with the restrictive and bigoted views then upheld by Pitt's followers. In the budgets brought in by Lord Petty, while Chancellor of the Exchequer to Fox, there was no great room for the exhibition of what may be called popular finance, the war demanding new taxes instead of the remission of old ones; and the necessity of the noble lord to continue the income-tax, which he and his associates had long denounced, exposed him to considerable ridicule, of which the caricaturists of the time were not slow to take advantage; but of his great financial ability no doubt was ever entertained; and to this day few men in either house can deliver a speech more instructive or rich in information on any subject involving an exposition of the true canons of political economy, especially of a fiscal kind. The death of Fox, followed by the brief experiment of Earl Grenville's ministry (who, however, passed the Abolition of Slavery Bill, but were turned out for their support of Catholic emancipation), broke up the Reform party completely, as far as regarded their prospects of office. It was not till 1827 that the modified ministry of Canning gave the most moderate liberals a chance; and, accordingly, his lordship, who had been in the upper house since 1809, was made Home Secretary, an office which he filled with great credit. Again, the death of his chief drove the noble Marquis into opposition, of which he became the leader in the Peers till the formation of the Grey cabinet in 1830, when he became President of the Council, the office now held by Lord John Russell, and continued to fill it during every liberal administration that has since been formed, with the exception of the present, in which he holds no office, though a member of the cabinet. It is needless to add, after what we have stated, that in every cabinet to which he has belonged, and in every position which he has filled, whether in office or opposition, with the exception of private, his lordship has been the warm friend of enlightenment among the people and progressive liberty in all our institutions. His great hereditary wealth, largely augmented by matrimonial alliance with the affluent family of the Hebeesters, he has always employed in a wise munificence, promoting literature and the arts, with a generosity doubly valuable, because of the taste and discrimination that guide it.

THE CONVENT OF SANTA ENGRACIA, AT SARAGOSSA.

Those who have read Napier's invaluable history of the Peninsular War will remember the principal circumstance in modern times for which Saragossa is remarkable. We allude to the famous siege of the place by the French under Marshals Mortier and Lannes, which lasted from July 15, 1808, to Feb. 1, 1809, with only some occasional and slight interruptions. It was not till 6,000 men had perished in battle, and more than 30,000 men, women, and children had been destroyed by famine, pestilence, or cruel outrage, that the French succeeded in taking possession of the city. The siege bore a strong resemblance to that of Jerusalem in the obstinacy of the resistance made, the sufferings of the besieged, and their fatal barbarity towards one another as well as the enemy.

Among other sacred edifices which were then destroyed, was the convent of Santa Engracia, the ruins of which we have depicted

It was founded by Ferdinand and Isabella, whose reign is memorable on many accounts, particularly for its connexion with the immortal discoveries of Columbus. Much has been said in praise of the cloister, which is adorned with marble columns and numerous armorial bearings; but not more than it fairly deserves. In this cloister was buried Jerome Elmeas, the historian of Aragon, who died in 1599. It was over the smoking ruins of the convent that the French forced their way into the city in the terrible siege of 1809. The doorway, now riddled with bullets, is a remarkable work of the fifteenth century. It is thus described by Alexander Delaborda:—"The doorway, which is in the form of an altar screen, consists of two architectural portions. The first is adorned with four columns, and the statue of four bearded ecclesiastics. The second contains three statues, that of the Virgin with the infant Jesus, and those of King Ferdinand V. and his Queen Isabella kneeling on each side. These two portions are surmounted by a cross and statues of the Virgin and St. John. The arch of the door is ornamented with heads of seraphim, and near them are two ancient medallions, above which are written the words 'Numa Pompilius, M. Antonius.' The celebrated traveller adds, that in the interior of the church the decorations in marble and gold were distributed with artistic effect. There might be seen the magnificent mausoleum of the historian, Jerome Zurita, who died in 1570.

A side-door led to a second church, whence there was a descent to the crypt of Las Santas Mosas. "This is," says Delaborde, "a veritable catacomb, in which are deposited the relics of many martyrs. The arched roof, which rises about twelve feet, and is covered with stars upon an azure ground, rests upon thirty small columns of different sorts of marble, forming six small naves. Here are preserved, among other things, several crystal vases containing the blood and ashes of various martyrs, and the head of Saint Eulacia in a silver shrine, adorned with a necklace of precious stones. There is a pit in the middle of this church, surrounded by an iron balustrade, which is said to contain the ashes of a great number of the faithful, whom Dacian had burnt at Saragossa."

Within the last twenty years Saragossa has witnessed fresh proofs of Spanish valour. Cabañero, a general in the interest of Don Carlos, managed to enter the city by night, and got possession of the principal posts, on the 2nd of March, 1838. Even under these apparently desperate circumstances, the people never for one moment lost their courage. Totally unprepared as they were—without leaders, and very insufficiently provided with arms—they nevertheless rushed upon the intruding force with dauntless spirit, and ultimately succeeded in capturing 2,000, and driving out the remainder.

THE CONVENT OF SANTA EULACIA.

THE LAKE OF SAARNEN.

No portion of the continent of Europe abounds in picturesque and romantic scenery to so large an extent as the mountain land of Switzerland. There the most striking and sublime aspects of nature are accumulated, forming a source of perpetual inspiration to the painter and the poet. There the mountain rears its snow-capped summit to the clouds, the glacier presents its glittering and slippery front, and the torrent brawls among the rocks which obstruct its passage through the valley, or falls thundering down the face of almost perpendicular precipices. There the sublime and beautiful phenomenon of the rainbow is seen above the cataract, and the hammer-wheel above the pinnacles of the mountains, marking the bounding chamois or the browsing goat for its prey. Not only is Switzerland the most elevated portion of Europe, but the beauties of its scenery are condensed, as it were; so that the tourist has not to travel over many miles of uninteresting country to admire a waterfall here, or climb a mountain there. In Switzerland all is picturesque; the tourist cannot take a walk of a few miles without meeting some object to awaken his interest and excite his admiration. Everywhere he beholds the mountains towering to the skies, the river rushing through the valley, or the lake spread out before him, its blue waters dotted with the white sails of numerous fishing-boats.

The changes which the aspect of the landscape undergoes at different periods of the day are as varied and beautiful as the scenery itself. Early in the morning a mist envelops the mountains, but as the sun rises above their peaks, it disperses, and the lake reflects the blue sky, against which the snowy summits are distinctly defined. As the sun declines, the lake glows with crimson and gold, and the snow on the mountains gradually changes its hue from white to rose-colour. As the light decreases, the rose changes to purple, and the purple to gray, when the moon rises, and restores the snows the white garb with which they are clothed by day. A constant charm is thus experienced by the traveller as he journeys through this picturesque region, the beauties of which have inspired some of the finest poetry of Coleridge, Byron, and

On the height of Lendenburg was the fortress of the lords who formerly dominated over Unterwald. The ruins of their castle now serve in the summer as rude seats for the inhabitants of the district when they assemble to elect their magistrates and their deputies to the diet. The ancient seat of Austrian tyranny is thus converted into the rustic forum of a free people, where they exercise those rights which their ancestors won at the sword's point, and which they have ever defended with such unexampled heroism.

The courage of the Unterwalden peasants has been displayed on several signal occasions. United with those of Schwitz and Ur from time immemorial, a confederation known as the league of Waldstettin, they were the veritable founders of the Helvetic republic, and took a brilliant part in the glorious battles of Sempach and Morgarten. In 1798, Unterwald, united with its two ancient allies, had another occasion for displaying the courage of its hardy peasantry. These three small cantons repudiated the constitution which had lately been proclaimed in Switzerland

Shelley. The lakes of Switzerland comprise some of its most pleasing scenery, though not the most sublime; and those tourists who are content with gazing at the Alps as they rise from the opposite shore of a wide sheet of water, and whose love of the sublime is not strong enough to urge them to encounter the fatigues and dangers of climbing to the top of Mont Blanc, pass most of their time at the pleasant towns on their shores.

The lake of Saarnen is one of the four small lakes of the canton of Unterwald. It is about three miles in length, and a mile and a half in average breadth. The traveller who crosses the Brunig to reach the lake of the Four Cantons comes upon this little lake, and the town of the same name on its shores. At a little distance is the elevation of Lendenburg, the view from which embraces a varied and extensive panorama. On one side is the lake of Saarnen, surrounded by its picturesque shores, and in the distance the Bernese Alps; on the other side, the river Aar flows through a verdant valley on its way towards the lake of Lucerne, into which it discharges its waters; and beyond, the forest of Kern.

under French influence: all the decrees, all the menaces of the Helvetic directory were in vain. In defending their ancient constitution, they believed that they were defending the conquests over tyranny which had been cemented with the blood of their forefathers. Twelve thousand French troops were marched into the country to subdue them. They met in battle on the 9th September, 1798. The Swiss numbered only two thousand, but held a strong position in the mountains, which they defended during nine hours with unexampled bravery. The women, the old men, the children, all assisted in the combat. Eighteen young men fell, with weapons in their hands, before the chapel erected in memory of Arnold Winkelried. Not far from Stantz, the chief town of Lower Unterwald, forty-five peasants of Nidwalden resisted for a long time the progress of a French battalion. Their undying attachment to their old institutions has led, on several occasions, to serious disputes between the great and little cantons, and it was these differences of opinion that produced the Sonderbund, which agitated the political world in 1846.

THE FOOTPRINTS OF BUDDHA SHAKKYA-MOUNI.

HERODOTUS says in his history: "They show in Scythia a thing worthy of admiration: it is the footprints of Hercules upon a rock near the Tyras." They resemble those of a man, but are two cubits in length." Similar impressions elsewhere have been objects of veneration among the heathen; and at the present day the Buddhists honour, in like manner, the footprints of Shakkya-Mouni, the Buddha of the authentic period, who lived in the sixth century before the Christian era.

The most celebrated of these impressions of the feet of Buddha is that of his left foot, which, according to the Cingalese, is to be seen on the summit of Adam's Peak, in the island of Ceylon. The Arabian navigators of the ninth and fourteenth centuries made known their existence; but they supposed them to have been made by the feet of Adam. A Moslem tradition, mentioned by Marco Polo, states, that Adam was buried on this same mountain. Barbosa, Diego de Cento, Ribeiro, Baldaus, Laloubère, R. Knox, Philalèthes, Valenty, John Davy, and a great number of other travellers, have noticed and authenticated the existence of these impressions. Similar traces have been observed in different parts of Asia, especially on the coast of the peninsula of Malacca, opposite Sahan, Salang, or Junk-Ceylan, on the mountain Sāwanna Cappa-hat, or Khan-pha-phat-batt—that is, the holy mountain of Buddha's footsteps; at Nagpuri, on the mountain Khon-nang-rung, in Northern Laos; on the banks of the Jumna; on those of the Ganges; at Gangutini, in a temple on the coast of Tenasserim, north of Tavoy, etc. Another formerly existed at Mecca; and it is probable, that the fact of the spot being already consecrated by the veneration paid to this remarkable footmark contributed to render it the cradle of the new religion. Colonel Symes, during his embassy in Ava, made a drawing of one of these singular impressions, which is shown near Prome. Captain James Low has lithographed another, from a drawing made by a Siamese artist, which the Buddhist priests assured him was an accurate representation of the veritable footprint of Buddha, held in veneration throughout the kingdom of Siam. In this lithograph our engraving is taken.

The impressions that are regarded as the real footprints of Buddha are not the only objects of public worship in the countries in which the ancient creed is held: on account of their rarity, imitations are made, and placed in the temples for the adoration of the faithful. In this manner they form symbols of the principal Buddhist sects. The one we have represented presents a curious mixture of the symbols of Brahminism with those of Buddhism. In fact, the Siamese do not profess the pure faith of Buddha, which, among them, has been considerably modified by Hindoo influences. The priests communicated to Captain Low a portion of a Pali book explaining these symbols, a roll of which, consisting of fifty eight-syllabled verses, is recited in the temples as an invocation. Captain Low has added to his drawing an explanation of the numerous signs of which it is composed, but unfortunately without letters of reference. Eugène Burnouf has since given a more complete development of the subject in his "Lotus de la bonne Loi." We borrow from these two authors a very summary interpretation of the whole series of symbols, which will serve to guide our readers through the labyrinth of subjects presented by the engraving.

The five toes are represented by five flowers of the dek-pehkuu. In the centre is the tehakra, the shield frequently carried on the arm of Brahma or of Vishnu, a wheel of fire, an instrument of torture in the Siamese hell, a threatening comet in the heavens, a sign of disaster, a type of universal dominion, and a symbol of eternity. Before the image of the tehakra the devout Buddhists cover their faces with their hands, and cry: "Behold the Krong-châk, and its glorious splendour!" In the fourth row, on the left of the tehakra, is the pyramidal tiara of Buddha, a symbol of the sun, called in Siamese, the nanngant.

Watta-sang-ho, the shell baricium (in the centre and near the wheel, resting on a support). A great quantity of these shells are exported to Bengal. The five toes of the footprint drawn by

* See "Historical Educator," vol. i. p. 226. No mention has been made of this imprint by modern travellers. The river here mentioned by Herodotus is supposed to be the Danester.

Colonel Symes are represented by as many of these watta-sang-ho. According to the fable, Buddha assumed this figure previous to his last incarnation. The Buddhists attach great value to these spiral shells, and Crawford says that one of them has been sold for a sum equal to £200 sterling.

The Buddhist pot, or the bat-ku-int-hanna of the Siamese priests. According to Eugène Burnouf, the pānakalāsaya (in Sanscrit), a full water-pot—sometimes several pots carried on a board.

Swiga, the sun in his chariot, sometimes called kassapa. (Fourth compartment of the fifth row, on the left of the tehakra.)

Chand-hina, or phra-chan, the moon drawn by horses. The moon or chandra is generally represented by the Hindoos as drawn by antelopes. (Fifth compartment of the third row, on the left of the tehakra.)

Nak-hata, the polar star.

The talapat-nung, or ordinary umbrella, formed of the leaves of the talipot-tree, a species of palm. (The compartment forming the right-hand corner immediately above the tehakra.)

In the same division are two trumpets of peculiar form.

The tambai-lakchai, the royal standard, with seven divisions, used by certain Buddhist sects as a symbol of Mount Merou.

The passato, or Siamese prasat, a square palace, richly ornamented and having a roof of spiral form; called in Sanscrit, according to Eugène Burnouf, prāsābhaya.

The pi-thakang (in Siamese, tiung-t-lang), the bed of gold.

The hualungko (in Siamese, t-hen-ban-luang), the bed of repose, or, more probably, the altar of Buddha, that is placed in the areas of the temples, and on which worshippers deposit their offerings of flowers and fruit. Eugène Burnouf calls it the golden litter or palanquin.

The d-há-chung (in Siamese, t-hong-chai), a pavilion.

The pato (in Siamese, t-hong-thadot), a paper flag.

K-hau-han-pâ, the royal palanquin, or covered litter.

The t-pat-t-hung, or chat-thong (Siamese), a kind of chalice.

Hachani (in Siamese, p-hatchani), the royal fan.

Mount Merou (in Siamese, Meru-rot and Khan-peamin). According to the Buddhists, it has eight conical summits rising one above another.

The seven great rivers that flow between the hills of Mount Merou: satt-ha-maha-k-huang-ka, in Siamese, watun-yai-cho. (First compartment in the second row, on the right of the tehakra.)

The six celestial worlds. (Four compartments, commencing at the fourth row, and concluding at the seventh.)

The sixteen worlds of Brahma. (Three compartments adjoining the preceding.)

The four dwipas, or divisions of the world, represented by the heads framing the designs that indicate the particular characteristics of each of the four quarters of the globe.

The chawp-hu-thipa, or the janbon-dwipa. It has a form analogous to that of a coach, and it is said to have been formerly covered by the waters. Men lived upon it to the age of a hundred years, subsisting by the sweat of their brows—that is, by labour.

Anuwanak-koyant, or circular dwipa, the inhabitants of which are of the figure of the full moon, are twenty cubits high, and live six hundred years; invisible hands bring them all the nourishment they desire.

U-wakka-ro, or dwipa of a square form, an isle of the north, the men of which are more than twenty cubits high, and live five hundred years. The tree kappa-phrick supplies them with all that they require.

Bupp-hawit-ho, or dwipa in the form of a crescent, or the moon at seven days old. The inhabitants are likewise of the crescent form; they live four hundred years, are sixteen cubits high, and subsist on the air.

The tree called eko-ekkh-ho, situated in the centre of the earth, supposed to be the kalkirj of India. The perfumes which it exhales ravish the senses, and its foliage, agitated by the zephyrs, fill the air with harmonious sounds. It has four branches directed towards the four cardinal points, and when the fruit on the northern branch is ripe, it drops into the northern ocean to supply the fish with food. The fruit on the eastern branch is changed into gold, and that of the western branch into diamonds.

Maha-saund-ho (according to Burnouf, saundhaya), the great ocean that surrounds the four principal dvipas. (Second compartment of the first outside row, on the left of the tebhakra.)

T-hawini-sahasta-parivara, the two thousand little dvipas, or islands that surround the four great dvipas.

Tebhakra-wallay, the horizon that, under the form of a wall, surrounds Mount Merou. (The space in the centre of the first outside row, in the form of the wall of a fortress.)

Chattancha, the sectatehhat-roya of Eugène Burnouf; a parasol of seven rows, in allusion to the seven cones of Mount Merou.

Hemawa or Himaba, the mountain-chain of Himalaya, in the north of India.

Satta-naha-kara, (in Siamese, sakai-cha), the seven great lakes of the Himalaya range, abounding with fish and the lotus plant. (Third compartment of the first range, on the left of the tebhakra, divided into seven squares.)

Sakiy-nak-ha, or saki-nak-ha, the red elephant of Himala; according to Colebrooke, the emblem of the second Jaina.

Tri-watthacha, or rather, tri-wastaya, a diamond ornament, a collar or necktie; a sign of prosperity.

Wataba, part of the head-dress that falls down at the back of the head.

These explanations, confused and incomplete as they are in some respects, are, nevertheless, sufficient to show that the figures represented have not been designed at hazard, or without a purpose. The majority of the more prominent are designed to shadow forth the power and dignity of Buddha. "Thus," says Eugène Burnouf, "we first observe the mystic signs that announce the prosperity and grandeur of him of whom they are the impressum. Then follow a long series of material objects, as the dress, the arms, the furniture, that are, in the eyes of the Hindoos, the appurtenances of regal power. From the physical world are borrowed those that are more striking and impressive: the sun, the ocean, the mountains, the animals that are most remarkable or terrible of all, whether amongst quadrupeds or birds; finally, the plants that are most remarkable for the elegance of their forms, or the brilliancy of their colours. The supernatural world has also furnished images of the first of the gods, according to the Brahmins; those of the celestial world, and the various classes of genii that inhabit it, according to the Buddhists." Of the remainder, Burnouf observes, that such a confused assemblage of figures is not in accordance with Hindoo and the ancient Egyptians, has its esoteric form, in which we find much to admire and commend, so much more pure and elevated is it than the absurd myths that have been grafted upon it. The mythologies of Egypt and India were founded upon the the purity of the Buddhist religion; and we may, perhaps, attribute them to the gross superstition of the Siamese. The more enlightened Buddhists of China and Japan admit, upon the representation of the footprint of Buddha, only the chakra, the symbol of eternity. Buddhism, in fact, like the religious systems of the symbols used by the hierophants to convey religious instruction to the ignorant masses, and we look in vain among the popular creeds of the far East for the elevated philosophy of the Vedas, and the axioms of pure morality to be found in the ancient scriptures of Buddha.

THE AMERICAN RED-WINGED STARLING.

THE AMERICAN RED-WINGED STARLING (AGELAIUS PHOENICEUS).

THE appearance of the common European starling (Sturnus vulgaris) is too well known to need description. In captivity his docility and liveliness render him a very common favourite, whilst his bad character as a depredator gives him considerable interest in the eyes of dwellers in the country, although it not unfrequently leads to his destruction. Our North American ornithologists, following their usual practice of giving the Old World names to the most familiar natural objects in their adopted homes, soon found a bird which resembled the starling of the old country in its habits, and to a certain extent also in its form, and to this they easily transferred the name of the well known inhabitant of the home they had left behind them.

In colour, however, the American starling (Aythya phœniceus) is very different from its European name-ake, and, in fact, the male and female are so very distinct in appearance, that they would never be taken for the two sexes of the same bird by any one unacquainted with their habits. The male is of a beautiful glossy black, with the shoulders scarlet; the female is brownish black above, mottled and streaked with brown or white; the head has two stripes of cream colour on each side over the eye; and the lower surface is of a whitish cream colour, streaked and spotted with black. The male measures about nine inches in length, the female a little more than seven. In colour the young male bird greatly resembles the female, but soon begins to show indications of belonging to the superior sex in the reddish markings of his shoulders, a distinction of which the females are always destitute.

This bird is found over a great range of country, extending from Mexico in the south to Labrador in the north; in the northern states it appears to be a migratory bird, but in the southern parts of the Union it remains all the year round. In these states the starlings collect during the winter in immense flocks, frequenting the old rice and corn-fields, where they contrive to glean an abundant supply of nutritious food. During the spring and summer their food generally consists of grubs, caterpillars, and other insects, for which they search with the greatest diligence in every direction. Wilson, the American ornithologist, who has devoted considerable space to an attempt to justify this bird from the aspersions which have been cast upon his character, well observes, that these insect-eaters "the silent, but deadly enemies of all vegetation, whose secret and insidious attacks are more to be dreaded by the husbandman than the combined forces of the whole feathered tribes together." Hence he considers that the starlings, by destroying these pests, do far more service to the agriculturist than would compensate for any damage they may do him in other respects, for unfortunately, it cannot be denied that the stigma upon their character is but too well founded. For their principal attacks upon the farmer's property the starlings select the months of August and September, when the ears of the Indian corn are young, soft, and succulent, and present a temptation too great to be resisted. "At this time," says Wilson, "reinforced by numerous and daily flocks from all parts of the interior, they pour down on the low countries in prodigious multitudes. Here they are seen, like vast clouds, wheeling and driving over the meadows and devoted corn-fields, darkening the air with their numbers. Then commences the work of destruction on the corn, the husks of which, though composed of numerous envelopments of closely-wrapped leaves, are soon completely or partially torn off; while from all quarters myriads continue to pour down like a tempest, blackening half an acre at a time; and, if not disturbed, repeat their depredations till little remains but the cob and the shrivelled skins of the grain. What little is left of the tender ear, being exposed to the rains and weather, is generally much injured." Truly, we cannot much wonder at the existence of a prejudice against these birds, or that the damage done, which forces itself very strongly upon the observation, should considerably outweigh, in the minds of the agriculturist, the hidden benefits which the philosopher tells him he receives in another way from the plunderers.

In the air the red-winged starlings present a beautiful appearance. Wilson, who observed them in Virginia when collected into their winter flocks in the months of January and February, tells us that they frequently entertained him with their "aerial evolutions." "Sometimes," he says, "they appeared driving about like an enormous black cloud carried before the wind, varying its shape every moment. Sometimes suddenly rising from the fields around me with a noise like thunder; while the glittering of innumerable wings of the brightest vermilion amid the black cloud they formed, produced on these occasions a very striking and splendid effect. Then descending like a torrent, and covering the branches of some detached grove, or clump of trees, the whole aggregated multitude commenced one general concert or chorus, that I have plainly distinguished at the distance of more than two miles; and, when listened to at the intermediate space of about a quarter of a mile, with a slight breeze of wind to swell and soften the flow of its cadences, was to me grand, and even sublime." The elements of this song, as described by our author, do not, however, appear to have anything very attractive about them. He says that "when taken alive, or reared from the nest, it soon becomes familiar, and sings frequently, bristling out its feathers. These notes, though not remarkably various, are very peculiar. The most common one resembles the syllables cook-que-ree; others, the shrill sounds produced by filing a saw; some are more guttural; and others remarkably clear. The most usual note of both male and female is a single chuck." In some instances the red-winged starling, like his European representative, has been taught to articulate words pretty distinctly.

These birds pair about the middle of April, and build their nests at the end of that month or the beginning of May. For this purpose they generally select a tuft of bushes in a marshy or swampy situation, where they build at a height of six or seven feet from the ground. The outside of the nest is formed of rushes and long grass picked from the swamp; it is lined with finer materials. The female lays about five eggs of a very pale blue colour, slightly tinged here and there with purple, and marked with lines and spots of black. "During the time the female is sitting," says the author from whom we have already quoted, and whose work on the American birds leaves nothing to be desired, "and still more particularly after the young are hatched, the male, like most other birds that build in low situations, exhibits the most violent symptoms of apprehension and alarm on the approach of any person to its near neighbourhood. Like the lapwing of Europe, he lies to meet the intruder, hovers at a short height over-head, uttering loud notes of distress; and while in this situation, displays to great advantage the rich glowing scarlet of his wings, heightened by the jetty black of his general plumage. As the danger increases, his cries become more shrill and incessant, and his motions rapid and restless; the whole meadow is alarmed, and a collected crowd of his fellows hover around, and mingle their notes of alarm and agitation with his. When the young are taken away, or destroyed, he continues for several days near the place, restless and dejected, and generally recommences building soon after in the same meadow."

LORDS AND COMMONS.

PARLIAMENTARY ORATORS AND ORATORY.

WE close our list with an Irish orator, the fame of whose eloquence had preceded him when he took his seat in the house. Under such circumstances, it is perilous for any man to attempt to speak. The fear of failure at such times is great; and that will often realise what the orator seeks to avoid. It is one of Mr. Sheil's many claims on our admiration, that, having been an energetic, enthusiastic, and successful leader in a great popular, or rather a great national movement, he should have had the taste and tact so to subdue his nature in the very hour of triumph as afterwards to adapt his speaking to the tone most agreeable to the house, and to charm them as much by the fire of his eloquence as by the delicacy of his rhetorical artifices, without the aid of those stronger and more stirring stimulants to the passions which form the very essence of successful oratory. More brilliant speeches were made in Ireland during the continuance of the agitation of the Emancipation of the Catholics. At the same time some of his efforts in the House of Commons were unsurpassed; for instance, alluding to the charge that the Irish were aliens, in 1837, what can be more magnificent than the following? "Where was Arthur, Duke of Wellington, when those words were uttered? Methinks he should have started up to disclaim them.

"The battles, sieges, fortunes, that he'd passed" ought to have come back on him. He ought to have remembered that, from the earliest achievement in which he displayed that military genius which has placed him foremost in the annals of modern warfare, down to that last and surpassing combat which has made his name imperishable—from Assaye to Waterloo—the Irish soldiers with whom your armies were filled were the inseparable auxiliary to the glory with which his unparalleled successes have been crowned. Whose were the athletic arms that drove your bayonets at Vimiera through the platanus that never reeled in the shock of arms before? What desperate valour climbed the steeps and filled the mounds of Badajos? All, all his victories should have rushed and crowded back upon his memory—Vimiera, Badajos, Salamanca, Albuera, Toulouse, and last of all, the greatest. Tell me—for you were there—I appeal to the gallant soldier before me (pointing to Sir H. Hardinge), who hears, I know, a generous heart in an intrepid breast; tell me—for you must needs remember on that day when the destinies of mankind were trembling in the balance, while death fell in showers upon them; when the artillery of France, levelled with the precision of the most deadly science, played upon them; when her legions, incited by the voice, inspired by the example, of their mighty leader, rushed again and again to the contest;—tell me if for an instant (when to hesitate for an instant was to be lost) the aliens blanched? And when, at length, the moment for the last decisive movement had arrived; when the valour so long wisely checked was at last let loose; when, with words familiar but immortal, the Great Captain exclaimed, "Up, lads, and at them!"—tell me if Catholic Ireland, with less heroic valour than the natives of your own glorious isle, precipitated herself upon the foe. The blood of England, Scotland, Ireland, flowed in the same stream on the same field; when the chill morning dawned their dead lay cold and stark together; in the same deep pit their bodies were deposited; the green arm of spring is now breaking on their unmingled dust; the dew from heaven falls upon their union in the grave. Partakers in every peril, in the glory shall we not participate? And shall we be told, as a requital, that we are estranged from the noble country for whose salvation our life-blood was poured out? As an instance of Sheil's power of sarcasm, the following is one of the best:—One day, at a meeting of the Catholic Association, a volunteer came forward with a very inflammatory harangue, and offered to lay his head on the block in the cause of Ireland. Mr. Sheil rose immediately after and said, "The honourable gentleman has just made us an oblation of his head; he has accompanied his offer with abundant evidence of the value of the sacrifice." Sheil was an artist of the highest order—poetical, and sensitive; if oratory be an art, it is an art he had mastered to perfection.

We have now finished our survey of English parliamentary oratory down to the present time. Of the living, we have yet to speak. With rare exceptions, what we hear now seems cold and tame compared with what fired our fathers' heart in the contests of the past.

If our readers have never been to the House of Lords, let them take a description of a debate in that frigid zone from one who has. In one of his novels, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Right Honourable Benjamin Disraeli, thus describes the scene:—"The Duke of St. James took the oath and his seat. He was introduced by Lord Fitz-Pompey. He heard a debate. We laugh at such a thing, especially in the upper house; but, on the whole, the affair is imposing, particularly if we take a part in it. Lord Ex-Chamberlain thought the nation going on wrong, and he made a speech full of currency and constitution. Baron Deprivity seconded him with great effect, brief but bitter, satirical and sly. The Earl of Quarterday answered these, full of confidence in the nation and in himself. When the debate was getting heavy, Lord Snap jumped up to give them something light. The Lords do not encourage wit, and so are obliged to put up with pettiness. But Viscount Memoir was very statesmanlike, and reported a part of universal history. Then there was Lord Easy, who vindicated his character when nobody knew he had one, and explained his motives because his auditors could not understand his acts. Then there was a maiden speech so inaudible that it was doubted after all whether the young orator really did lose his virginity. In the end, up started the premier, who, having nothing to say, was noisily and candid and liberal, gave credit to his adversary and credit to himself, and then the motion was withdrawn. While all this was going on, some made a note and some a bet, some consulted a book, some their eyes, some yawned, a few slept. When a new law that debases in the Lords have grown livelier since the bygone constitution was written—rather the reverse is the case. The real combat, the battle of party is fought in the lower not the upper chamber."

At this time the upper house is singularly deficient of energy. On the ministerial side of the house you have a catastrophe of all. The head of the cabinet,

"The travelled Thane—Athenian Aberdeen," has never shone in debate. It has never been his fate

"The applause of listening senators to command."

In person he is of a spare figure, rather above the middle size, plain and sedate in his garb and bearing. His style of oratory is grave and dignified, with a dash of bonadity, and his manner somewhat monotonous. He never fails to command the attention of the house; but that attention is due to his exact possession of the great experience of political ability, and to his masterful rather than to manner.

THE ASSYRIAN BAS-RELIEFS IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM

HAVING in a former volume* given a general account of Mr. Layard's researches at Nineveh, and a sketch of the ancient history of that long-buried city, it is only necessary in the present article to describe the subjects of the illustrations with which we now present the reader. On returning to the scene of his former labours in 1849, Mr. Layard's first visit was to the excavations which had been made at Kouyunjik, during his absence, under the direction of Mr. Ross. The walls of two chambers had been exposed, but of the long series of bas-reliefs which covered them the greater part had been defaced by the flames which destroyed the palace. Some passages had been excavated, into which Mr. Layard descended, and explored the great hall, the bas-reliefs of which had also suffered greatly from the fire. "In this series of bas-reliefs," says he, "the history of an Assyrian conquest was more fully portrayed than in any other yet discovered, from the going out of the monarch to battle, to his triumphal return after a complete victory." The king, with his war-chariots and horsemen, appears to have passed through a mountainous and wooded country, the physical characteristics of which seem to indicate Armenia or Kurdistan, regions which we know were invaded by the royal host of the palace. In some of the bas-reliefs, the Assyrians are represented in combat with the enemy, who appear to be defeated and overthrown. The Assyrian warriors are armed with spears and bows, and with which weapons they use at full speed; the enemy appear to be all archers. In other compartments the enemy are to be seen, prostrate by the victorious Assyrians, who thrust them the necks of their spears, and trample them beneath the feet of their war-horses. The campaign appears to have been successful, and the king of the conqueror flows, in which he is seated on his throne, beneath the royal parasol, the emblem of royalty over S. Asia, attended by dismounted soldiers, and surrounded by horses, richly caparisoned, and in various ways. State functions, and a triumph by all the signs of evidences of power, the Assyrian monarch is shown, surrounded by the spoil, and the heads of the fallen, the king is shown throwing the ghosts of the slain, who lay in the hands of the conqueror, round the number in their riddle. The bas-reliefs are arranged in two rows in the palace, and all, so that a complete view of the scene is obtained in the latter country it is now held by the present Sultan. In other compartments, the king is shown, surrounded by his attendants, and his or at least of some country north of Assyria, though only a conjecture, is one which is strongly supported by the nature of the country through which the invaders marched, as represented on the sculptured walls of these chambers. But during the latter part of Mr. Layard's residence at Mosul, a chamber was excavated in the mound at Kouyunjik in which the sculptures were in better condition than any which had hitherto been discovered. They represented the siege and capture by the Assyrians of a city defended by double walls and battlemented towers, and some of the slabs were almost entire, and the inscription on the upper part complete. The are planted against the walls, which the Assyrians ascend, holding their shields before them to protect themselves from the arrows of the enemy. A portion of the city appears to be already in the hands of the assailants, for a long train of captives, camels, and carts drawn by oxen, and filled with women, children, arms, furniture, etc., is seen issuing from an advanced fort, and approaching the throne of the Assyrian monarch. city, the capture of which appears to have taxed all the military resources of the empire, was situated among hills and forests, and the vine and the fig-tree grew in its environs. A compact phalanx of archers discharge their arrows at the enemy on the walls and towers; seven battering-rams are directed against the walls; and ten mounds of stone, bricks, and earth have been thrown up to command them. The place appears to have been defended with a degree of courage and determination commensurate with the prepara-similar to those worn at the present day by the Arabs of the Hedjaz, and the helmets worn by the defenders of the city differ from those of the Assyrians, in having a fringed lappet covering the ears. Some of the prisoners are being slain before the throne of the king; two are stretched naked upon the ground to be flayed alive, and others are being impaled by their captors beneath the walls.

Above the king is an inscription of four lines of cuneiform or arrow-headed character, which Mr. Layard thus translates:

rations of the besiegers. The battlements are thronged with bowmen and slingers, who discharge showers of arrows and stones against the Assyrians, while others throw blazing torches, with the view of destroying the warlike engines rolled against their walls. On the stage of the battering-rams archers are discharging their arrows, to drive the enemy from the part of the wall against which the attack is directed; and others are pouring water from ladles upon the blazing torches thrown from the walls. Senmcherib, the mighty king, king of the country of Assyria, sitting on the throne of judgment, before me at the entrance to the city of Lakhish (Lakh-sha). I give permission for its capture. Here we have, then, an actual pictorial representation of the siege and capture of Lakhish by Senmcherib, king of Assyria, as mentioned in 2 Kings xviii. 14, and Isaiah xxxvi. 2. The interest which attaches to these bas-reliefs is increased by the fact that there is in this case no doubt whatever of the scene represented being what Mr. Layard supposes. The physiognomy of the captives is undoubtedly Jewish—a type of countenance recognisable at the first glance by every observer, and about which there can be no mistake. That the king represented is Sennacherib, is equally certain. A continuous inscription, consisting of a hundred and fifty-two lines, slightly injured, but still sufficiently legible to be deciphered almost throughout, appears on the massive bulls forming the grand entrance of the palace at Kouyunjik. This record contains the annals of six years of the reign of Sennacherib, besides numerous interesting particulars respecting the religion and mythology of the Assyrians, and is therefore of the highest importance. Dr. Hincks was the first to decipher the name of Sennacherib on inscribed bricks from Kouyunjik; but it was not until August, 1851, that an inscription was discovered which mentioned any historical event, thus placing the matter beyond a doubt. The honour of this discovery is due to Colonel Rawlinson, who has given a translation of this remarkable inscription which forms a complete summary of the events related in the Bible, and by Josephus, Abydenus, and Polyhistor. "As the name of Sennacherib," says Mr. Layard, "as well as those of many kings, countries, and cities, are not written phonetically, that is, by letters having a certain alphabetic value, but by monograms, and the deciphering of them is a peculiar process which may sometimes appear suspicious to those not acquainted with the subject, a few words of explanation may not be unacceptable to my readers. The greater number of Assyrian proper names with which we are acquainted, whether royal or not, appear to have been made up of the name, epithet, or title, of one of the national deities, and of a second word, such as 'slave of,' 'servant of,' 'beloved by,' 'protected by,' like the Theodosius, Theodorus, etc. of the Greeks, and the Abd-ullah, and Abd-ur-Rahman of Mahomedan nations. The names of the gods being commonly written with a monogram, the first step in deciphering is to know which god this particular sign denotes. Thus, in the name of Sennacherib, we have first the determinative of 'god,' to which no phonetic value is attached; whilst the second character denotes an Assyrian god, whose name was Sam." As to the identity of the Lakhisha of the inscription with the Lakhish of the Bible, Colonel Rawlinson has expressed doubts, but the reading of Mr. Layard is supported by the opinion of Dr. Hincks, one of the first orientalisks of the day. Moreover, the name of Hezekiah occurs in the inscription, and the amount of treasure taken from the Jewish king in gold is stated precisely as we find it in the Old Testament. "Had the name stood alone," says Mr. Layard, in commenting on the identification of the builder of the palace at Kouyunjik with the Sennacherib of the sacred volume, "we might reasonably have questioned the correctness of the reading, especially as the signs or monograms, with which it is written, are admitted to have no phonetic power. But when characters, whose alphabetic values have been determined from a perfectly distinct source, such as the Babylonian column of the trilingual inscriptions, furnish us with names in the records attributed to Sennacherib, written almost identically as in the Hebrew version of the Bible, such as Hezekiah, Jerusalem, Judah, Sidon, and others, and all occurring in one and the same paragraph, their reading moreover confirmed by synchronisms, and illustrated by sculptured representations of the events, the identification must be admitted to be complete."

THE WALLACHIAN ROBBER.—III.

Poor Zdenku was filled with serious anxiety. He racked his brain to no purpose in the attempt to discover why the formidable woman was so severe upon him. Meanwhile, his wife had managed to get an inkling of what was in the wind. From the glances of Maruschka and Dschurdschu upon Wantscha, who was crouching down in the corner, as well as from the alarm betrayed by Wantscha's looks, she gathered more than was spoken. Perhaps she also, with womanly ingenuity, guessed what had taken place at the garden-gate. At all events delay seemed to her dangerous, for she immediately sprang upon her daughter like a wild cat, dragged her out of the corner, forced her down upon the stone floor, and exclaimed: "She is your slave, body and soul, mistress! Tie a stone about her neck and throw her into the Teneb where it is deepest; fasten her to a post and whip her till she stands in a pool of blood; tie her hands behind her back and sell her to the Turks! Do what you please with her, only do not withdraw from us your protection and favour."

Wantscha, who had in the meantime a little recovered from her surprise, attempted to resist. But her efforts were all in vain. Her mother kept her down with hand and knee, and compelled her by blows to submit to her fate. Zdenku stared in blank astonishment at the strange scene, which was a new riddle to him, instead of a solution of the former one. But Maruschka smiled with malicious satisfaction, and after watching the woman's unmotherly behaviour for some time, at last said: "Let the girl alone, Czinka. And you, Wantscha, come to me; I will offer you a bit of good advice—mind you give it a wise hearing."

The ill-used girl arose, and, while she arranged her disordered hair and smoothed down her clothes, she looked in no humour to listen favourably to any advice. She shot malicious glances at Maruschka, and every now and then flashed scorn and indignation at Dschurdschu. But Maruschka took care not to be discomposed by her untoward looks and behaviour. With an apparently friendly tone, which was only redeemed from hypocrisy by the touch of scorn with which her soft words were seasoned, she said: "I think you are a good child to your father and mother. They both love you beyond measure. There is only one thing that lies nearer their heart than their own child, namely—what is quite reasonable—their own welfare. They would, perhaps, not hesitate to sacrifice their life and their property to save your life; but assuredly they will not lose all they have just to gratify your whim. Do you understand me, Wantscha. Are you aware that your father and mother are beggars, the moment I withdraw my protecting hand from their flocks, their threshing-floors, and their house? If not, let me tell you so now. They will, therefore, find some means of conquering your stubborn will; and even if they had not the power to do this, I am sure you are much too good a daughter to bring down a curse upon your father's house and plunge those to whom you owe your existence into the deepest misery. You would not exact such a sacrifice at their hands, even to save your life. You are too dutiful and too noble for that."

Wantscha burst into tears. Her spirit was broken. As soon as the powerful mistress declared herself a sinner in the name of Dschurdschu, the poor girl abandoned all idea of resistance. Maruschka could brook no refusal at any time, and her tyrannical disposition was now irritated by the keen sting of jealousy. Nobody knew better than Wantscha how to act on the spur of the moment. Hence, resigning herself to her fate, she said with repeated sobs: "I obey, mistress."

"You do well," said Maruschka, and turning to Zdenku, added: "Join the hands of this pair together. Your daughter consents to become the bride of my faithful servant."

Full of joy, the rough old Dschurdschu sprang towards the poor girl, who offered no opposition to his embraces. At last light broke in upon the English peasant, her father. "Is that all?" muttered he. "I was wondering what would come of all your threats. It was hardly worth while to talk so ominously just for this. However, it is all one to me. You have got a good wife, old fellow, and a nice little property. Take her, and may Heaven bless you both!"

With these words he betrothed his daughter to an old man, whose only recommendation was his being a protégé of the overbearing female robber. Czinka laid her hands on the heads of the affianced pair, and said, as she thought of Petru's dangerous schemes, "That trouble also is now at an end; we shall be able to sleep in peace. God be praised for this!"

Maruschka and the happy bridegroom remained all night at Mlakaberg. The amazon was even gracious enough to spend a great part of the morning there, and at last sat down to a late breakfast which served as the betrothment feast, which was prolonged beyond all expectation. Her malicious exultation over Wantscha's hardly-repressed tears gave an additional relish to the food, and the flask which her husband left behind also contributed to lengthen her stay. She did not move from her seat till she had completely drained every drop of the liquor. By that time the day was far advanced, and their departure, which was originally fixed for the morning, did not take place till the afternoon. The trees on the mountains were already stretching their broad shadows towards Turkey, when the poor lass at length found an opportunity of giving vent to her feelings with tears in quiet retirement, while her merciless tormentor and hated bridegroom were romping through the wood.

Both the travellers stept on apace, looking anxiously around, and listening attentively to every sound, like sportsmen who in unfrequented wilds make war upon the animal creation. After they had gone a good distance, Maruschka stopped at a steep elevation, from which she looked down into a valley where a herd of wild bears were taking their midday repose on the marshy soil. It was not, however, the wild bears that attracted her attention. She had seen in the distance beyond, the shadow of a man moving among the trees. The man had disappeared amid the foliage, before she had time to distinguish who he was. After a time the form appeared again through an opening in the trees, and De-hund-schu, who observed it, could not help exclaiming, "It is Mickles! What can he want here?"

"We shall soon know," replied Maruschka, upon which she put two fingers in her mouth and gave a shrill whistle, which echoed far and wide. The man sprang with a sudden bound behind the trees before he ventured to look round. But when he had done so, he came slowly out from his concealment, waving his hat, and indicating by his friendly greeting that he recognised his leader's wife. He was a Hungarian by descent, named Nicholas, which the old Wallachian corrupted into Mickles.

Maruschka beckoned him to come over to her. He assented, and immediately disappeared for the purpose, but did not take the shortest way. Probably he thought it advisable to avoid the armed cavaliers, and the furious wild sow with her numerous tribe of young ones. In this uncultivated region the wild bear still retains its original fierceness, though in Germany its nature is so far softened that a single shot is sufficient to put a whole herd to flight. Mickles came cautiously on, but all the more safely. "Where have you come from?" asked Maruschka, "and whence are you going to?" "To our chief," replied Mickles. "There is likely to be a capture. The imperialists started very early this morning on a hunting expedition upon the mountain. One of them has missed his way. They are blowing the horn and calling out for him like mad ones. He must be a good prize, otherwise they would not make so much noise about him."

"By the time you get up to where he is, they will have found him long ago," said Maruschka.

Mickles put his finger to his nose, and said "Yes, if they know what I know. They are looking for him up there, but he is on the other side. I saw him fire down in the ravine. I stood on the top of the mountain and listened on both sides, while they could not hear anything. The man has fired at least six times, and each time further away from the right path."

Maruschka winked with a smile of satisfaction. "You must be right," said she, "and I will accompany you to hunt the huntsman."

THE WATER-CARRIERS OF PERU.

LIMA, the capital of Peru, labours under the serious disadvantage of not being well supplied with water. Rain rarely falls in the neighbourhood, so that the inhabitants are forced to depend upon artificial means of obtaining this indispensable blessing. Even in what we are accustomed to call barbarous ages—before the existence of the vast continent of America was known or conjectured in Europe—the Incas of Peru had given proof of their civilisation by making many canals and trenches to convey water into the capital. The Spaniards, fully appreciating the nature of these works, paid great attention to keeping them in order; but they are now in so bad a condition that the inhabitants are obliged to buy all their drinking water of men who procure it from the huge fountain in the Plaza Mayor, and go round the city with it on the backs of asses, as represented in the annexed engraving (p. 72).

Of all asses in Peru, the aguador, or water-carrier, of Lima, is the most laborious, the steadiest, and the most patient. He begins work at six in the morning and does not rest till seven in the evening. A few handfuls of bran, which he carries in a little bag hanging on his neck, constitute the whole of his food for the day, and at night he contents himself with some stray blades of grass that he manages to pick up from any odd corner where he can find them. He is anything but stupid, in the sense of being without intelligence. As soon as he reaches the fountain, laden with the two casks for containing the water, he turns round and stands still while the negro gets off, fills the casks, and takes the pad out of the bell. They then both proceed on their way through the city. The poor animal knows when and where he has to deliver water. He knows that after supplying such a house, he has to go to such another. If he has occasion to stop, his master may leave him all day, with the certainty of finding him still standing where he left him. Those of the customers who are at all good-natured leave a box for him at their kitchen door, containing all sorts of odd bits that may suit his palate. He shows his sense of their kind consideration by eagerly devouring whatever they bestow upon him, though it is often scarcely fit to eat, consisting of bits of old hats, greasy papers, bones, and other indigestible odds and ends. The choicest delicacies are husks of melons.

But carrying water is not the only purpose for which this useful animal is employed. He is a general carrier, used for conveying all sorts of things from one part of the town to the other; and not unfrequently for moving furniture, vast heaps of which, in the shape of chairs, boxes, tables, &c., are carelessly piled upon his back, as seen in the lower part of our illustration. If, at sometimes happens, he is overloaded, or loses his equilibrium, the whole collection of moveables comes down with a crash, and the driver, fearful of not gaining anything by his job, revenges himself upon the poor beast without much mercy.

When the ass is employed neither in carrying water nor moving—as, for example, on festival days—he gets his recreation by taking the whole family of his proprietor on his back, or racing with some of his comrades, whose masters go with his own from one place of amusement to another. Some men, who are a little more thoughtful or kind than others, endeavour to lighten the labour and save the strength of the ass by going on foot with him when the water-casks are full; but these are exceptions to the general rule. In most cases the poor animals are subject to much reckless barbarity, which fills the foreigner with indignation on his first arrival at Lima. To save the trouble of whipping, the wretches who drive them make a path behind with a bone or sharp piece of wood, and then keep them in constant misery by poking at the wounded part. When the poor creature falls from sheer exhaustion, it is not uncommon for the brutal driver to slit up one of his nostrils as a punishment for the first offence. If the helpless creature has the audacity to rep at the offence, his other nostril is treated in the same abominable way. A third crime of this sort is punished by cutting one of the ears, and a fourth by cutting the other. At last, if the previous barbarities have not been sufficient to break him of this bad habit, his tail is cut bit by bit, till the poor creature is so disfigured by these successive mutilations, as to be hardly recognised. To such an extent is this brutality practised, that it is a rare thing to meet with an ass which is not mutilated in some way or other.

The driver of the water-carrying ass, who is often designated by the title of aguador or water-carrier, though it is not he that really carries the water, does not enjoy the privilege of accompanying the ass without being subject to some police regulations. The first is, that he present the town authority with thirty doges, killed by him in the course of a year. Hence, those who wish to be licensed as water-carriers must take their own cart in days at an appointed place, and make a regular trot home from street to street. All the dogs that they have caught, but not completely killed at the first blow, are collected in an open space, where they are dispatched with sticks and clubs. The spectators then give the booty, and each takes his share to his ass's tail, if a poor thing is fortunate enough to have one. In this way they are enabled to make their offerings to the civil authority, dragging the dead dogs as trophies of victory. The second condition imposed upon the water-carrier is, that they water the streets and public places with the water in their casks.

It might seem that these obligations would have the effect of diminishing the number of this class at Lima, but such is not the

the corporation. They form a distinct class which is not altogether devoid of political influence, especially at election times. Some years ago a company made a proposal to the government to undertake the distribution of water throughout the city on very advantageous terms, both in a pecuniary and sanitary point of case by any means. On the contrary, they are very numerous, though the price paid for the water is far from high. They have their chiefs, who are well known, and treated by them with much respect. The supreme chief undertakes the task of settling important disputes, and is authorised to admit or expel members of view. No sooner had the water-carriers heard of the proposal than they assembled in great force, mounted their asses, went in procession, with banners at the head, to the president's palace, and made such ado with their words and their gestures that they at length succeeded in getting the proposal rejected.

HERNAN CORTES AND JOHN SMITH.

AMERICAN history abounds with subjects adapted alike for the painter's pencil and the poet's pen. There is not a more romantic story in the world than the discovery of this vast continent and its chivalry was hushed, and the solemn psalms of the gray-haired sires of the faith had ceased, we find fresh interest in the increasing strength and power of the country, and in that mighty struggle first colonisation by the Spanish settlers; and the record of the pilgrim fathers, so touching in its quaint simplicity, never lacks interest; and further on still, when martial music of European drums and horns, which rent from English control the great and glorious land and established the republic of the United States.

How strange it seems that this vast continent should have remained so long hidden from the rest of the globe; that till the fifteenth century its extensive prairies and noble rivers should be unknown, that people should talk of a submerged continent, an island of the devil's land, a cloud-land seen by the inhabitants of Madeira, and that no attempt should be made to find out the truth. But the priests and the schoolmen had no faith in a land which, if at their antipodes, must be peopled by those who walked with their heads upwards and their heads hanging down. It was left to the poet to say—

"At our antipodes, are cities, states,
And thro' dread equinox ne'er divid'd of yore."

No such topsy-turvy world was to be believed by sane men; so the Red Indians held their own, and the Spaniards ruled in golden glory.

Then comes a change. The royal standard of Castile and Leon is displayed. The Santa Maria, the Pinta and the Nina sailed from Andalusia; and although the sea and sky were filled with omens terrible to the poor ignorant sailors, Columbus, with his deep and earnest faith, went on feeling within him the certainty of conquest; and he was not disappointed. Then arose a furor for America, a new impulse was given to the people of Europe, the eagerness to explore the wonderful secrets of the new hemisphere became so active that the principal cities of Spain were in a manner depopulated. Emigrants thronged the quays and wharfs; new vessels were chartered; busy people grew weary of their common business and longed to be busy in another clime; they flew away like birds of passage, knew no fear, admitted no doubt, were full of hope and confidence, only crying out for sea-room and a fair start.

Cupidity, even stronger than curiosity, gave new attractions to America. The name of Castilla del Oro held out a bright promise to the fortunate settler. The land, it was said, was so rich that the sands sparkled with gems, and golden pebbles as large as birds' eggs were drawn out of the rivers in nets! Rumours of the magnificence of the Montezuma empire—where gold was cheaper than iron—excited the general imagination and led to the enterprise of Cortes.

When Cortes landed, he found the people no longer—as earlier adventurers had described them—rude and half-civil savages, but well dressed in cotton garments, and living in stone houses. The natives received the strangers with hostility. Wild rumours were abroad of what the Spaniards had already done, and so a battle ensued, which ended in the triumph of Cortes. Montezuma, the Mexican monarch, had sent to learn the object of the Spaniards, Cortes demanded to have a personal interview with the king; this was respectfully, but firmly, declined; hostilities were renewed, and Cortes marched towards the capital.

The vast plains of Mexico now opened before them. As they looked from the brow of the hill, they saw in the centre of the plain, partly encompassing a lake, partly built on an island within it, the metropolis of Mexico, backed by a wood of dark old trees, and sparkling in the sunbeams like a monarch's signet-ring. All round about the city stretched the white tents of the people.

Montezuma received the Spaniards with kindness—admitted them into the city, appropriated to their use splendid mansions, supplied all their wants, and presented them with costly gifts. Shut up in the unknown city, Cortes began to fear for his safety. A bold expedient occurred to him. He seized the person of the king, imprisoned him in his own palace, and so worked upon his mind, that he at length induced the monarch to acknowledge himself a vassal of Spain, and engaged to pay an annual tribute.

The example of cruelty which Cortes set was bettered by those whom he left behind, when recalled to Spain. The Mexicans rebelled, and on his return, Cortes found an enemy ready to contend with his own weakened forces, and his people thoroughly dispirited. Battle followed battle. As of old, the Mexicans were hunted down like wild beasts, and the deep bay of the bloodhounds was heard through the wintry nights. At last the imprudential king was brought forth, and in the presence of his subjects declared himself a vassal of Spain. It was enough; a pending cry was raised, a fatal battle ensued, and Montezuma was the first slain. On this the Mexicans fled. The super-titition of their creed taught them, that Heaven's vengeance must fall upon them now that their king was dead; so Cortes was triumphant.

The great effort of Cortes was to raise the power of his nation above that of all the nations of the earth. For this he sacrificed everything, and he had his reward. Spain was careless of her heroes when the work was done. Columbus had died of a broken heart—Bilboa the death of a felon. What could Cortes expect? He fell into neglect. One day he forced his way through the crowd which had collected about the carriage of the sovereign, mounted the door-step, and looked in. Astonished at so gross a breach of etiquette, the monarch demanded to know who he was.

"I am a man," replied the Mexican conqueror, "who has given you more provinces than your ancestors have left you cities!"

After this he withdrew, and ended his life in solitude.

More deeply interesting, and still more touching and romantic than the life of Cortes, is the story of Captain John Smith. The old colonists, of whom Smith was one, had intended to establish themselves at the old settlement of Sir Walter Raleigh; but a storm changed their purpose, and the emigrant ship floated in the magnificent Bay of Chesapeake. The headlands at the entrance of the bay are still called Cape Henry and Cape Charles, names which were given to them in honour of King James's sons, on the first arrival of the emigrants. The aspect of the country was then, as now, beautiful and cheering. "Heaven and earth," says Smith, "seemed never to have agreed better to frame a place for man's commodious and delightful habitation." Fifty miles above the river was founded the first permanent English settlement in America, called, after the reigning monarch, Jamestown. The unjust accusation brought against Smith, the sincere friendship of Robert Hunt, the trial by jury, and the wanderings to the Indian emperor, Powhatan, a tall, sour, and athletic man, about sixty years old, were the first incidents that occurred to the early settlers. Then disease broke out, provisions became scanty, the water was bad, and the country, once so beautiful, seemed blighted in a moment. Death made sad havoc among the little company; fifty perished before the end of the autumn. The dishonesty of President Wingfield threw the burden of the community on Smith, and it was then that his wisdom and energy began to display themselves. All that he did for that colony need not be related here. Anxious to accomplish the great purpose of the mission, he set about seeking for a communication with the South Sea. With a spirit of heroism during he advanced up the river Chickahominy, accompanied by two Englishmen and two Indian guides. Then it was that, after a desperate resistance, he fell into the hands of the Indians. His captivity among this tribe of Indians is a more wonderful and romantic event than any other preserved in its tradition. Never had they seen a man so brave, so wise, so calm and self-possessed. Indians from other settlements docked to look on the wise pale-face, and they treated him with hospitality and reverence.

At last came the time when his fate must be decided. The grim warriors of the forest, with old Powhatan in their midst, sat down in solemn council. They saw this brave white man to be superior to themselves; they feared him, and determined on his death. But they did not slay him at once. Days passed on, and the white man made hatchets and strung beads for Pocahontas, the daughter of Powhatan. Pocahontas was a girl about twelve years old, called, not unfittingly, "the nonparal of the country;" and she learnt to listen to the voice of the stranger, and to feel commiseration for him in his exile and approaching doom. Then the day came, and the hour; and within the palisade the chief, arrayed in all the pomp of savage attire, sat down to see the end. The prisoner was to die by the blow of the hatchet; and, with his hands bound, knelt down beside the fatal log. His lip did not tremble, nor his eye quail. Already the axe was uplifted, when Pocahontas sprang to his side, and as she pleaded with all the energy and eloquence of a loving heart, the grim warriors were turned from their purpose, and spared his life.

The stern refusal of Smith to engage in any attempt upon the people of Jamestown, his consistent and noble bearing, won for him a place in the estimation of the Indians, and his residence amongst them was the means of establishing a friendly intercourse between them and the English colony. Pocahontas remained faithful to her old friend; and when famine came upon the emigrants, she it was who brought baskets of corn and other provisions for Smith and his people.

DOMINIQUE DE GOURGUE.

THERE are men who appear and disappear in history without leaving trace or track behind, who do some one deed, which at the time raises a sensation, and then sink into utter obscurity. Most persons recollect the brilliant oratorical display of Single Speech Hamilton, who made one oration and spoke no more. Perhaps this might be explained by the fact that Burke was his private secretary then, and left him directly afterwards. The history of the man whose name is given above, is involved generally in utter mystery. But one act of his has secured for his name a permanent place in history.

Francis the First of France, jealous of the discoveries of the Spaniards, sent out one Verazani to conquer and discover for him. His journeys led to no result. Jacques Cartier of St. Malo, however, in 1534, was more successful. He entered the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and paved the way for the attempt to colonise by Roberval in 1540. The new establishment was an utter failure; and a subsequent expedition under Cartier was never more heard of. At a later period, Admiral Coligny conceived that an asylum for French Protestants might be properly created in America, where they would be free from persecution. His plans for agricultural settlements were admirably laid down. Henry II. patronised the idea, and the wretched Charles IX. even entertained it.

One Nicolas Dumand de Villegagnon, a Knight of Malta, appeared to have formed the strange scheme of feigning adjuration and professing the reformed faith, to overthrow this plan. He joined Coligny in his projected colony in 1555. He was a brave, adventurous schemer, and wore the mask of religion and humility with perfect success. He obtained command of the expedition, and, sailing for America, encamped near where Rio Janeiro now stands. Calvin, on hearing that the pilgrims had hit upon a desirable locality, encouraged the emigration. A large party went out under Philippe Duport, a zealous Protestant gentleman, who, after some dangers by the way, brought his people successfully to an end of their journey.

Villegagnon received them with all the austerity of a Puritan. He was severe both in religious and political matters. He made all emigrants work at the fort; and his hypocrisy and bigotry were beyond all power of description in these more enlightened days. One great mistake of his colony, however, was, that it was wholly composed of men; except five young girls, none would venture out to the far-distant land.

But the intolerance and cruelty of the governor was the great drawback to success, and at last he showed himself in his true colours. He re-proposed the Roman Catholic religion, persecuted and drove away all the Protestants, who nearly all took the way. Returning to France, he died a zealous Papist, and held possession of the Huguenots, and with the name of the Colonel of America.

Coligny, though thus frustrated, determined to try another part of America. He chose Florida this time. Jean de Ribault acted at the head of the new expedition in 1562. He landed and fortified Fort Charles; then, leaving a lieutenant in command, he returned to France. The lieutenant proved a brutal tyrant, who, after committing several murders, was put to death after an imprisonment. This expedition was also a failure. A third expedition proposed to be more successful. It took out a good number of colonists, who settled, and after some early difficulties, appeared to be in a prosperous way.

But Spain would not quietly allow a French colony in America, and accordingly a squadron was sent to exterminate the infant settlement, under one Mombetz. His force was overwhelping. He attacked the fort, captured it and nearly all the inhabitants, whom, with characteristic Spanish brutality, he hung on the adjacent trees, with this inscription over their heads:

"THESE WRETCHES HAVE BEEN ENGLISHED, NOT AS ENEMIES, BUT AS HERETICS."

The horrible cruelties of the Spaniards are not to be related in full. The horror of France was great, but the wicked king would, because the victims were Protestants. This feeling made the court pass over the fearful outrage without notice. But there were in the land men who lived in the hope of vengeance. One of these was Dominique de Gourgue, a gentleman of the island of Mont Marson, in Gascony. He was a naval captain, and he was engaged against the Spaniards, was taken prisoner, and chained in a cage to a galley. This galley was taken by the Turks, and released only in a battle with the Knights of Malta. He was considered one of the best navigators of the day.

When he found that the king and court would not take notice of the Spanish crime, his rage knew no bounds. He then, after estate, fitted out three ships, collected hardy crews, and sailed for America. He took the Spaniards by surprise, attacked the fort, captured it, and hung the prisoners on the same trees where, but a little while before, his countrymen had perished. Then he wrote over them:—

"HUNG, NOT AS SPANIARDS, BUT AS ASSASSINS."

The terrible avenger then returned to France, to publish, as we say, in that horrible day of St. Bartholomew, which has branded the name of Charles IX. and his mother to eternal execration.

SKETCHES OF DOGS BY T. LANDSEER.

CAT-AND-DOG LIFE.

Of course, respected reader, you keep a dog. We don't, for we can't afford the tax; and in our chambers, besides, a dog would waste away its ignoble life far from fresh air and green fields and the vermin which are its natural prey. You tell us a dog is useful for self-defence; that he watches over your property and your person; that he warns off the ill-conditioned and evil-disguising; that he worries a beggar as he does a rat. But what is that to us? beggars don't persecute authors; our property is in no danger. Our few treasures are all made fast by one of Child's patent locks, and our pereginations seldom extend beyond the confines of the metropolitan police district. Campbell tells us, "if the nursing of the storm," as he walks restlessly along his shattered bark, that

"Hope can here her moonlight vigil keep,
And sing to charm the spirit of the deep;
Swift as you streamer lights the starry pole,
Her visions warm the watchman's pensive soul;
His native hills that rise in happier climes,
The groat that heard his song of other times—
His cottage-home—his bark of slender sail,
His glassy lake and broomwood-blossomed vale,
Rush on his thoughts; he sweeps before the wind,
Treads the loved shore he sigh'd to leave behind;
Meets, at each step, a friend's familiar face,

And flies, at last, to Helen's long embrace,
Wines from her cheek the rapture-speaking tear,
And clasps, with many a sigh, his children dear;
While, long-neglected, but at length caressed,
His faithful dog salutes the smiling guest,
Points to the master's eyes (where'er they roam),
His wistful face, and whines a welcome home."

Well, as we don't keep a dog, of course we can't read a book touching poetry. If we voyage on a bark, we can't be so near as far as Putney or Kew, and a Londoner, who is not a sailor, in the crowded streets, if we cannot take a boat, will be a dog, and always a guardian angel in the hope of a reward. If we are dressed in blue, with a glazed brazen coat, and a red cap, and if we spend our districts with our faithful dog, and if we are engaged to find it for us, there is almost a chance of our getting a reward, and regard ourselves persons. By way of consolation, we shall say, as a reason why we don't keep a dog. But you, O reader, are of a different category; you are not a poor, wretched, half-starved, half-died watched, and you keep a dog; or you are a lady, and you keep the pearl of pugs. The heart must love something; and so, till something else claim it, you love your pug, something like Miss Tucker's in "Time Works Wonders," a beauty "that could not move for sentiment." "I see him, now," she exclaims, "with his beautiful face so black yet so benignant! Now cropping a daisy with his lily-white teeth; and now looking up and barking at me, as if he knew my inmost thoughts." Or you are a sportsman, and you keep a dog to travel with you and your gun over hill and dale, on the sunny moor or by the shaded beck; or you are a gentleman, with nothing to do besides reading the "Times" and the "ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE OF ART," and you have a dog to keep you company; or you are a professional man, and you keep a dog that, now and then for half an hour with him you may forget patients and clients—the unfortunate victims that cruel fate has thrown the cat springs on her unoffending victim. Of course the dog defends himself, and the contest promises to be fierce and bloody; Miss Lydia shrieks in agony; you kick your unoffending dog out of the room; pussy, angry and mewing, takes up a secure position, and in time the turmoil dwindles into a calm.

"All's well that ends well."

"All's well that ends well."

But if you don't keep a dog, you can't read a book touching poetry.

Go in again, and the same scene is invariably repeated. This is cat-and-dog life. It was so in days gone by, and so it will ever be; at any rate, so long as this tight little globe of ours rolls round the sun.

The same little drama is acted every day. In town and country, in the parlour and the kitchen, in garret or in cellar, it is the same. An Irishman cannot go to Donnybrook fair without a row, nor can a dog and cat meet without the same conturbations. It is not a mere matter of party feeling, or of temporary excitement, but of race against race. The cat is generally the aggressor, and the cat often into your hands. At any rate, be you what you may, call yourself what you will, you keep a dog.

Of course, then, you will agree with the writer of this article in what he is now going to state, that if you, with your dog, enter a room in which there is a cat, there will be such a terrible row, as if Bedlam had broken loose, or as if chaos had come again. You may try the experiment yourself, if you will not take our word for it. You call, for instance, on Miss Lydia Langrish, a gentle spinster of uncertain age, with a growing fondness for cats, in preference, sir, to the dreadful sex, as she terms them, to which you and I, sir, have the honour to belong. Of course there is a piano in the room, and under that piano, with bristling hair and stiffened back, is the favourite cat. Your dog, feeling himself a stranger, and being a gentleman, follows you quietly into the room, not having the slightest idea of danger, or the slightest wish to make himself obnoxious or disagreeable. No sooner, however, does he make his appearance, than a low growl is heard, then a feminine shriek as triumphs. However, when she does get the worst of it, she is pretty well served out. Life is often the penalty she pays for her audacity. She is generally saved by her power of flight, and her facility of escaping to the hearstap; still, her hereditary foe, his passion raised and his blood boiling, roars and barks and foams below. Her swiftness is her salvation. When there is no way of escape for her when she must stop and fight it out, she is generally terribly mangled and mangled. She is so in the picture before us. For once she has got her match. The gentle has been a terrible one. The affair has been a regular fitzup. The whole kitchen has been upset, the culinary mysteries have been ruthlessly invaded, the cook has been called from her solemn and mysterious rites, her favourite dishes have been upset in the fray, her utensils have been profaned. Blow after blow she levels on the dog's broad back; she might as well, like Miss Partington, try to push back the Atlantic with a mop. The felon is savage; there is blood in his eye, and he will only be satiated with his victim's death.

It is a sad thing to think of, that cat-and-dog life. It is said people meet with it in the family circle; that sometimes husband and wife, parents and children, brothers and sisters, masters and servants, lead but a cat-and-dog life. This is a sadder thing still. Cats and dogs can be tamed, can live together, as we see in the Happy Family in Trafalgar-square; but discord on the hearth grows blacker, darker, every year. It is to be hoped our readers know nothing of such cat-and-dog life, but the name, and that they may never know it as some know it, as a daily curse and blight.

A TAIL-PIECE.

"Thereby hangs a tail." Yes, truly, Sic transit gloria mundi,

"Behold before ye

Humanity's poor sum and story:

Life, death, and all that is of glory."

Every dog has his day; at any rate, so it has been in our pages. Dogs, well-conditioned and the reverse, of high degree or low, your reverend divine once considered cat-catching glorious sport; your eloquent statesman once found no deater joy than rabbit-shooting. They have done with dogs, as we have done with them; as, more or less, all England is learning to do without them; for our great cities are growing greater every day, and the tax-gatherer and the new police and the dog-stealer have no mercy on the canine race. Play, boy, whilst you can; find in your dumb companion a faith you will soon learn to doubt amongst men. Soon busy life will leave you but little time to play with dogs.

So we lay down our pen and bid the dogs—such of them as are left, for two of them have already been hung, we trust to meet the ends of justice, and to teach a moral lesson to the dogs around, a lesson not always taught when Jack Ketch hangs a man—a long and reluctant farewell. It is hard to part with old friends. It is hard to tear up old associations, but the dogs have got to the end of their tether. There is nothing left for them but to vanish into learned or rude, peaceful or quarrelsome, nuisances or blessings to well-regulated families, have found a place in our pages. We have discussed them individually and collectively, in their goings-out and their comings-in, in the relationships which they sustain to each other, and in those which they bear to their lord and master, man; and now we have done with them, as most of our readers have done with them. There was a time, ere we had trod the world's ways and tasted the bitterness of life, when all around us was bright and fair; when we dreamt not of falsehood in woman or dishonour in man; ere the hard struggle for existence had engrossed our every power; when, light and true, with buoyant heart and careless step, we rambled at our own sweet will, with dogs, the choicest and truest of their race. There was a time when, we doubt not, the reader did the same. Those joyous days are gone, never to return. Their memory is left, and that is all. So it has been with every one of us. Your sober citizen was once a jolly boy; your paunchy capitalist once owned nothing better than a dog;

the palpable obscure. One is gnawing his last bone—another biting his last flea—another snuffing the last time his companion's tail—and another, for the last time, poking his nose into the cupboard, which seems but little better furnished than that of the far-famed Mother Hubbard herself. The scene our artist has engraved is only paralleled by that which takes place when a city is captured, or when there is a general conflagration—when selfishness prevails universally, when the maxim is, "Every one for himself." No one seems to have the least regard for his neighbour. It is a general scramble—neither more nor less. Politeness, for the time, is quite out of the question; as much so as when you are waiting for tickets for an excursion train. It is not a pleasant phase of dog life that we are contemplating, but it is a true one, nevertheless. They are all sharp and desperate, and preying on each other. It is a painful picture to contemplate, because it is human. It carries too strong a resemblance to real life. Let, then, the curtain be dropped; and so we wind up with a "Tail-piece."

PHYSICAL ASPECT OF CHINA.

BY WILLIAM KNIGHTON.

THE Chinese Empire may be said to include almost all the east and centre of Asia. From the borders of Independent Tartary to the Pacific, from the frontiers of Siberia to the south of the Eastern Peninsula, all the sovereigns and princes of the various tribes and people of these regions regard the celestial emperor as their sovereign lord. From the fact of its thus extending uninterruptedly over vast tracts, all adjacent to each other, we are apt to think that it does not present that variety of people and manners, which the other great empires of the world comprise. This is quite a mistake. There can scarcely be a greater contrast than between the roving Tartars, ever on horseback, and the polite citizens of Nankin and Canton, who regard the said Tartars as ardent barbarians; whilst the Tartar, despising the thrifty habits of the commercial Chinese, fully returns the compliment. And again, in the Eastern Peninsula in Lao and Cochin-China there is a semi-civilisation totally different from that of Nankin or Peking. The Malay, the Chinaman, and the Tartar may be allied to each other, as respects the class of humanity to which they belong; but they differ essentially in tastes, habits, and physical powers. The Malay—the Italian of Asia—is quick-blooded, revengeful, jealous; accustomed to the use of his stiletto, the Espee, and but too ready to use it on the slightest occasions. His harmonious language is adapted for poetry and music, and he is fond of both. He sings of love to-day, and stabs his enemy to-morrow. The Chinaman is infinitely more phlegmatic, as unlike the Malay as the Dutchman is unlike the Italian; he sees no reason why he should put himself about for anything. He loves medals; and holds his opinion as much as the Dutchman tobacco. His shop and his merchandise are his ruling passions, he seldom thinks of anything else, or, if he does, allows it to have little influence on his life. As to love, he would no more think of allowing it to give him all the trouble it gives the Malay, than he would think of allowing the few hairs that nature sparingly scatters over his face to be shaved off every day.

It would be a great mistake, therefore, to suppose that the empire of China is singularly homogeneous, merely because it extends over adjoining countries. Nor does it differ more in its various races and their characteristics than in its physical features. Vast deserts, second only to those of Africa, occupy large portions of its central high lands. The great desert of Gobi, for instance, in Chinese Tartary, occupies 300,000 square miles, and has its sandy, its salt, and its rocky districts; all equally barren, all equally deficient in fresh water, but some far more difficult for man to travel over than others. Here, as in all deserts, the summer's sun is scorching, no rain falls, and, when fogs occur, they are but the precursors of fierce winds, which blind the unfortunate traveller with salt or bury him in sand. In winter again, these districts are intensely cold. The icy blasts from the frozen plains of Siberia sweep over the country in rapid succession, producing a degree of cold on the elevated desert land, of which we, in England, can form no adequate conception.

China has its mountainous regions too, and in no country in the world do the mountains take more fantastic forms than in the province of Shan-si.

Temples like those amongst the Hindoos,
Churches, spires, and abbey-windows,
And turrets all with ivy green—
Build up a wild, fantastic scene.

Mountains rivalling the Alps in height—not the miniature mountains to which we are accustomed in England, but huge chains, of forbidding rugged exterior and appearance, full of glaciers and avalanches, and full too of penetral happy valleys between, where nature invites man to be happy, if he can only consent to accept the invitation.

By far the larger proportion of China proper is occupied by low ranges of hills, on which the tea-plant is principally cultivated. It thrives better, like coffee, upon the sides of these hills than in the low grounds, and forms the staple production of the entire region. If the original producer can get fourpence a pound for that for which we pay four shillings, he is a successful cultivator and will soon be enabled to extend his business, so vastly do duties, transport charges, and exportation expenses enhance the value of an article, or rather increase its cost, for the value is but nominally, not really, increased. These ranges of hills are cultivated to the very summits—terrace above terrace, artificial layers of earth provided where nature has deposited none; the one fertilising stream from the summit flowing from terrace to terrace as it descends step by step, making each rich, the very type of productiveness.

There is no country in the world so productive as China. Its vast alluvial plains, watered by magnificent rivers, present an amount of agricultural industry, and yield a proportion of vegetable and animal food, unknown elsewhere. Two hundred and ten thousand square miles of rich soil, spread all along the east of the country—a plain, seven times the size of Lombardy—and perfectly irrigated by its extensive river system and by canals. The Great Canal, for instance, traverses the eastern part of the plain for 700 miles, of which 500 are in a straight line of considerable breadth, with a current running throughout the greater part. Almost the whole of this vast plain is cultivated by the spade, and yields rice and garden crops in abundance. The canals present to the European traveller an extraordinary sight, being so covered with vessels that the water appears more thickly populated than the land. All along the margin of these wonderful reservoirs runs a stone quay admirably put together, whilst substantial bridges cross them at convenient distances.

Agriculture is, indeed, the art which the Chinese most highly prize, and to the successful prosecution of which the highest honours are awarded. Even the emperor is obliged by immemorial custom to honour tillage by engaging in the pursuit once every year—a religious ceremony which must not be neglected, and which was doubtless intended at first to teach the people that there was no occupation more honourable. In the beginning of March, the emperor repairs in great state to the field appointed for the ceremonial; the princes of his family, the presidents of the five great tribunals, and a host of mandarins accompanying him. Two sides of the field are lined with the officers of his household—a third is occupied by the highest mandarins from the provinces and capital, whilst the fourth is left open for the labourers of the neighbourhood, who are to see their occupation illustrated by imperial majesty itself. The emperor approaches; music—discordant enough, according to our ideas—pours forth its notes volubly and loudly, in honour of his coming. He enters the field alone, the sides are regularly kept—"majesty" stands by itself, nobility and commonalty gaze respectfully at it from the sides. Prostrating himself nine times before Tien, the lord of heaven, the emperor repeats with a loud voice a prayer prepared for the occasion by the Court of Ceremonies. In this prayer, a blessing is invoked on his labour and on that of his whole people, whilst gratitude is expressed for past favours. Then, with the assistance of the priests, he sacrifices an ox to the giver of all good, Tien, the lord of heaven. Whilst the victim is smoking on the altar, a silver plough is brought, to which are attached a pair of oxen, ornamented in the most magnificent style. The emperor lays aside his imperial robes, which one may easily suppose would have been somewhat in his way in the matter of the sacrifice, lays hold of the plough-handles and opens several furrows round the field. He then hands the implement to one of his chief mandarins, who acts similarly; and thus, one after the other, they proceed, each labouring in succession and displaying each his peculiar dexterity. A distribution of money and pieces of cloth to the labourers ends the ceremony, whilst the ablest of those present and the most expert finish the ploughing of the field which has been thus imperially begun. Afterwards, at the proper season, his majesty returns to commence the sowing. The produce of such a field is, of course, only fit for the gods and is kept for sacrifices and oblations. Nor is it in the capital alone that this ceremony is performed. In each of the provinces, the viceroy similarly officiates, supported by the mandarins of the vicinity. There is doubtless much superstition, and much hypocrisy, mixed up with all this; but there is in it, too, the germ of much that is good—teaching the people that there is a dignity in labour that hallows and consecrates all honest employment by which man earns his bread. This is a lesson it would be well if we could all learn. It would teach us not to despise any man on account of the work he has to do.

THE EARTH.—FROM A PAINTING BY LANCRET.

"THE EARTH," A PAINTING BY LANCRET.

The painting from which the engraving now before the reader is copied is by Nicholas Lancret, a celebrated painter of the French school. It is entitled "The Earth," which title doubtless owes its origin to such georgics as Virgil and other poets have composed. A verse under an old engraving from this picture tells us that "the earth is the mother of every blessing, but that it is only by the labour of her children that she will yield her increase;" and this, in true courtly style, Lancret has pictured out in his design. At the foot of an elegant fountain sit a marquis and a high-born lady, enjoying the pleasures of the field and admiring a bunch of flowers. Behind this couple, another company, that might possibly pass for the Graces in the dresses of ladies of fashion, are arranging a large supply of the richest fruits; while another lady stands under the branch of a fruit-tree to receive in her robe other gifts of Pomona. Standing on a ladder, and gathering the fruit, is one who is doubtless another marquis, in the disguise of a peasant. The two gardeners, one digging the earth, and the other watering the plants, we may regard as lords or viscounts, for there is over all the picture that air of elegant refinement which forbids all notion of plebeian rustiness. The instruments of labour are beautiful in form, and designed with the utmost amount of taste. We look in vain for Hodge the ploughman, or Mabel with her shining sickle; these are metamorphosed into the denizens of palaces and courts, and, in place of a delightful landscape, we have trees arranged with all the skill of modern gardening, and an elegant marble fountain supplied from the waters of Versailles. Art is contrasted with nature, and the charm of the country is sacrificed to the taste of the age. Against this some have protested. Diderot launched out against it as "a factitious and degenerate school of art." He says, the depraved state of colouring, characters, expression, and drawing, "has followed, step by step, the depraved state of public morals."

In the preface which Saint Lambert attached to his poem of "The Seasons," we find an elaborate dissertation on the union of pastoral life with the gallantry of the court, which was the fashion in France during the most brilliant period of the last century; but Saint Lambert only saw nature in his own beautiful gardens, as viewed from the windows of his chateau, and Lancret illustrated Lambert. Apart, however, from these criticisms, the picture is very beautiful, and affords sufficient indication of what the painter could accomplish. In some of his productions he fell into the fashion of the times; but the design and execution are both admirable, the groups are tastefully arranged, and there is an air of surpassing grace over the whole composition. More than this, the painting is a fair sample of Lancret's peculiar style of art.

Nicholas Lancret was born at Paris in 1699. After studying painting under several masters, he at length became intimate with Watteau, whose friendship he cultivated, and whose style he adopted. This evident imitation of the great master is seen in all the works of his talented disciple, but still each has retained his own distinguishing characteristics, as may be observed by comparing their varied productions.

In 1793, Lancret was received into the Academy, under the title of the Peintre des fêtes galantes. He was the favourite of fortune, and rose rapidly to high renown. The court patronised him, and the king admitted him to his councils; he frequented the saloons of the bravest, the wisest, and the wittiest, and was everywhere distinguished by the highest tokens of approbation. He was one of the gayest gullants of the time, and his life was passed in the brightest sunshine of prosperity. But death will come, even into kings' palaces, and at the age of fifty-three Lancret died. He left no children.

The title of Peintre des fêtes galantes characterises the talent of Lancret. He painted nature, but it was nature adorned, arranged, and coloured after the most approved style of fashion—nature, such as one sees at the opera. He manufactured an artificial nature, made up of all the elegances of a well-ordered garden, "a painted pasteboard, varnished, and perfumed nature, with rouge for a complexion and powder for hair." Like his friend Boucher, he seems to have lived and died in a boudoir hung with rose-coloured silk; and indeed, when that painter assured him that nature was too green and too badly lighted, Lancret replied, "I concur in your sentiments, nature is wanting in harmony and attraction." He painted what he conceived nature ought to be, and his figures too often resembled marionettes.

THE WALLACHIAN ROBBER.—IV.

Mickos had heard and judged rightly in the main, though not in every particular. There were two huntsmen who had separated from their companions, taken the wrong road, and kept getting further and further from the valley of the Tenes, to which they thought they were approaching, as they vainly attempted to make their companions hear by incessant firing and shouting. They were both fine men, still young, of elegant form, with gray over-coats on, such as Austrian officers still wear, though of a different make. Their coats were made of strong Flemish cloth, and gave the wearers an air of superiority in this wild region, the few human inhabitants of which were clothed no better than the foxes, wolves, and bears of the mountains—often scarcely so well.

The wanderers reached the top of a mountain, from which the want of underwood between the tall beech-trees opened a wider prospect. Here they stopped, looking attentively round upon the wild mountain region, but not to observe its picturesque features. "Crooked people are proverbially mischievous," said the elder, "and crooked paths over mountains are not particularly useful."

"You are right, Frank," replied the younger; "go on joking. We may want something to cheer us. Matters are beginning to look very awkward."

"We have gone astray," said Frank with a smile, "and now is the time for reflection." "And fasting too," added the other in a desperate and yet light-hearted mood; "but famished as I am, my reflection does not enable me to discover on which side the Turks lie."

"It would be no joke if we were to fall in with the fiendish monsters. We should have a heavy reckoning to pay."

"Heavier than even if Sackendorf were again to take the field to destroy his Majesty's country and people."

Undecided which way to go, they moved forward a little to the brink of a precipice, to see if they could discover any human dwelling in the valley below. Suddenly the elder seized his companion's arm and whispered in French, "Look down there!" The prospect to which the young man's attention was called was not very inviting. By a fire were encamped five or six men of savage appearance. The huntsmen saw it was impossible to escape from them, so they put the best face upon the matter, and walked with an air of apparent indifference up to the desperadoes.

The men near the fire were Petru Bazya and some of his men. They jumped up in no little alarm at the sight of two men with guns coming straight up to them. They thought they must be the vanguard of a patrolling party, by which they were probably already surrounded. Some were already whispering something about being. "Stay where you are," ordered the rolder-chief; "the pale-beed fellows won't eat us." After a while he added: "They are all alone; very likely they have lost themselves while hunting. It is quite clear they are nice young gentlemen, and have plenty of valuables about them. Their purses, watches, and rings are not to be despised. We will strip them and then consider what to do next."

The two young men were taken by surprise at the rough reception they met with. In a moment they were deprived of their weapons, with a show of courtesy that seemed like polite attention. A giant, who in size and strength resembled the colossal figures of Hercules, took the elder by the collar of his coat. With his iron fingers he unbuttoned the overcoat, under which he found a white coat with a red collar and a splendid star brooching his high rank. The Hercules in red trousers went back a step, and cried out suddenly "Stop, comrades! There is more to be got from them than they carry about them? Do you see this star? Do you know what such a thing means? On an old man it denotes a commander of high rank; on a young one, a prince. The stranger is, therefore, a prince, and the other is his brother, if we may judge from his looks. The gentlemen cannot deny this."

The two hunt-men understood the dialects of the country tolerably well. The elder, without hesitation, answered, "We have not learnt to disown our name, and will not disgrace ourselves so far for your sake. I am Francis, Duke of Lorraine, and this is my brother Charles. You shall be worthily recompensed if you will conduct us back to the camp."

The prince said this, not so fluently as it may be here read, but clearly enough to be understood with the assistance of accompanying gestures. The chief invited the duke to take a seat, provided them a substantial meal, and entered into a long conversation with them, in the course of which he described in strong language the dangers to which they were exposed if he did not take them under his protection. The two princes listened patiently to his diffuse discourse as long as they were engaged in partaking of the refreshment they so much needed. They were delighted with the thought of having met with a clue by which they might be extricated from their difficulties. It would no doubt cost them much money, but that was nothing in comparison with what the Turks would have demanded for their ransom. For the apostate Bonnevad the capture of their persons would be more valuable than the most successful campaign. Besides, the robber-chief did not appear to think about money, for his whole talk was about the ravine, bears, and wolves, and the torture of hunger.

"Friend," said Duke Francis at last, "why so many words? The thing appears simple enough to me. You do us a service which, perhaps, we do not know how to value according to your estimate. But let that pass. You are not obliged to perform an act of magnanimity without satisfactory reason. Name your own conditions. Of course, you and your companions will at least guarantee us safe conduct, will you not?"

"I should think so," said Petru in a tone of assent; "we have a long score to pay off."

"Consider that already paid," replied the illustrious duke; "whatever any one of you has done up to this time is forgiven and forgotten. Thus much for the past; now let us come to the future. What you chiefly want is money, is it not?"

"Plenty of money, my lord duke; money in abundance, by all means."

"Tell me plainly and briefly what you want."

The robber-chief could not express himself in few words; however, at last he managed to explain his meaning. He declared his intention of abandoning his present lawless mode of life, for which purpose he considered it necessary that each of his followers should be put in possession of a freehold farm. This demand was easy to grant, as there was plenty of fruitful land in want of cultivators. Nor was it less easy to accede to the request, that those who had no fancy for agriculture should have the means of becoming herdsmen. The sum of money which Petru demanded for his companions was by no means too great to be raised. For himself he required a large mansion in the district of Szlatina, which, he said, was to be had cheap; ready money to the amount of a hundred ducats; and lastly, the reversion of the office of governor of New Orsova.

Francis laughed outright. "The bear," cried he, "whose skin you want is still running in the wood."

"I don't want the skin," replied Petru seriously, "before you have the bear; but you must promise that I shall have it as soon as the hunt is brought to a successful conclusion. It is only the reversion I want, not immediate possession."

"So far as I am concerned," rejoined the duke, still smiling, "you shall have your wish, if it is at all possible."

The robber-chief nodded, and his eyes sparkled with delight. He fancied himself already comfortably seated, with his marshmilk by his side, in the mansion, gazing upon the mighty stream which, rising in a principality on the border of the wood, flows on to the Black Sea. He dwelt with satisfaction on the wealth and honour before him. "You could not," he exclaimed, "have a better man for the occupant of such a post; I am watchful, faithful, and just."

The princes now began to think of retiring, full of joy at the prospect of getting out of their trouble. They had apparently nothing more to do than go the shortest way home with their guides, to put an end to the tormenting anxiety and suspense of their faithful followers. "We have had to pay dearly," said Charles in French to his brother, "for our thoughtlessness; the chamois which tempted us into the deserted spot had perhaps some object in view. I will remember the lesson."

"Thank God, we are saved!" replied Francis; "let us no longer dwell upon our disappointment."

It is not safe to speak well of a day before the evening. The princes fancied they had got over the dangers of this adventurous day when, in fact, the real danger had yet to begin. For just as the chief was moving off to escort the wanderers, the warlike Maruschka with the Hungarian suddenly appeared on the scene, heated with running, and red with fury to find the two princes under Petru's protection, after having exerted herself so much to get them into her own power. Duke Francis beheld the stately amazon with more interest than was quite proper for one who had been married two years. "A fine woman, indeed!" he exclaimed. Charles checked him good-naturedly, and he was quickly cured of his momentary wandering of affection.

"Holla, there! where are you off to?" cried Maruschka to her husband.

"To Karaszeles," was his reply; and he explained to her all the circumstances of the case.

"Not there," she rejoined; "the prisoners belong to me. They have only come here by accident a little before me; and this is my territory."

"That is not true; your boundary extends to the left, over the mountain."

"No, it goes right through the valley."

"But even if you are right, my lady, that would not make any difference. You have no more claim over the gentlemen than I, and must share with me as I am willing to share with you. This day makes us rich people, secure against all prosecution, and esteemed as loyal subjects of the emperor."

Maruschka flew into a violent rage, which completely changed the aspect of her features. "A curse," said she, "upon the emperor and all that belong to him; they have murdered my brave Dobru, and I must have revenge."

"Poor young fellow!" said Petru with great indifference; "he would have made a first-rate robber."

"He was one already," continued the furious amazon; "I am determined to have vengeance for him. The heads of these two must go to Stamboul."

"Gently, gently, my dear!" cried the robber-chief; "don't you know who they are?"

"You haven't told me their names yet."

"One is the emperor's son-in-law, and the other is the latter's brother. Such heads are not for the executioner."

These words acted like an electric shock upon Maruschka's agitated frame. With eager haste she called her husband to her side, and whispered in his ear. "You monstrous fool! do you mean to give up such a fine catch for a glass of liquor and a few shillings? Don't you understand how to reckon better than that? The Turks will pay us more for the two than they have in their pockets. I will guarantee you ten thousand florins for your share alone."

"Ten thousand florins!" muttered Petru thoughtfully.

"Besides, you shall be governor of New Orsova," added his wife.

The two princes did not understand a word of the conversation which was going on between the gigantic pair, but they were filled with sad forebodings, for Petru kept glancing at them in a very suspicious way, and Maruschka was evidently in good train for winning him over to her purpose.

"The horrible creature!" exclaimed Francis at last, "she is fast getting the better of him. We must make a higher bid."

"Let us bid ten times as much as we did at first," said Charles.

"A hundred times, if it is necessary," replied his brother.

Resolved, if possible, to ward off the danger without a moment's delay, both went up to the chief and his wife; but the danger was over already, for just as they got up to them, Petru pushed his wife away, adding in a tone of fierce indignation, "I have given my word, and I won't be a traitor for the sake of paltry money. Away with you, you poisonous snake!"

"Well done, my brave fellow!" cried Francis. He might, however, have spared his praise, for Petru's wrath was not excited by any shock to his sense of honour. It was not likely possible that stirred up his wrath. The real cause was a very different one.

Maruschka had given vent to her spiteful jealousy by telling him of Wanschka's betrayal to Dschundschi, and by so doing, she at once brought the negotiation to an unavoidable conclusion. "Away with you, you detestable dog!" roared Petru, at the same time seizing the hilt of his sword in a threatening manner.

Maruschka cautiously got out of his reach, well knowing his violent temper. She cast a glance of indescribable malice at Duke Francis, and cried as she went off: "Before the sun sinks behind the mountains I will press the fine lad to my heart, to reward him for the tenderness with which he greeted me at first. I am not ungrateful, my dear lamb, but Maruschka will keep the rich reward for herself. Petru shall not get a farthing of it." With these words she disappeared in the wood. Petru laughed aloud after her as she went off.

"You need not laugh," said Micklos, going up to him. "The woman has twenty Turks by the Witch's Will, and the pass is completely blocked up, so that we cannot possibly get through."

Petru was dreadfully alarmed, almost as much so as his two youngies, but he showed it much less than they. "It is well for us that we know it," said he; "we must go round a little, to avoid falling into the hands of the Turks. But first, let me my drinking cup; we will pledge our guests with a draught, that they may be sure of our fidelity." Some of his followers ventured upon a slight murmur of dissent, as if they had made up their minds to betray the princes to the tender mercies of the Turks.

A severe look on the part of the chief, however, was sufficient to suppress the rising opposition, and at the same time let the princes know that their safety depended upon him. The cup was brought to be handed round. It contained nothing but spring-water; yet the abstemious draught filled the hearts of the princes with a cheerful courage, such as no wine or other intoxicating beverage ever inspireth.

The chief lost no more time, but put his company in motion, in a direction which would have excited the suspicion of the princes, had they known they were going up to the sources of the Temeş, instead of down to Szlatina. "I cannot take you home to-day," said Petru on the way; "we must go some distance round, if we are ever to get there at all. Better late than never, as my old grandmother used to say."

"A wise woman was your grandmother," replied Francis, in a sportive tone; "may the earth lie gently upon her."

"The earth does it not cover her at all," rejoined the chief; "she is still alive and hearty."

The pathless course which the fugitives took was as rough and difficult as can well be imagined, always through the thickest bushes, straight up steep mountain sides and down abrupt crags, sometimes on one side of the Temeş, at others on the opposite side, and ever now and then in a backward direction, like the doubling of a hare with the hounds close at hand. And this laborious caution was anything but needless, as the princes had many opportunities of learning in the course of a two days' wandering; for more than once they saw, at a safe distance, the infuriated Maruschka going with a strong guard of Turks through an opening in the wood which they had themselves crossed only an hour before; and even more frequently Petru's companions, who had been sent out to explore, brought word of the near approach of the pursuers, who, with wonderful bounding and activity, endeavored to cut off all way of escape. But the robber chief was more than a match for them. He always managed to have got on before, when Maruschka thought he was sure of catching him.

The lateness of the hour was all the more oppressive to the young princes, as they did not find the usual gratifications in the evening, like the toil of war or hunting. The effort did not in the evening to comprehend the pleasure of "a good night's sitting of a pew in one's own building." They did not receive at night the delicacies, soft suppers, or hand-milks which they had enjoyed during the day; still less could they repose, daintily prepared, and accompanied by golden wine and the dark beverage of the Levant. They were obliged to content themselves with raw beef, and hard bread, with cold water in the wooden cups which had gone round when the chief and his companions pledged their thick faith. To be sure, some way was to be had; but Petru durst neither shoot nor light a fire, for his smoke by day and its light by night would have at once betrayed them. Hence they were obliged to sleep in the dark cleft of the rocks.

On the third day, Duke Francis could hardly take another step. His feet were aching with fatigue, and his feet were quite sore. But a trifle of this sort did not occur on the chief any embarrassment. He gave his gun to one of his companions, and took the young prince on his broad shoulders with the greatest ease; in consequence of which their progress amazingly quickened, the other prince being no less swift of foot than the sons of the forest themselves.

From an eminence the fugitives beheld their pursuers in a valley scarcely a quarter of an hour behind them.

"Thank God they are there!" cried Petru.

"Why thank God?" asked Francis, in astonishment. "The nervousness of the Turks is anything but agreeable to me."

"They are behind us," replied Petru, smiling; "and now I know well enough they cannot intercept us on our way to Szlatina. They have seen us, now for it—run for your lives!"

The active man ran with his valuable burden over stumps and stones, till at last he reached the edge of the wood, and the steep rock near which the small church now stands. "We are saved!" cried he, with a loud yell, when he saw the imperialist tents and the rowing drag-ons. The sight once more restored the courage of Duke Francis, yet he did not stop to cast his eyes upon the agreeable prospect. He slipped from the shoulders of his bearer, and ran with all haste to his men.

Maruschka, Salim, Dschundschi, and their companions had, indeed, caught sight of the fugitives in the valley. They had observed that Petru was carrying one of the princes, and, thinking themselves all the more certain of success, they redoubled their efforts. But they had reckoned without their host; for when they reached the edge of the wood, they were only just in time to hear the shout of triumph with which the rescued princes were received by their impatient countrymen.

It is scarcely necessary to recite, that Petru obtained from the general a gratification which would have had a considerable return, had he either demanded or expected. In addition he had his old good fortune behind the shoulders of his porter, in all hands, which, it is well known, are very numerous with Wallachians. He was invested by charter with the reversion of the governorship of New Orsova, the same the strategos could be taken from the Turk. With this expectation, the financial which died in a good old man, as a peaceful husband, and among his last words was the expression of a wish, that he had it long enough to witness the recovery of New Orsova.

THE ENTRANCE TO THE ARSENAL AT VENICE.

THE Arsenal at Venice, which dates its foundation as far back as the year 1394, and which the Republic in the days of its prosperity and glory, repeatedly enlarged and embellished, is situated between strong walls and towers. It occupies an area of almost more than two miles. The principal entrance is a hall, which is here engraved, is in itself a magnificent monument. The arch of the doorway is supported by six columns, and at the apex of the structure is a statue of the goddess of Success, which is a fine marble work. winding about the mane of the noble animal, which have long tasked the ingenuity and learning of those who have attempted to decipher them. As yet all the efforts bestowed upon their interpretation have proved of little avail. Among others who have turned their attention to them, we may mention Akerblad and Vilhoisson, who supposed them to be Runic; Bossi and Hameriville, who asserted that they were Pelagian; and Rink, who declared he

ENTRANCE TO THE ARSENAL AT VENICE.

The four lions in pentelican marble, one on the left, and the three others on the right of the entrance, are not the least remarkable ornaments about it. They were brought from Greece by Francesco Morosini, surnamed the Peloponnesian, in 1687. The one which occupies the most prominent place in the accompanying engraving formerly adorned the celebrated Piræus at Athens, which also bore the name of the Lion Harbour. There are two inscriptions had detected Greek words, which when translated gave this sense: "A lion consecrated at Athens." Cuvier felt no hesitation in pronouncing this sculpture to be a Grecian work, and some scholars have conjectured that it was set up in the Piræus in memory of the battle of Marathon. The first lion on the other side was found on the road from the Piræus to Athens. The head is modern and badly sculptured—a remark also applicable to the other two lions.

population, and increased its resources, with a rapidity and to a degree beyond all parallel, and appears destined to play a still more prominent part in the great drama of human affairs.

It is a little remarkable that, for about a century after the first discovery of America—during which interval Spain was extending her conquests and possessions in the southern continent, and France sent out several expeditions to the north with various success—England made scarcely any effort to establish a colony in the New World. It is true that some exception must be made in favour of the Cabots, two enterprising merchants at Bristol, who, within five years from that memorable achievement, began a career of discoveries on the coasts of Labrador and Newfoundland, which formed no unworthy sequel to so glorious a commencement. Speaking of the son, Bancroft says: "The career of Sebastian Cabot was in the issue as honourable as the beginning was glorious. He conciliated universal esteem by the placid mildness of his character. Unlike the stern enthusiasm of Columbus, he was distinguished for serenity and contentment. For sixty years he was renowned for his achievements and skill."

But though the intercourse opened by these explorers between England and North America was never wholly suspended, it never, on the other hand, ripened into any important results. It was not till the connexion established between England and Spain by the marriage of Mary and Philip, that any adequate notion of what Spain had accomplished, or any desire to imitate her example, appears to have been entertained in this country. As soon as the desire was felt, it received all the encouragement which so enlightened and powerful a sovereign as Queen Elizabeth could afford it. She took the deepest interest in the project of planting an English colony in the polar regions of America, which were supposed to abound in gold and other mineral wealth. The zeal with which the accomplished Sir Walter Raleigh entered into such schemes is too well known to require any detailed description here. Enlivened by the disasters which attended his first expedition, in which the largest of his three vessels was wrecked, and a hundred persons lost—including Sir Humphrey Gilbert, his step-brother, and Parmenius, a Hungarian, who went out for the purpose of writing a history of the expedition—he determined to gain a footing for England on those shores; and without difficulty obtained a patent, giving him absolute authority, as Lord Proprietary, over all the territory which he might discover between the thirty-third and fortieth degrees of north latitude. Accordingly, he despatched two vessels, which reached the coast of North America in July—a time of the year most suitable for impressing the new-comers with favourable opinions of the country. They landed in Florida, and afterwards sailed to the island of Roanoke, where they met with a most hospitable reception from the wife of the reigning chief. After a short stay they returned home, having their vessels well laden with cedar, skins, furs, and sassafras. On their arrival, they gave most animated accounts of the country they had visited; and the result was, that the virgin queen, who felt a pardonable exultation in having contributed to the discovery of so glorious a land, gave expression to her satisfaction by bestowing upon it the name of Virginia.

The territory to which this appellation was given, included that portion of North America which lies between the thirty-fourth and forty-fifth degrees of north latitude. It was divided into North Virginia, which was granted to a corporate body known as the Plymouth Company, and South Virginia, the property of another corporation called the London Company. Besides rendering homage to the British crown, they were bound to pay a rent of one-fifth of the gold and silver obtained, and one-fifteenth of the copper. The king was to be acknowledged the supreme authority over the colony, the government of which, with the exception of purely local affairs, was placed in the hands of a council in England. James I. even drew up a code of laws for the regulation of the colony, which, as might be conjectured from the narrow-minded pedantry of its author, breathed anything but a liberal and enlarged spirit. After a series of vicissitudes, including severe sufferings and heavy losses, which we cannot here detail, the colony at length struck its roots into the soil and began to flourish. In spite of the misdirection of the labour of the colonists to the manufacture of potash, soap, glass, and tar—articles in which they could not reasonably hope to compete with the nations on the Baltic—their industry before long became productive, wealth flowed in, and with the power it bestowed came the desire of more extended liberty. The natural restlessness of a rising colony was still further increased by the evils of misgovernment. It was no uncommon thing for persons to obtain appointments, through the influence of the English council, for which they were altogether unfit. The prosperity resulting from the good government of one governor was counterbalanced by the ill effects of the tyranny of another. At length, in June, 1619, the foundation of constitutional liberty was laid by the convocation of the first colonial assembly at Jamestown—consisting of the governor, the council, and two representatives from each of eleven boroughs—the reform of many abuses, and the establishment of equal laws, representative government, and trial by jury. It is this interesting scene which our artist has chosen for illustration in the first of the accompanying engravings. Henceforward, the progress of the colony in freedom and general prosperity was uninterrupted. King James complained of what he termed, this "seminary to a seditious parliament," and attempted to restrict its liberties; but it was now too late.

The scene represented in our second engraving is one of still deeper interest. It brings before us a most devoted missionary instructing the wild untutored red Indians in the sacred truths of Christianity, convincing them of the evils of their present condition, and directing their thoughts and aspirations to a better life hereafter. As these savage tribes saw the white men gradually encroaching on their territory, and living by its industrious cultivation in a degree of comfort and plenty which painfully contrasted with their own miserable neediness, they not unnaturally began to look upon them with an evil eye. Jealousy gave rise to quarrels, acts of violence committed by one party were avenged with frightful cruelty by the other, whole tribes were massacred, and colonies disappeared never more to be heard of, notwithstanding the most searching investigations. But with all this violence and barbarity there were instances of better feeling between the white and the red man. Eager as most of the Europeans were to acquire land and increase in wealth, no matter at what cost to the uncivilised Indians, there were others who had higher objects in view. They sought to raise the Indians to a level with themselves by teaching them all the arts of civilised life, and especially by imparting to them the blessings of a pure and holy religion.

One of the earliest of the labourers in this noble field of enterprise was Alexander Whittaker, whose active exertions in preaching to the Indians on the frontier of Virginia procured for him the honourable and well-earned title of "The Apostle of Virginia." Another of this devoted band was Mayhew, "that young New England scholar," as he has been styled, who sailed to England with a view to excite the zeal of his countrymen in the good cause, but was unhappily lost with the vessel in which he sailed. Such, however, was the influence of his example, that his father, though seventy years of age, undertook to continue his labours, and preached and instructed the Indians with great success till he had passed the advanced age of fourscore. As a striking proof of the success of his efforts, it may be mentioned, that though the Indians were twenty times more numerous than the whites in Massachusetts, they abstained from all attempt to injure them, and lived in firm friendship with them. Villages of "praying Indians" were established; and at the University of Cambridge an Indian obtained the degree of Bachelor of Arts.

But a still more remarkable instance of missionary zeal was afforded by John Eliot, "the apostle of the Indians," who began to preach in the year 1646. We cannot do better than quote what Bancroft says of this excellent man:—"His benevolence almost amounted to genius. An Indian grammar was a pledge of his earnestness; the pledge was redeemed by his preparing and publishing a translation of the whole Bible into Massachusetts dialect. His actions, his thoughts, his desires, all wore the hues of disinterested love. Eliot mixed with the Indians; he spoke to them of God, and of the soul, and explained the virtues of self-denial. He became their lawgiver. He taught the women to spin, the men to dig the ground. He established for them simple forms of government; and, in spite of menaces from their priests and chieftains, he successfully imparted to them his own religious faith. Groups of Indians used to gather round him, as round a father; and, now that their minds were awakened to reflection, often perplexed him with their questions."

SIR WILLIAM HERSCHEL.

It is a common remark, and one borne out by experience, that genius is not hereditary on the father's side. We rarely find both father and son highly distinguished, at least in the same department. But, like all other general rules, this has its exceptions. If the second William Pitt was inferior to the Great Commoner in oratorical power, in commanding force of character, and in statesmanlike breadth of view, he was still a man of great eminence, and probably exerted even a more powerful and lasting influence over the destinies of the country than his illustrious father. Again, and what renders their case still more remarkable is, that another member of the same family, Miss Caroline Herschel, the sister of the father, is entitled to a share of the honour which encircles the name, having not merely assisted in their observations and computations, but herself discovered a comet.

It is much to be regretted that so few particulars are known with respect to the life of Sir William Herschel; for not only do his distinguished astronomical discoveries give an interest to everything though George Stephenson, who conferred incalculable benefits upon his species, and an immortality upon himself, by originating the great railway system, was a most remarkable instance of how much may be accomplished by heaven-born genius in spite of deficient education, it may be questioned whether his son Robert, who, besides being equally gifted by nature, has enjoyed the advantage of a superior scientific education, will not leave behind him more stupendous monuments of engineering skill. Another striking exception to the above rule is supplied by the two Herschels, both of whom have won lasting renown by their astronomical investigations and discoveries. And what renders their case still more remarkable is, that another member of the same family, Miss Caroline Herschel, the sister of the father, is entitled to a share of the honour which encircles the name, having not merely assisted in their observations and computations, but herself discovered a comet. It is much to be regretted that so few particulars are known with respect to the life of Sir William Herschel; for not only do his distinguished astronomical discoveries give an interest to everything came over here alone. The place where he first settled was Durham, whence he removed to Halifax. Here he remained for several years as organist and teacher of music, at the same time devoting his leisure hours to the study of languages. A variety of apocryphal stories are told of this part of his career, some of which are certainly incorrect.

It was not till about the year 1765, when he was organist to the Octagon Chapel at Bath, that Herschel began to direct his attention to that noble science which he afterwards cultivated with so much success. His knowledge of mathematics was very considerable, and his skill in applying it sufficed to demonstrate that he might have won the highest distinction in that department of science, if he had conformed himself to it. With this preliminary advantage he commenced the study of astronomy under very favourable circumstances. Before long he began to feel the want of a better telescope than he possessed or could purchase. Here was a difficulty which, to an ordinary mind, would have appeared insuperable. It is at such turning-points as these that the true character of a man appears. The commonplace person, who lives only according to a prescribed routine, and has no resources within himself for trying emergencies, no sooner encounters an obstacle than his heart fails him, and he foregoes the object of his pursuit almost without a struggle. Not so the man of genius. To him difficulties are but incentives to pleasurable exertion. It matters not how unexpected or how unpropitious to him they may be, he is never at a loss for some means of overcoming them. Such was the case with Herschel at this juncture. Not being able to purchase, or in any other way procure, a telescope of the size and power he wanted, he determined to make one. As may be supposed, his first attempts were not successful; but, nevertheless, he still persisted in them, undaunted by repeated failures, till at length he succeeded in constructing a Newtonian reflecting telescope of five feet focal length.

Now Herschel began to turning to account the resources which he had acquired by his constructive skill and industry. He applied himself diligently to a careful observation of the heavenly bodies, and the study of all the phenomena which throw light upon their constitution, movements, and laws. The results of his observations were communicated in his papers of "Philosophical Transactions," one of the earliest of which contained an announcement of his having discovered what was then supposed to be a comet, but was soon ascertained to be a new planet. The discovery took place between ten and eleven o'clock on the evening of March 13, 1781. While observing some stars in the constellation Gemini, Herschel noticed one that appeared larger than the rest, and, on examining it with greater magnifying power, he soon found its position with relation to the other stars was changed, which proved that it was in motion. It is remarkable that the planet had been repeatedly observed, and its position recorded as a fixed star by various astronomers, one of whom, Lemonnier, could not have failed to discover that it was a planet, if he had but brought into our view all his observations of the same object. In a spirit of unshaken loyalty—or, as many would say, unworthy flattery—Herschel proposed to call the planet Georgian Sidus, or the Georgian Star, in honour of George the Third, who was then king. But astronomers, who have other objects in view than the gratification of royal vanity, could hardly be expected to accede to such a title; still less could foreigners consent to pay such homage to a sovereign who had no claim upon their allegiance. Lacking the aid of the French astronomer, with a proud worthy desire to honour the discoverer, proposed that the planet should bear his name; and many voted upon his suggestion. But even this did not meet with general approbation; and after some discussion, the name of Uranus, by which the planet is now known, was proposed by Bode and lived upon a most appropriate.

The next discovery of Herschel took place in the early part of the year 1787, when he established the existence of two satellites of Uranus, and made an approximation to the time of their revolution. Ten years later he discovered the four other satellites of this planet. He had great difficulty in discerning them, and they have scarcely ever been seen since, whence some have been inclined to question their existence; but there appears to be no sufficient ground for doubt on the subject.

The effect of Herschel's discovery of Uranus was to bring him at once into public notice. His fame spread all over the continent, and he was appointed private astronomer to George III., with a salary of £400 a year. He now removed first to Bath, and afterwards to Slough, where he pursued his researches with unremitting ardour and great success. He married a widow named Mrs. Pitt, who was the mother of Sir John Herschel, the present worthy inheritor of the illustrious name. Of his private life after this time little can be said, because little is known on good authority. So scanty is the information respecting it, that even the dates of his knighthood, and receiving the degree of Doctor of Laws at Oxford, cannot be ascertained. But what we do know is, that for a long series of years, from 1789 to 1821, he communicated to the Philosophical Society a great number of papers upon the subject of his astronomical studies, thus showing that to the very last he retained his ardour in the pursuit of truth; for on the 25th of August, 1822, death brought his labours to a close, when he had nearly completed his eighty-fourth year.

It is beyond our province to give any detailed account of the discoveries of this great astronomer; but the bare fact that his various contributions to our knowledge of the solar system increased the number of heavenly bodies in it by one-half, shows how well-founded is his claim to universal admiration. Besides Uranus with its six satellites, and the two satellites of Saturn, he discovered the rotation of Saturn's ring, measured the rotation of Saturn and Venus, and by many observations and well-founded reasonings contributed largely to the advance of modern astronomy. Indeed it may safely be asserted, that to no one are we so deeply indebted for what we know of the solar system. But his discoveries were not confined to the solar system. It was he who first opened our eyes to the infinite vastness of the universe, by showing that our system is only one of a countless number of others, which extend throughout the boundless regions of space, not only far beyond mortal ken, but even beyond the most daring flights of human imagination. His discovery, in 1803, that many objects which looked like single stars, and had hitherto been taken to be such even by astronomers, were, in fact, pairs of stars revolving round each other, was the first step to more just conceptions than had previously prevailed upon this subject; and his grand speculations upon the milky way, nebulae, &c., contributed still further to this desirable result. Imperfect as is this sketch of what Sir William Herschel accomplished, it may be sufficient to show that he made many valuable additions to our astronomical knowledge; and when we reflect how important a bearing this knowledge has upon various practical arts—especially that of navigation and all that depends upon it—we see how great a benefactor he was to mankind, and how worthy he is to occupy an honourable place in the grateful recollections of posterity.

AMBOYNA, OR THE ISLAND OF DEW.

THE ISLE OF DEW, as the Dutch call the chief of the Moluccas, is little known to the world. Though only occupying a space of thirteen geographical miles, it has 30,000 inhabitants. It presents a very varied aspect. It rises from the sea towards a centre, with a gradual but broken slope dipping into valleys, casting up clusters of hills, or expanding into little table-lands. Some of the hills present a very pleasing appearance, green and verdant to the summit, while some have only woods at the base. English and Dutch travellers vie with each other in their descriptions of this capital of the Spice Islands. Temminck talks of an atmosphere laden with the soft colour of aromatic plants and flowers, and of rich plains shaded by sugar-cane and a palm. The prospect he declares to be enchanting in its beauty. Ver Huell is more enthusiastic than his comrade in description. The flowers of the island fill the air with fragrance. According to him, it is a perfect Eden, where a Sybarite might dwell in ease and luxury and voluptuousness all the days of his life. Some parts, however, are barren, but others are luxuriantly fertile. Here the nutmeg and the clove grow in rich perfection, and bring riches to the Dutch of more sure return than silver and gold-mines.

In addition to the spirit of the island produce woods abounding fragrant essences and oils with medicinal virtues, exquisite woods for cabinet-work, from which slabs for tables five or six feet in diameter are cut, one of which, of rare beauty, we have ourselves seen. Coffee, indigo, cotton, and pepper grow, but are not cultivated, as is cinnamon. But the island is almost wholly destitute of the necessaries of life. The Dutch have always kept down ordinary agriculture, and forced the people to depend on their commerce for support. Rice is a great article of food, and this is supplied by Java, Celebes, and Bengal. Yams grow in great abundance, and are an extensively-used article of food. But the best resource of the islanders is the sago, or Papan bread. This is the pith of a palm, the humblest, the simplest, of its tribe. It furnishes the principal food of the people, its delicate flour being baked into cakes. This is its native country—that is, in the region between Borneo on the one side, and New Guinea on the other. The quantity of pith from a single tree is immense, often as much as 600 pounds. The refuse left in heaps produces excellent mushrooms. The epiphytes of Molucca even eat certain white worms generated in the same refuse.

One palm-tree on this island produces a poison, used to poison water, in the early days of the Dutch, by the natives. They now make an intoxicating drink from it. The betel nut, tobacco, and the wild banana, are also found. It is singular that all the plants are cultivated on the spot, while the people are utterly neglected. They stand all away, without ever pinning them at all to the soil. To kill a tree, the gardeners dig round its roots.

Oxen and hogs are the chief animals, the island being peopled by quadrupeds. But birds were in the first city, in every variety of plumage—poultry, birds of Paradise, and many others. The odible birds' nests are found here, and exported to China, with treasurers, shark's fins, and small parcels of gold. To the same country they also send birds of Paradise, variously called Birds of God, Bird of the Sun, and King Birds. There is also a trade in feathers.

The people are of middle size, militarily both the best and the very impetuous, but easily appeased. They were discovered by the Dutch, who behaved to them with excessive cruelty, and exterminated them without any meritorious cause. They are now, however, a quiet race. They must have been a simple people when discovered, as they hid their food in a hollow bamboo. They now receive their pins from China.

The island is celebrated in the history of India and navigation, as the scene of a fearful execution by the Dutch of Captain Towerson and nine other Englishmen, nine Japanese and one Portuguese, known as the Massacre of Amboyna.

RELIGION AND ARTS OF THE ASSYRIANS.

It has been remarked in a former article on Nineveh, that the character of the Assyrians was eminently religious, though their veneration was falsely directed, and took a superstitious and debasing form. There are some lofty conceptions, however, in their sculptured embodiments of the power and majesty of God; and something of the religious philosophy of the Chaldeans and Egyptians must have been known to their priests. But in speaking of them as a people, it is their public worship and the popular creed that we must notice, rather than the abstractions which the priesthood conserved for their own order. In all countries, the sun appears to have been the earliest object of religious adoration; but, except among the Persians, popular ignorance and superstition personified this glorious symbol of divine power and beneficence; and hence Baal, or Belus, Orishma, Osiris, Apollo, &c. Baal was the supreme divinity of the Assyrians and Babylonians, and probably of the Phœnicians also, and as such is represented on a cylindrical iron fold-spear found by Mr. Layard at Kouyunjik, and supposed by him to have been the signet or amulet of Sardanapal.

On many of the Assyrian bas-reliefs, and other antique remains of the same country and period, an object is represented called a sacred tree, one of the forms of which is represented in the annexed engraving p. 92t. On the cylinder in question, the flowers or fruit of the tree are in the form of an acorn, and the king stands on one side, and a figure, described as a nuneh, on the other. The king holds up his right hand in an attitude of adoration, and in his left is the sacrificial mace. Above the sacred tree is the figure of Baal, the body of the god in a circle, the symbol of eternity, above which are the three heads of Baal an unusual mode of representing that deity, while from the sides spread the wings, and from below the tail and legs of a dove, typical of Mylitta, the Assyrian Venus. Among the sculptures excavated at Nimroud were several figures of Bazon, the fish-god of the Phœnicians, from which we learn that, in accordance with that intercommunity of worship which prevailed universally among the polytheistic nations of antiquity, the Assyrians imported into their pantheon some of the gods of the neighbouring nations. Among the twelve gods of the Assyrians, enumerated in a long inscription at the same place, are Asshur, probably deified here, and Ishtar, supposed to be the personification of the moon.

The predominant religious element, in the character of the Assyrians, is seen in the designs traced upon their domestic utensils, engraved upon their seals and moulds, and sculptured on the walls of the palaces of their kings. Of the clayen vessels of the impressions of seals found at Kouyunjik, several appear to be decorated with the mythology and religious worship of the country. Several of the bronze plates and dishes discovered at Nimroud are of similar character, and on some of them are represented deities of Egyptian origin, though evidently designed and executed by Assyrian artists. These remains of the mechanical industry and artistic powers of the Assyrians, while they evince the extent to which the feeling of religion, mingled with the every-day concerns of life among them, are also valuable for the glimpse they afford us of their domestic economy. They were dug out of a chamber of the north-west palace at Nimroud, which Mr. Layard conjectures has been the repository of the royal arms and sacrificial vessels; but which Colonel Rawlinson (who discovered, in an adjoining chamber, an alabaster vase, which appeared to have contained preserved fruit) is of opinion was the royal kitchen. The walls were of common sun-dried bricks, such as are used throughout Asiatic Turkey and Persia for ordinary purposes at the present day, except about three feet from the floor, where large burnt bricks had been used. In one corner was a well, with a raised mouth of baked brick three feet high; it was filled up with rubbish, but on being emptied to the depth of sixty feet, brackish water was found. In clearing out the rubbish which filled up the chamber, two copper caddis were found, about three feet deep, and two feet and a half in diameter; these were filled with a number of small bronze bells, several bronze plates, dishes, and cups, hundreds of ivory and mother-pearl buttons and studs, and various small articles in bronze and silver, the use of which is not very clear. The studs and buttons, and some metal nuts, appeared to have been used in the trappings of the Assyrian cavalry horses, and also in those attached to chariots.

Beneath the caddis was a number of bronze feet of Phœnician manufacture, which probably had been the receptacles for supporting vases and bowls. There were also found several plates and dishes, a wine-strainer of silver, and the handle of a vase, all of bronze. On the floor were also found several plates and dishes, which had been crushed to pieces. The floor of the upper part of the building was constructed of bricks, and the rest was a clay. Beneath the floor were several of large copper bowls and plates, cylinders, and basins, and a number of small vessels, some of which were decorated with designs, and some with inscriptions. The vessels were found in a chamber, which was about 17 feet in length, and 10 feet in breadth. The walls of this chamber were of brick, and the floor was of a similar material. proportions used in the composition of bronze at the present day. The bells, however, have fourteen per cent. of tin, which shows that the Assyrians had made considerable advance in metallurgy, and understood the effect produced by increasing the proportion of well stocked with fish, which are swimming in every direction, while at the bottom, as we must suppose, the crab and the turtle crawl, and the star-fish agitates its arms in search of prey. A small kind of crocodile, and an animal of eel-like form, are also represented.

Another of these bas-reliefs portrays a battle in a marsh in Southern Mesopotamia, in which wicker boats are used, precisely similar to those of the Ahajj Arabs of the present day. In a similar scene, the Assyrians are bringing their captives ashore, one of the boats being towed by a man swimming on an inflated skin. The boats of the Arabs of the Ahajj are thus described by Mr. Layard — 'They were of various sizes. In the bottom of some, eight or ten persons sat crouched on their haunches; in others, only one or two. Men standing at the head and stern, with long bamboo poles of great length, lever the bottom of the water with great rapidity, and the boats were propelled vividly to my mind the sculptured bas-reliefs representing the Assyrian wars in marshes of the same nature, and probably formed by the waters of the same river. The streets through the reeds, and the boats of rushes, are faithfully delimited in the bas-reliefs, showing how little the barbarous inhabitants of these great swamps have changed after the lapse of nearly three thousand years."

The bas-relief which has been reproduced in our second illustration represents a woman, barefooted, carrying some vessel in her hand, followed by four camels. The foremost of the animals has a halter depending from his head; and all the figures are executed with considerable fidelity and spirit. The glimpses which we obtain into the every-day life of the Assyrians by means of these bas-reliefs reveal customs and modes that have been perpetuated to the present day; but in all the higher arts the glory of the land has departed. Mounds of earth cover the palaces of Sennacherib and Sardanapalus, and where their banners flaunted in the sunlight as they led their thousands forth to battle, the traveller now beholds only the tents of the wandering Arabs.

HEALTH OF TOWNS.

THAT it is healthier to live in the country than in large towns, is a plain matter of fact which experience renders familiar to all. But it is only within a comparatively short period that any attempt has been made to investigate the causes of this effect; though without such an investigation it is obviously impossible to devise any means at all likely to be effectual in improving the health of towns. If we would arrive at an intelligent view of the subject, we must carefully consider the phenomena which are engendered in the course of years by the impregnation of the soil of cities with substances which are deposited there in the shape of refuse, or gradually accumulate from various sources. Everything that comes into contact with man partakes more or less of the character of clothing, and is similarly affected by the action of those causes which are in constant operation wherever men are collected together. Clothes, as we all know, require to be frequently washed and changed; and if we cannot cleanse and renew the soil upon which we tread, and the emanations from which are constantly rising about us, we ought at least to endeavour to maintain its natural purity as far as lies in our power.

Let the soil be impregnated with organic matter of various kinds; let it receive water enough to moisten it, but not enough to cleanse it; let this water be charged with a solution of sulphate of lime, which, by its combination with the organic substances luried in the soil, will give rise to the most noxious and poisonous gases; let the ventilation which might have carried off these deleterious emanations be impeded; let light, which facilitates the slow combustion of organic substances, be prevented from often reaching the ground; and we have combined all the conditions necessary to render the soil a pest-house of infection, a dreadful swamp under the show of splendour, whence silently go forth day and night the treacherous agents of so many diseases, which are in reality nothing but the natural and necessary results of this concealed corruption. Such, it cannot be denied, are the conditions to which culpable neglect too often gives rise in large towns, even in this enlightened age. Much has been said of late years about the health of towns, and something has been done towards its promotion; but those whose personal observation has made them best acquainted with the subject, are the loudest in their demands for further improvement.

The usual causes of the accumulation of those substances which tend to render the soil of large towns prejudicial to health, are, the necessity we are under of using organic substances for food, and the various consequences of that use, the employment of these substances in manufactures, the domestic animals which live among us, and the human corpses which were formerly—and are sometimes even now, if the statements in the public press are to be believed—buried in the heart of towns, and, wasting away by decomposition, after a number of years form a large mass of putrid matter. In towns lighted by gas, that is to say, in all towns of any extent, there is an additional cause of infection, and one which, if not counteracted, may become in time, productive of immense mischief. This is the development of vapours which, after being carried along with the gas in the pipes, issue through the escapes, and spread in the earth, giving it a fetid smell that betrays itself when there is any digging for repairs, make trees wither and perish by poisoning the roots, and taint the water in wells.

It is obvious from the above remarks, that the means of preventing the soil from getting into an unhealthy state must consist mainly in endeavouring to diminish, as much as possible, the quantity of organic substances which penetrate into the earth. The most customary and simple plan is, to pave the streets with stone. Independently of the advantages of this plan on the score of convenience for traffic, and the prevention of the formation of ruts and puddles, it evidently diminishes the permeable portion of the soil, since it is only through the interstices between the stones that anything can reach the earth beneath.

Among other means of accomplishing this important object, the following deserve special mention. There should be numerous water-pipes freely, if not constantly, open, so as to pan into the gutters a body of water sufficient to carry off all the filth from the houses before it has time to sink into the soil. Sewers and drains should be plentifully laid down and kept thoroughly water-tight. To prevent the dispersion of the vapours and fluids engendered by the gas, some recommend that the gas-pipes should be placed inside the sewers. It is alleged that such an arrangement would render the repair of escapes more convenient, but on this point there is some room for a difference of opinion. Cemeteries should be placed not merely quite out of the town, but also below its level; for if the water which runs through the soil finds its way by subterranean imbibition to the soil of the town, it is evident that the evil, against which we are anxious to guard, will be secretly gaining ground. Every species of manufacture which gives out much organic matter ought to be removed to a distance from the town, or carried on close to a stream of water, powerful enough to carry off everything of this sort at once. Lastly, the strictest vigilance should be exercised over all gardens, markets, and other places where organic substances are likely to accumulate.

But, besides resorting to such preventive measures as the above, it is of the greatest importance to employ suitable means for counteracting the infection which already exists in the soil. It is a fact, to which we can no longer shut our eyes, that in almost all our considerable towns the soil is more or less infected. This fact was prominently brought before the public mind with regard to London, in a recent report, drawn up with great ability by Mr. Simon, the medical officer to the City Board of Health. Unfortunately, it is not so easy, in the present state of our knowledge, to discover a remedy for the evil as to state how it might have been avoided. In this, as in other cases, prevention is better than cure.

The first step should be to let the oxygen of the atmosphere have free circulation wherever there are organic materials capable of becoming injurious to health by decomposition. It is well known that oxygen, especially when aided by the influence of light, has a tendency to convert organic matter into water, carbonic acid, and nitrogen, by a slow combustion, which, from the moderation of its action, involves no sort of danger. Thus, oxygen is a powerful agent, which destroys the sources of infection whenever it is brought into contact with them. Besides, the air, by penetrating freely into every hole and corner, has a tendency to dry the earth, the streets, and the walls of the houses. Hence, not only ought the streets to be of sufficient width, but the yards at the back of the houses should be large enough to admit the fresh air to that side as well as the other, for if this is not the case the work of purification is only half done.

The next means to be employed consists in the use of wells, a means which has never yet received a fair trial, but which, with proper management, is capable of being turned to good account. A single experiment by a skilled engineer may suffice to demonstrate this. Having sunk a well in an old tenement, the soil of which had been long impregnated with the manure to a considerable depth, he could not get any water from the well at all fit to drink, though the water of another well, situated at a little distance above this, was excellent. However, by dint of working the well, and using the water from it for purposes of cultivation, he at last succeeded in completely changing its condition. The water gradually lost its colour and its smell, all in the course of a few years it become quite fit to drink. It is evident that, in this case, the well performed the part of an exsiccative. It is said to wash the body of the soil by means of the water which was drawn up to it, dissolving and bringing with it the animal substances through which it passed. This action is naturally very slow, and depends upon the quantity of rain-water imbibed by the earth, and flowing down to the interior of the well; but it cannot be denied that, in general, when there are many wells in a town, they contribute to the gradual purification of the soil, especially if, at the same time, the preventive measures above indicated be adopted. But here an important observation suggests itself with regard to paving, and that is, that the paving, which in some degree prevents the soil on which towns are built from being penetrated with infectious matter, in the same degree prevents it from being cleansed by the rain which falls upon it, and would otherwise sink into it. This was remarked by the sagacious Franklin, who, in his will, observed that the soil of towns being paved and covered with houses, the rain is carried off, instead of penetrating the earth and renewing and purifying the springs; in consequence of which the water from the wells becomes worse every day, till in old towns it is not fit to drink. He therefore recommended the municipal authorities of Philadelphia to have water conveyed thither from Wissahickon Creek by means of pipes. There is evidently no other means of removing the evil than to have pure water had on from without; but at the same time it is desirable not to abandon the use of wells whenever they can be sunk, because of their valuable action as exsiccative, when the subterranean water that actually accumulates in them is occasionally exhausted.

A third resource, and one which is likely to be more effectual than any other, consists in the raising of plantations near the town. An eminent engineer observes, if the utility of trees in preventing the impoverishment of sloping ground, and mitigating the evil effects of violent or continuous rain, is undeniable, they must be no less serviceable in constantly counteracting the unwholesomeness produced, or on the point of being produced, in populous towns by organic matter and the excessive dampness of the soil. The roots of the trees, by spreading out in all directions within the soil, relieve it of the moisture, charged with organic and saline materials, that it has imbibed. At the same time the more distant portions of the roots, by virtue of the force of capillary attraction, draw up the earthy portion of the water with which they are imbued, and discharge it at the surface so sufficiently to raise and gradually evaporate, so that a permanent circulation is established. Hence, as has been said before, in general, the more efficient these plantations are, the more multiplied the water content. It has been ascertained by experiment that a small jar, placed in a glass flower-pot covered with a sheet of lead, so as merely to let the steam come through, will evaporate as much as twenty-eight pint of water in the course of only twelve hours. What, then, must have been the quantity if the experiment had been made upon a tree. At the same time that the water is thus drawn out, it is purified. The purplish is diffused through the atmosphere, and contributes to freshen and improve the air. The salt and organic substances are absorbed by the roots, and serve as nourishment to the trees; that, by this happy combination, the very deleterious substances themselves are employed to sustain the agents destined to counteract them. But in proportion to the efficacy of this means in promoting the health and improving the aspect of towns, is the necessity of careful consideration with regard to the number and arrangement of the trees in different quarters, the choice of such as are best for their respective positions, and the steps to be taken in order that the roots, as they extend, may meet with sufficient nourishment without ever passing through beds impregnated with substances that are deleterious, or deprived of the oxygen of the atmosphere. Unless these precautions are adopted, the success of the method must be greatly impaired, if not altogether nullified, because the plantations cannot thrive.

We have yet much to learn on this subject, but when the public mind is more fully alive to its importance, it is to be hoped no method will be left untried which has any chance of proving effectual. Surely if anything were needed to convince even the most obtuse and inert of the urgent necessity of prompt and vigorous measures of some sort, the recent outbreak of that dreadful pestilence which is now making such fearful havoc in almost every portion of the globe, is more than sufficient for the purpose. A matter of this sort should neither be left entirely in the hands of official authorities, nor be altogether beyond their control. There must be a co-operation between private individuals and public bodies.

THE REPUBLIC OF CHILI.

There is much has been written at various times about the New World, comparatively little is known of that portion of it extending from Peru to Patagonia, upon which nature has so profusely lavished her beauties, that it has been called the garden of South America. The approach to this beautiful and fertile country is fraught with much difficulty and danger; the wide desert of Atacama on the north, and the lofty Cordilleras on the east, presenting formidable natural barriers to travellers, who generally pursue the precipitous mountain route, rather than cross the sandy waste of the desert.

Soon after the conquest of Peru, the fame of the mineral treasures of Chili having reached Pizarro, he persuaded his companion and rival, Diego de Almagro, to undertake the command of an expedition to attempt its conquest. In the year 1535, Almagro and his followers set forth, but in crossing the Andes, the fatigue and cold to which they were exposed proved fatal to a large portion of his army. They were at first well received by the natives, but having penetrated as far as Copalimbo, they met with much opposition, and a battle ensued, in which the Spaniards were victorious; but so dearly bought was the victory that Almagro had no wish, in the then weakened state of his forces, to hazard another engagement with these warlike tribes, and hearing of a disturbance in Peru, he decided on returning.

In the year 1540, Pizarro resolved to renew the attempt to subjugate Chili, and appointed his quarter-master, Pedro de Valdivia, to the command of this second expedition. He, profiting by the misfortunes of Almagro, reached Chili without experiencing any loss, but on his arrival was attacked on all sides. In spite of the valiant opposition of the Chilian tribes, the Spanish invaders succeeded in penetrating as far as the province of Mapocho, now called Santiago, where Valdivia laid the foundations of the capital of Chili.

The Copacagnas were much harassed on all sides by the neighbouring tribes, and several battles were fought, in which the slaughter on both sides was very great. The wealthy and courageous soldiers formed a conspiracy to murder their general, that they might be enabled to return to Peru; but Almagro having discovered their base design, caused the leaders of the plot to be put to death, and, to divert the thoughts and satisfy the ambition of the soldiers, sent a detachment of them to the gold mines of Quilima. This plan fully succeeded, for when they beheld the vast extent of this region, all desire to return was gone.

From this time the Spaniards gradually extended their conquest, until their territory reached its present limits. Besides the narrow strip of land between the desert of Atacama and the river Bio-Bio, they gained possession of the part of Valdivia, the Archipelago of Chiloé, and the Island of Juan Fernandez.

Perhaps the most formidable enemies of the Spaniards were the Araucanians, a fine warlike race of people inhabiting the beautiful tract of land lying between the rivers Bio-Bio and Valdivia. They entertained an ardent love for their country and for freedom, and bravely resisted the hostile attacks of the Spanish invaders, who founded several towns in Araucania, which were repeatedly taken and destroyed by the brave people, who still rest in the interior.

Since the liberation of Chili, the independence in the year 1817, an independent republican government has been maintained, with little interruption, under a chief magistrate, who is a supreme director. During the year 1825, a congress was convened, which framed a constitution for the republic, which now forms the basis of the government. The independence of this country has been acknowledged by the United States and Great Britain. The republic of Chili is divided into nineteen provinces. The principal towns are Santiago, founded in 1541, by Don Pedro de Valdivia, and situated upon a plain extending the whole length of Chili; Valparaiso, the most important seaport of the republic, stretching nearly a mile along the shore, some of the houses being irregularly scattered over the hills, which rise abruptly behind the town; and Concepcion, on the river Biobio, possessing one of the most commodious harbours in the world. Coquimbo and Copiapo have also good harbours; and Valdivia, which is situated on a river of the same name, can boast one of the finest on the coast, but has no cultivated country round to give it importance.

"The climate of Spanish Chili," says Robertson, in his "History of America," "is the most delicious of the New World, and is hardly equalled by that of any region on the face of the earth. Though bordering on the torrid zone, it never feels the extremity their frequent occurrence, excite little attention. There are fourteen volcanic mountains, in a constant state of eruption, situated in that part of the Andes belonging to Chili, and many others discharge smoke at intervals. On account of their position in the centre of the range of mountains, the lava and ashes which are ejected do not reach beyond their limits.

The wealth of this productive country is not confined to the surface; the bowels of the earth yield unbounded treasures. Valuable mines of gold, silver, copper, and lead, have been discovered in various parts, as well as those containing tin and quick-silver. Much attention is paid to the gold-mines, which are very numerous and rich; the sands of almost every stream contain some portion of this precious metal. "Almost all the precipitous and broken ground," says Fraser, "contains gold in greater or less quantities; the surface of the earth in which it is found is generally of a reddish colour, and soft to the touch."

The silver-mines are found in the highest and coldest parts of the Andes. Many of them, though rich in ore, have been aban-of heat, being screened on the east by the Andes, and refreshed from the west by cooling sea-breezes. The temperature of the air is so mild and equable, that the Spaniards give it the preference to that of the southern provinces in their native country. The fertility of the soil corresponds with the benignity of the climate, and is wonderfully accommodated to European productions. The most valuable of these, corn, wine, and oil, abound in Chili as if they had been native to the country." The wheat is remarkably fine, and is said sometimes to yield a hundred-fold. The potato is indigenous to the soil; it grows wild in the fields, but only produces a small root of a bitterish taste.

The numerous rivers of Chili, fed by the melting snow from the mountains, flow with the rapidity of torrents, and are therefore seldom navigable, but irrigate the valleys, rendering them the most fertile in the world.

This beautiful country has been much convulsed by earthquakes at various times. Great convulsions are rare, but a year seldom passes without some slight shocks being felt, which, on account of done on account of the difficulty and expense of working them in this unfavourable situation. The copper-mines, which are generally situated near the coast, are very productive.

Antimony and bisulphate, as well as sal-ammonia and saltpetre, are found in great abundance in Chili. Pit-coal is also very plentiful. But it is impossible, in our limited space, to enumerate the products of this rich country, which, unlike many mineral districts, has a luxuriant vegetation.

We now proceed to introduce to our reader the subject of our engraving. The miner of Chili is bold, enterprising, and prodigal; so accustomed to the sight of the precious metals, that he learns to disregard them, and attaches but little value to money. As a class, the miners are extravagant in their habits, passionately addicted to gaming, in which pursuit they pass most of their leisure hours, and shockingly intemperate. They generally die in the greatest distress, cut off in their prime by the effects of their unhealthy mode of life and the deleterious gases which they inhale in the mines.

SIR EDWARD BULWER LYTTON, M.P.

CHARLES LAMB in writing of another, and, in his peculiar branch, a far more wonderful author, Daniel Defoe, has given us six fine lines which will well apply to that littérateur whose portrait is before us:—

“His was a various pen, that freely roved
Into all subjects, was in most approved.
Whate'er the theme, his ready muse obeyed,
Love, war, or politics, religion, trade;
Gifted alike to shine in every sphere;
Novelist, historian, poet, pamphleteer.”

his “Letters to John Bull.” This view of the matter we will consider hereafter.

The subject of our notice is the son of General Bulwer, of Heydon Hall, Norfolk, by Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of Henry Warburton Lytton, of Knebworth Park, Herts. Those who hold the theory that genius is inherited by maternal descent, will find a confirmation of their particular notions in the fact that Bulwer's maternal grandfather was a great scholar, a fine Hebraist, and a friend of Sir William Jones, one of the best Eastern scholars we ever had. A better reason may be found in the fact

SIR EDWARD BULWER LYTTON, M.P.

So well does this apply to Defoe, that we reflect that, in the Pall-mall edition of that great man's works, William Hazlitt takes the lines for his motto. Of course they might, perhaps, be applied to a dozen writers of the present day with some truth; but to none, in our opinion, so well as to Sir Bulwer Lytton. It has long been the fashion to call him the most versatile of writers; but the truth is, that his is not a versatile mind, having still the same shade of feeling or of thinking, whether it is intent upon a poetical novel like “The Last Days of Pompeii,” or a practicalist pamphlet like that Bulwer has lately published, “Baron and Scott, his mother's boy; for he was deprived of his father at an early age, and after listening to his mother's recitals of “Chevy Chase,” and other ballads from the Percy rolls, he wrote his first verses when he was six years old, that is, five years earlier than the age at which Pope

In a paper called “Knebworth,” in the “Standard,” the reader will find a full and pleasing account of the author's life.

In the fact, also, that no rude school experience disturbed the buoyancies of his youth, we may find a source both of Bulwer's peculiar strength and weakness. He was placed at several private schools, never at a public one; and then finished his education by means of private tutors, and afterwards at Cambridge. Whilst at that university he carried off the prize poem on Sculpture.

In 1823, Bulwer (for we must call him by the name by which he is endeared to the public) published his first literary effort, which is in verse, under the title of "Woods and Wild Flowers," a collection of fugitive verse. To this succeeded "O'Neil the Rebel" (1827); and in this year also, "Faikland," his next work, was published anonymously. But this was only playing at authorship; it was not till the year 1828 (but "Pelham" was published, and Bulwer sprang at once into a recognised author.

We take it that there are few people in the reading world who have not read "Pelham." The success of that novel was brilliant, and the reading public were absolutely thronging to the bookshops to read it. It was in the good old days of circulating libraries, before cheap reading had put a limit to their business, and when three volumes were the only books in vogue. "Pelham" was so well read, that some of the librarians must have made a small fortune out of that book alone. The reasons of its success were various. The hero was a dandy, a handsome man, and a petit maître; he was and from Sir Harry Wildair to Don Juan, such characters are universally admired by the weak. Secondly, the book was so faulty, yet so full of talent, that it made an excellent book to "cut up," to use the language of the critics, or to praise. Thirdly, and this was perhaps the greatest secret in those lord-hunting days, it portrayed, or professed to portray, the manners of high life. Lord Byron had declared, that the reason novelists did not succeed in descriptions of fashionable life was, because there was little to describe; but his dictum did not satisfy the craving after such descriptions. In these, it was acknowledged, Bulwer had succeeded:

"How ton finds her privacy broken;

We trace all her ins and her outs,

By the very small talk that is spoken

By very great people at routs.

At Tenby Miss Jinks asks the loan of

The book from the inn-keeper's wife,

And reads till she dreams she is one of

The leaders of elegant life."

Beyond these, "Pelham" was a first-rate book of its class. The hero was something more than a coxcomb; he was a scholar, and the book had altogether an air of learning and philology, which was greatly enhanced by the quotations from all sorts of authors, learned and unlearned, sacred and profane, which the author put at the heads of his chapters. The critics declared, that "The Adventures of a Gentleman," the second title of "Pelham," was nothing more nor less than the adventures of Mr. Bulwer himself; and we recollect well that one of them, criticising the book in the "flashing" style in which critics proceeded in those days, made various inclusions into the every-day life of the author himself, and found serious fault with him for daring to wear cleaned gloves. "Fie!" said he: "is this the exquisite Pelham, this the dandy who holds learned dissertations upon dress, cookery, and the fine arts; who rivals Brummel in the number of white neck-cloths which he wears? Fie! he in cleaned gloves! Pah! they smell abominably of turpentine!"

We only quote the above to show the style of criticism which was then thought smart and new writing. Critics were then not masters of the art; and the ridicule of Pope upon John Bunyan had driven serious and honest critical learning out of the field. The man who could get the most point and ill-nature into his article was thought the best critic, and paid accordingly. People never thought of giving an opinion on a book; the business of the critic was to make a smart article out of it; and to this kind of criticism were the artistic charms of Bulwer subjected.

His next works earned for him the title of the prose Byron, and the title is not misapplied; and declared him, for the time at least, a devotee of the "billions" school of literature. They were "The Disowned," published in the year 1828; "Deverex," 1829; and "Paul Clifford," 1830. Of these, all being well received, "Deverex" gained, and perhaps deserved, the highest praise. "We move," says "The Edinburgh Review," in 1832, "in this story, among the great; but it is the great of other times—Bolingbroke, Louis, Orleans. . . . No under-current of persiflage or epigrammatic indifference checks the flow of that mournful enthusiasm which refreshes its pictures of life with living waters; its eloquent pages seem consecrated to the memory of love, honour, religion, and unobviating faith." This is indeed high praise; but "Paul Clifford," a work of higher artistic merit and of much greater power, got upon all sides nearly as much blame. To say that it deserves the blame it had, and even more, would not be too much; it introduced to modern times the style which the great and wise Fielding had, in his days, so well laughed out of fashion. If Paul Clifford had been only admirable and excellent when repentant, it would have been far different. But it was otherwise. The reader, by the art of the novelist, was made to sympathise with the highwayman whilst absolutely in the saddle, and with his pistol to the ear of his victim! Then there was also the philosophic Tomingen, his companion, who had his mouth full of maxims à la Rochefoucauld, and who always, in a sentimental way, varnished over the ill deeds of the gang; and besides him a numerous set of thieves, who loved Mr. Clifford as their captain, and talked elegant slang, and robbed with an infinite gusto. Of course this was produced on the stage; of course, also, the representative of Paul Clifford, in sticking-plaster boots and laced coat, fired off his pistol and bade defiance to the laws of the country with impunity. The very town rang with it; it was villainy brought to a successful issue. Juveniles applauded from the gallery; their ideas of vice and thine were quite confounded; and a highwayman became, in their minds, synonymous with a hero and fine gentleman.

The better the thing was done, the more blameable was Bulwer. In this he held he perfectly succeeded; to us there is a certain gout and artistic excellence in "Paul Clifford," which he has never surpassed.

"The Siamese Twins," the natural production of our author's satire—and Bulwer is by no means an inferior satirist—was an intermittent production between his novels. He has ever been breaking out into poetry; and of the works he has given us in verse, this was the least successful.

Next to this came—as if in spite and defiance of the critics—a work which plunged him more deeply into literary immorality, and in which he gave a romantic glow not only to theft, but to murder committed in the perpetration of that theft. We allude to "Eugene Aram." No reader of the "Newgate Calendar" is unaware that a man of that romantic name did exist during the last century; that he was a man of some learning—a schoolmaster; and that he murdered an associate in a brutal manner, merely to get his money; that he was lauded for the crime, and that he made an ineffectual defence. Upon this slender foundation, by glossing over the bad and supplying the good, Bulwer created an affecting romance. Young ladies who despised their tradesmen, butchers, or shoemakers, let their tears flow for a murderer, who was tripped out in false sentiment. But the very success of the work—the sympathy which one human heart gave to the morbid feelings of another—was a triumph to the artist, and was all the dearer to the author because it was false. It was an exhibition of power and skill which pleased him then, but which he has long since grown out of; perhaps natural to a young man, but as blameable as it is weak and immoral.

To all this it may be answered, that Bulwer was not a man of genius, for men of genius seldom sin against true morality of taste, but that he was a consummate artist, working upon human hearts with words and ideas, and sporting with his work.

About the year 1831, Mr. Bulwer undertook the editorship of the "New Monthly Magazine," which, under the conduct of Campbell, had arrived at some reputation. In this he published the "Student," a series of papers, some of them excellent, some of them very weak and conceited. In 1833, appeared "England and the English," followed by the "Pilgrims of the Rhine," and that by "The Last Days of Pompeii," a most marvellous and interesting work, full also of scholarship, but followed by one equal if not superior to it, viz.,

"Rienzi," which one critic has declared to be the "most complete, high-toned, and energetic of all the author's works."

It was perhaps too much to expect of Bulwer to keep to high tone and morality for two series of novels; and consequently, "Ernest Maltravers," his next production, and its successor, "Alice, or the Mystery," showed him in a retrograde movement towards the Byronic school, with a moral, savage and melancholy in the triumph of the wicked and the affliction of the virtuous. His next work was "Athens: its Rise and Fall," a work which showed much learning and great facts. Passing over his plays, which we shall have again to refer to, we come to "Night and Morning," published in 1849, one of the most charming and natural of his works; next "Zimool," "Eva, or the Illomened Marriage," "Fida, or the Siege of Granada," and "Caldron the Countess," and amongst his latest are "The Last of the Barons," "Laureola, or the Children of Night," "Harold," a second novel, illustrating the Saxon period of our history, a period too little known; and his two last, and, in many respects, his most artistic and well-wrought works, "The Captives" and "My Novel," published in "Blackwood's Magazine."

The limits of this article will now oblige us to consider Bulwer as a dramatist and as a poet. Shallow critics, because he has attempted many varieties of writing, and has succeeded in them, have called him a versatile author. He is no such thing. No sooner did he publish anonymously, and in a totally different work of literature, than he was recognised. "The New Timon," his best and most manly poem, was at once attributed to him. It was in 1837 that this work was issued, purposely with out his name; only, as he himself says, "My identity with the author of these poems has long been generally insisted upon, that I have no choice but to own the indiscretion of frank avowal and the affront of flat denial." This, of course, does not show versatility; and not only was his disguise purposely, but it was well assumed. His characters had, in many novels, been declared to have been the reverse of Christian; but, in "The New Timon," he absolutely wrote upon the deepest mysteries of our Holy Faith, upon election and grace, and reads a lecture, and a beautiful one too, upon the necessity of faith.

Therefore the godlike Comforter's decree —
His sins be loosened who has faith in me;
Therefore he shuns the evils of the wise
And made no schools the thresholds of the skies;
Therefore he taught no Pharisee to preach
His word — the simple lit the simple teach.
Upon the infant on his knee he smale,
And said to Wisdom, 'Be once more a child!'

Of his "Prince Arthur," a fine poem, but throughout without a burst of genius, although it abounds in fine passages, we can here say nothing.

Bulwer's first play, "The Duke's Servant," acted at Covent Garden in 1837, was a failure. But he was not daunted by that, although, on the production of his next play, "The Countess of Lyons," his name was for some time kept a profound secret. From various causes, the success of this piece was tremendous. It is still acted every night in at least three theatres throughout England. The sum it must have brought to him, had he been paid for every performance, must have been immense; yet the unsuccessful play was much purer, better, and wiser, than the successful one. In the latter, a young squire, and a vain-glorious young man, whose mouth is ever full of the basest praise of himself, marries a young and beautiful girl, he assumes another's character. The upstart braggart is detected, and rebuked, and apologies in an indirect way for his conduct by a tight-rope man.

"He who feels repentance for the past Must woo the angel Virtue in the future."

A sentiment true enough; but the dramatist had forgotten, true to his rasuality and deception Claude Melnotte had been placed in a higher and better social position than he could have attained by quiet Christian virtue.

Next came "Rialto," then "The Stock Exchange," and "Vanity Fair," and lastly, written for the benefit of the present of our Society of Literature and Art, the comedy of "Not a Bad as we See," in which some of the first Revueurs of the day took part. "Rialto" and "Vanity Fair" are full of quotation and quotations, and are especially so in their scenes and plots. The poet laureate in Bulwer is in the secret and most successful of the two plays.

Of his parliamentary career we shall say little; for it is not by his political opinions that he is known, although it was, we believe, by his support of the Whigs that he earned his baronetcy in 1838. His politics were always liberal, and however much of the fine gentleman he may have been in his writing, his sympathies were ever with the people. His speeches in Parliament were not listened to with the attention he might have expected, partly because he had not the "ear of the house," and partly because of his delivery. "Littell's Sir Bulwer" has alluded to the policy of territorial lords, and during the Protectionist fever, wrote some clever letters to "Littell's Bull" on the "Necessity of Free Trade."

Such has been done out of the life of the ordinary man, the author of whose works is something peculiar, and we must recollect that he himself would of his way of writing, entirely by his own choice, the usefulness and success. With him the first step was to squander a title on a work which pleased the public, and then to recede the veil. He has proved of what an art, and has illustrated that virtue which one of his characters declares to be the end of all teaching, patience. He also shows us, in his letters, but hardly in a practical mechanics, a gratitude, which attention, application and the "dry" words of a man of business to him in the morning till one o'clock in the afternoon, was a long and tedious to him. "I am sorry ever to be writing." What an amount of labour has been performed in these two columns! He is, in fact, we are truly, very rapidly, averaging about twenty pages of novel points. Let us add to these new facts, that the novelist, and supposed Philistine, and has himself been not only of health by the water cure, in which he has published a pamphlet.

The most recent affair in which Sir Edward has been before the public, is in the establishment of a "Guild of Learning and Art," in conjunction with Mr. Dickens; and even more lately he will have been brought into a more extended circulation by a cheap reissue of his volumes in a series published by Messrs. Routledge, these book-sellers giving him twenty thousand pounds for the right of printing and publishing them during ten years. The following figures will show that the speculation has been a good one, and will also be an index to the estimation in which his novels are held, the publishers having sold of

Paul Clifford	27,000
Eugene Aram	27,000
Kenilworth	25,000
Pauline's	25,000
Pellam's	18,000
Lionel Lincoln	18,000
Ernest Maltravers	18,000

We must not, however, forget that a portion of these sales have not had such an time to be made, and that also the necessity of the arrangement, the first sale, them, and in which the other works.

Such is Bulwer's position with regard to the creation of his novels. His novel novels are the best experience, wisdom, Christian kindness, and that firmness of heart and thought which age brings to good men, having wrought more than a hundred also, let us think, has owed something to the example of a less prudent and more successful. Will we think of the "Vanity Fair," the "Stock Exchange," and "The Captives" of "Vanity Fair," the "Stock Exchange," and "The Captives" of all Bulwer's works.

That the novelists of the present day, who are writing their novels, are, in general, more successful than in the world, and very active. He has written, and is writing, many styles of writing, and in which he has been successful. In every French book, a novel, and in which he has been successful. This is the only one of the novelists of the present day, who has published a novel, and in which he has been successful. He has written, and is writing, many styles of writing, and in which he has been successful. This is the only one of the novelists of the present day, who has published a novel, and in which he has been successful.

MONACO, the capital of the little principality of the same name, which is under the protection of the king of Sardinia, is a small town on a point of rock stretching into the sea, nine miles north-east of Nice. The population does not exceed 1,200; and, though it is strongly fortified, it cannot be regarded as a place of any strength, since it is commanded by the neighbouring hills. The first of our two views, which is taken from a distant point, will make this apparent to the reader. The town is walled, and the castle overlooks the isthmus that connects the rock on which the town stands with the mainland. The environs are picturesque and agreeable, the terraces being planted with pines, cypresses, and plane-trees, and a multitude of aloes, cactuses, and other tropical plants, that give them quite an African aspect. Some elegant and on the tenth of June he commenced building the castle; and before they returned to their dwellings they built four towers." The gift of the place to the Genoese, by the Emperor Henry VI., was made twenty-four years before; but from various circumstances, and especially the rivalry of Nice, the republic was disinclined at that time to make use of it; it was sometimes in the hands of the Ghibellines, and sometimes in those of the Guelphs. In 1328 the Grimaldis, who sided with the last, and had already exercised their power for a time at Monaco, were definitely installed in their possessions.

Under their government, the town increased rapidly; they made it an asylum for the brigands, pirates, and bankrupts of all the neighbouring countries; and this heterogeneous assemblage of advenvillas, with beautiful gardens, and groves of orange and citron trees, are also in the neighbourhood.

The castle is evidently ancient, and has been erected at different periods, buildings of modern construction having been raised upon the old Gothic walls. The gate, surmounted by the arms of the principality, and the Saracenic carvings of the battlements, are the only portions worthy of remark. The castle was formerly the residence of the sovereigns of Monaco; but the present representative of the dignity of the Grimaldis resides constantly in Paris, drawing from his little principality of fifty-two square miles, and a population of 7,000 persons, an annual revenue of £5,000, chiefly derived from the orange and lemon groves of his beautiful territory.

Monaco claims to be one of the most ancient towns in Italy, and the reigning family to be one of the oldest dynasties. The first of the Grimaldis who figures in the page of history is Gibellino Grimaldi, who, towards the close of the tenth century, assisted William of Marseilles in expelling the Saracens from these coasts, and obtained, in return for this service, a grant of land and considerable privileges. The town, having been laid in ruins by the barbarous invaders, was rebuilt in 1215. "On the sixth of June," says the chronicler, Oggerius Paris, "Fulco de Castello, accompanied by several of the principal citizens, went, with three galleys, and other vessels carrying timber, lime, and implements of iron; towers grew as formidable as their predecessors, the Saracens. Defended by their rocks, they attacked the vessels of every state, even those of the Pope and the republic of Venice. "They made the citadel of Monaco," says the chronicler, Uberti Polietta, "a receptacle for outlaws, debtors, and criminals, who desolated by their predatory incursions all the coasts of Liguria." In 1357 the possessions of the Grimaldis were increased by the addition of the neighbouring towns of Mentone and Roquebrune; the former being the largest in the principality, having a population at the present day of 3,000 inhabitants.

Until near the middle of the seventeenth century, Monaco enjoyed the protection of the Spanish monarchs; but, in 1641, a secret treaty, concluded with Henry II., the reigning prince, substituted the protectorate of France for that of Spain, and the Spaniards were driven out of the town. This settlement continued till the French revolution, when, in 1792, the three communes composing the principality were constituted a republic, reproducing on a diminutive scale the constitution which had been proclaimed in France. The representatives of the people, assembled to deliberate on the destinies of the infant republic at the Port d'Hercole, and agreed upon an address, to be presented to the National Convention, praying to be received into the bosom of the French republic. The Convention, by a decree of the 15th of February, 1793, thus responded to their prayer:—"The late principality of Monaco is united to the territory of the republic, and made part of the department of the Maritime Alps."

When the allied sovereigns met after the battle of Waterloo, to parcel out Europe among them, transferring peoples from one master to another, as if they were droves of cattle, the prince of Monaco was restored to his power and possessions, the protectorate of the latter being taken from France and given to the king of Sardinia. Under the protection of the Holy Alliance, the prince made a solemn entrance into his capital; but, as before stated, he has since then continued to reside habitually in Paris, having become a French proprietor, and been made a peer of France by Louis XVIII., with the title of the Duke of Valentinois. The new arrangement of things was far from being regarded with approbation by the people, who regretted the French, and had to admit a Piedmontese garrison, while they were heavily taxed to support an absentee prince, between whom and themselves there existed no sympathy whatever. The consequence of this dissatisfaction was, that when the news of the French revolution of February, 1848, reached Monaco, the inhabitants of Mentone and Roquebrune rose in insurrection, and proclaimed their independence. Monaco did not participate in this outbreak, and even assumed a threatening attitude towards the insurgents. These discussions, and the prudence of the Piedmontese authorities, led to the restoration of tranquillity, which has not since been disturbed.

The scenery along the coast of the little principality is extremely beautiful, the southern slopes of the Maritime Alps coming down close to the water, and often terminating in bold points of rock. Here and there, between the hills, are narrow openings into the interior; and the voyager has scarcely passed Monaco, in sailing down from Nizza, when Mentone is seen, its white walls backed by the groves of olive and lemon trees, which are protected from the northerly and easterly winds by the high mountains behind. Nothing can be more delightful than sailing along this part of the Italian coast on a fine day, the dark green of the trees contrasting beautifully with the white houses and the deep blue sky.

NEARER VIEW OF MONACO.

THE BRIBE OF THE ROMANOFF.

BY SILVERPEN.

Russian officialism is Argus-eyed. In the Post-office this vision has an almost fabulous efficiency—it reads, where honest men would be blind!

Miss Ida Temple, or, as she is more commonly called, Mademoiselle Ida, the English governess at the boyards, the Mareschal Romanoff, has had no letters or English papers for many weeks. Official report says, there has been no post; but the fact is, that even Argus-vision may be overtaken; and till the secret police have done their work of inspection, mademoiselle may not have her letters. It is not suspected that she is a traitor to the Czar, but the great Mareschal Romanoff does not wish to lose her brilliant services, for the sake of his young daughter Olga, but more for his own. He might do so, if mademoiselle knew that England and France had declared war against Russia; that an English fleet was already cruising in the Baltic; or that the hour was not, perhaps, far off when Cronstadt would be bombarded.

The letters have been at length looked over and carefully re-sealed—there is an art even in the basest duty—and the bearded employé, attended by one of the high police, disguised as a common soldier of the imperial guard, takes his way to the palace of the mareschal, in the splendid Newski-street, at no great distance.

The letters are carried in to the mareschal; the disguised police official follows, for he has something to impart. It is morning; the mareschal, who holds a high official position about the person of the Emperor, is looking over some despatches just brought from the winter-palace by an aide-de-camp; and he and the employé are alone.

"Well, what news?" It is customary in Russia to make inferiors sensible of their inferiority.

"The post-office interpreter says, that there is no mention of English politics in the letters just handed to your excellency, but that one from Lieutenant —" Here the official hesitates, refers to his notes of the transaction, but finds the English name difficult to pronounce.

"Eliot," suggests his excellency, who, like many Russians of the aristocratic class, speaks English with considerable fluency.

"That a letter from this Lieutenant Eliot has been sent to Mademoiselle Ida to her father's parsonage," continues the official, when he has most humbly thanked the mareschal for his suggestion of the name; "and that it came enclosed in one from the captain of his ship—the 'Amphion,' now in the Baltic."

"Ah!" A look of charin passes across the face of the illustrious boyard. This signifies much to the official, who proceeds to put an ordinary question—"Am I to understand your excellency that further letters are to be wholly suppressed?"

"No; but carefully examined, M. lko;" for such is the employé's name. "There are particular reasons for carefulness in the respect. Now go." The marshal, as he speaks, takes some silver roubles from a purse on the table, pushes them towards the compagnon, and then haughtily waves his hand as a sign for him to go.

Once alone, the marshal rises: he walks up and down the most English-like apartment, and stays occasionally to lean his arm upon the costly chimney-shab above the open fire-place. As he thus stands, a side-door gently opens, and a very young girl, not more than twelve or thirteen years of age, comes quickly in, and, crossing to the bright hearth, twines her arms about the thoughtful man's neck. The caress is gladly received, gladly returned, and she is locked in the embrace she has sought. She is very fair and lovely, though so young, and the eyes which look down upon her are full of pride and love.

"I am glad you are come, Olga; for I wanted you. There is an English post in, and letters for mademoiselle. You can mention this, and send your bonne Ninette for them. I presume that mademoiselle will be pleased."

"Oh! rejoiced, papa; mademoiselle pines much about her English home, though she does not say so. These letters will make this quite a bright day; for now the thaw is over, we shall take a drive. We have much to see and do, and many calls to make."

"Upon whom, Olga? Upon no English, I hope."

"I sorely know, papa"—and the fair young creature runs over a list of the Russian nobility; "but if we go to the houses of any of the English, it will only be to the British chaplain's or the embassy."

"But the English minister is gone; and so is Mr. Moston, the rich English merchant."

"Where, papa? It is three months since mademoiselle, on account of her illness, left the palace, and she will have news enough to learn. But tell me—why have these English left St. Petersburg?"

"My pearl must not ask secrets," replies the marshal, as he affects to pinch his darling's ear, but kisses her brow instead. "There, take mademoiselle her letters, and say nothing about this matter; only see she visits no English, and is not over-fatigued; and stay—the day is cold enough—I hope she'll wear the silver furs I sent her on your *p*te day. Will she, do you think?"

"Yes, papa; I heard her say she would."

"Now go."

These last words, trifling as they are, have removed a weight off the marshal's heart; he smiles, resumes his seat and his duties of Russian statesmanship—such as they are.

The room in which Olga seeks her beloved mademoiselle is a sort of boudoir or study, for it has all the appliances and luxury of both. A portion of the early lessons are over, yet some still remain; and Miss Temple sits looking over a German exercise, when a sweet face rests upon her shoulder, and a young voice cries: "Guess what I bring?"

Miss Temple changes colour.

"Oh! English letters, I hope!" And, laying down her pen, she clasps and rises her hands. There is supplication in this action, but more in the expression of her face.

Olga lays down the letters, and retires to a seat opposite, where she resumes her studies, that she may the earlier conclude them; though she occasionally glances off her back to see if her beloved friend is pleased with the news contained in her letters. Her face gives few signs beyond that of eager interest, till she comes to the close of the one she has opened first, when a shade of disappointment crosses it, and she sighs heavily. Olga is by her side in an instant, and questions her tenderly as to whether there be ill news.

"None, dearest. My father is well; dame Graham, his house-keeper, is as fit and as good-tempered as ever; the dogs, and garden, and parish folks, thriving. No, nothing but a trivial disappointment about a letter I have long expected, and which ought to have been sent on. Now let us see what other correspondents say." And turning off the subject, she reads the rest of the letters. This is soon accomplished, for their importance is but trifling. The lessons are then resumed and ended, and mademoiselle and Olga retire to their several apartments to dress for their morning's drive.

When they meet again, the dress of each is plain, though rich; but Olga misses in an instant the silver furs which the marshal had sent for purposely to Siberia, and which mademoiselle had promised to wear.

"No, dear," is the reply to the question; "I prefer my English shawl: the day is not very cold, and to wear it reminds me of home. Such trifles amount to much in a foreign land." Olga is vexed, because her papa will question her, and will be angry when he hears the truth.

A splendid droschki, with silver bells, awaits them in the courtyard, and they drive to the park of the beautiful Michaelov Palace, where they have an cabriolet, making calls by the way at several stately residences. It is a mild spring day, the great thaw of the Neva is over, and the power of the sun already betokens the near approach of the hot Russian summer.

Passing on their return through a wide street, thronged with pedestrians of many nations, Miss Temple recognises, in a young man vastly bearded and muffled up, as though for the purpose of disguising a German clerk in the employ of her friend the English merchant. He seems to shun the recognition of passers-by; but mademoiselle, bidding the driver of the droschki stop, addresses him, and makes inquiry after Mr. Moston and his family.

"They have left St. Petersburg, and that suddenly," is the rapid answer.

"Why?"

"Do you not know what every body else knows?"

"No."

The young man, with a perfect consciousness that the driver is an accredited spy—for what Russian mental is not—says rapidly in Italian—he has hitherto spoken in French—"War!"

Mademoiselle clasps her hands, and turns as pale as death.

"Yes; war is declared between the Western Powers and Russia—indeed, may be said to have commenced. I dare not stay to say any more, for I am lingering here on sufferance, or rather in disguise, to take care of some of Mr. Moston's business affairs." He makes a slight salute, and dives into the crowd.

"Drive to the chaplain's of the English embassy," is the order given to the driver.

"The distance is considerable, mademoiselle," replies the driver; "and I had his excellency's orders to avoid the houses of the English; but if—"

Vexation is here suggested, and the hint is taken; a rouble is slipped into his hand, and Miss Temple and Olga reach the chaplain's house in an adjacent suburb. There are visible signs of removal; Russian serfs and English servants are packing books and furniture; and the chaplain, a venerable, noble man, himself superintends their hasty services. Miss Temple is announced, and he meets her in the study.

"You are following his excellency, Mr. —," are Miss Temple's first words.

"No; I am sending away my precious books, and less precious goods, for safety's sake. But I remain; I have leave to do so. Many English will cleave to the country, come what may—human interests are selfish things; but I must forget these, and remember human souls."

"Your's is a noble plea—the only one for lack of patriotism."

"Yes, Miss Temple, I am like the Puritan of old, who, when told to descend from his pulpit by command of the King, replied magnificently: 'I go on; for I obey a higher—the King of kings.' So I shall continue to baptize, to preach, and to celebrate marriage, though my heart will be with our dear country."

"As mine is, Mr. —; and this is why I have come, though with a spy on the droschki—to askness—to ask if—" Here she hesitates.

The chaplain knows something of her history, he has heard it from Mr. Moston; and smilingly takes a small paper from his pocket, which he hands to her.

"This, I think, Miss Temple, will give you every information; I prepared it at the cost of four roubles this morning, as my English papers had the usual pamphlet-size erasures. I may add, that Sir Charles Napier, and a magnificent fleet, are in the Baltic; the rest you will find here."

Her eye glances rapidly down the paper; it seeks what it finds:

but finding it nerves her still more earnestly for her great task. She, too, must leave Russia: before it was a duty, now it is a higher one. She accordingly talks the matter over briefly with her good friend the chaplain. He promises to visit the port, to see what ships sail west, to procure her a disguise with the friendly aid of a Servian shipwright and his wife, who have a daughter in the unreschal's family, and to whom Miss Temple has been most kind—and generally to plan her escape, and let her know the ensuing evening, whilst she is at the opera with Olga, what has been decided.

"There will be some trials in parting, I think, Miss Temple," says her good friend as she rises to withdraw. "These Romanoffs have spread round you an almost incredible luxury, the more so especially."

"I should welcome the last," replies Miss Temple, austere, "and regret it, if only for gratitude's sake, if I was not conscious painfully conscious—that an ultimately base purpose has suggested much of it. This is a truth to which I have been painfully, though slowly, awakening."

"I think with you, Ida Temple," says the chaplain, earnestly: "these Russians think that even our noblest women are to be bought by their bribes and gold. So go, for your country's sake, for your woman's sake, and, best of all, for God's sake. In this country, business seems to be the inheritance of men in high places."

"I shall have no regret," woops Ida: "it will be to part with my beloved Olga, my darling child."

"That you must overcome. When a cause is that of one's country and one's God, even natural claims prove light, much more a loved one's. Go! let me admonish you."

So promises: bids her friend adieu; joins Olga in the droschki, and they return to the Romanoff palace.

That night there is one of those brilliant assemblies at the Romanoff palace for which St. Petersburg is so celebrated. The highest nobility attend it, even princes of the royal blood; and music forms a part of the evening's entertainment. Gifted by nature with extraordinary musical ability, Olga, though yet a girl, is a brilliant player on both the pianoforte and harp, and sings with great effect and richer promise. She owes all this capability, beyond the part nature has bestowed, to Ida's tuition, who, herself a splendid musician, has been trained in the finest German school of music. Olga on this night excels herself, as does Mademoiselle Ida. The unreschal is proud on the one hand and enchanted on the other; nor is his enchantment lessened by the reserve of his daughter's lovely governess. Some natures are conquered by pride, as others by humility. On one excuse or another he detains her in the music saloon till the guests are gone; he then asks her to remain, as he wishes to speak to her; but pleading the lateness of the hour and her duty to his daughter, she retires.

The morning comes; a message reaches mademoiselle, that the unreschal wishes to speak to her, and that alone. As she, too, wishes to speak to him, she descends to his morning room. The doors are double, and the unreschal says that they are closed. But his words hang heavy on his lips, as he looks upon the calm, pure face of this lovely woman. As he is thus abashed, his visitor can say what she has to say first.

Dodging this at present to her, she says gently: "I wish I to see your excellency, and I have a resolution to impart. Your excellency did not inform me that war was declared between this country and mine. As I have learnt that such is the case, I have but one duty to perform—that is, to return to England."

"You really cannot be so earnest, mademoiselle, political circumstances can have no relation to private ones," says the unreschal in hasty and unsuccessful anger. "You are told me, I am told, necessary to Olga, and you cannot be spared at present." Her meaning has been willfully mis taken.

"I do not mean to leave of absence, my lord, but to withdraw finally and fully. I must sincerely be regretted and beautiful child, I am eminently so; yet you are so lovely, and your excellency's illustration—namely, I am grateful to the fact that all the benevolent acts you have showered upon me; but I would be business in me to eat the bread of those hostile to my country, and who seek to shed its blood. My lord, there is no comparison in a vulgar relation between private and public morality than your respect?"

"There may be, I do not care. But these are dangerous opinions, though I've long suspected your entertaining them; they are the natural fruit of the hated country which——"

"Stay, your excellency," is the proud interruption: "I am the Zaira an Englishwoman."

"I regret you are, for some reasons, though not for others. But let this pass. You cannot be employed even near the person of Olga. If so, is her love no temptation?"

"It would be, under almost any other circumstance, for I love her with a mother's love, under the present it cannot. I think I have now said all I have to say. I shall leave St. Petersburg, and your excellency's family at the public door. I will now withdraw."

She rises to go, but is detained by an iron grip. The Romanoff has come to say to her: the French-like an aspersion.

Russian-like, he thinks that his bride will prove efficient bonne. He paces up and down before her for some few minutes, then he stays. His voice and manner are changed.

"Can nothing else bribe you, mademoiselle, to make a rather home in our cold country? I have long wished to make a change in certain circumstances—of late more particularly. I wish further luxury to be yours—more consideration; it is my wish, as well as in my power, to effect both objects." He stays, looks at her, bows his head confidentially upon her shoulder, and says more softly:

"What I mean, mademoiselle—dear Ida—is, that our hitherto friendship be of a still more intimate kind; it would be a source of the interest happiness to me."

That pure, unmoved face looks steadily into his, as it asks: "Your excellency means that our relationship should be that of a Cossack slave, bought for her beauty in the slave-market of Constantinople, and her master?"

The Romanoff thinks that the bride has turned his purpose; he utters, as he utters: "Not exactly, beloved Ida. The Cossack is usually but one of a sisterhood; vous would reign alone, and be, moreover, an intellectual companion. For political reasons I shall never marry again; but you would be my wife in all but rank and name—a trifling difference in a worldly opinion."

"My lord," she answers proudly, "your opinion of me is broad different from what I hoped it was; for if purity cannot tempt, and corruption will not. For the future, have no respect for those you place about the feet of your child. It is not a child that I should fly."

She closes the cowardly attempt to constrain her, her door to the double doors, fortunately opens them, and begins:

MILITARY WATCH-TOWERS IN THE CRIMEA.

Both the climate and the soil of the Crimea are remarkably varied—so much so, indeed, that a description which might be perfectly true of one part, would require to be directly reversed in order to become applicable to another. The fact is, the peninsula consists of by dissimilar portions, which are separated from each other by the river Salsbir flowing from west to east. The northern part is almost wholly composed of extensive plains, which, though bare of trees, are not deficient in rich pastures, except where the shrub and salt-lakes are found. Some of these salt-lakes, which are very numerous towards the sea-coast, are fifteen or twenty miles in length. Throughout the northern part of the Crimea the climate is decidedly unhealthful, being opposed to hot in summer, and bitter-cold, as well as damp in winter.

On the contrary, in the southern part, that is, in the valleys and on the mountain slopes, a more salubrious climate prevails, and the fruits of all the seasons are produced in rich abundance. Among the productions of this soil may be mentioned, some hemp, flax, rice, sugar-cane, wheat, rye, barley, corn, potatoes, figs, and oranges. Dr. Clark gives a very interesting description of a district in the south of the Crimea. It there exists a terrestrial paradise; it is to be found in the district intervening between Katchubay and Salsbir, in the south-east of the Crimea. Protected by encircling alps from every cold and blighting wind, and only open to those breezes which are wafted from the south, the inhabitants enjoy every advantage of climate and of situation. Continual streams of crystal water pour down from the mountains upon their gardens, where every species of fruit known in the rest of Europe, and many that are not, attain the highest perfection. Neither unwholesome exhalations, nor chilling winds, nor venomous insects, nor poisonous reptiles, nor hostile neighbours, infest their blessed territory." This bears pretty evident marks of being tinged with the hues of the writer's glowing fancy, though in some respects confirmed by the testimony of other travellers. However true it may be of the particular district in question, there is certainly no other part of the Crimea so highly favoured; for at certain periods of the year reptiles of various kinds infest even the south, the air is far from salubrious, and fevers are pretty prevalent.

The most important place in the Crimea—at least in relation to other countries—is Sebastopol, a very formidable stronghold of Russian power. Highly favoured by nature with a spacious harbour and forty feet from the ground, and supported upon four stakes or trunks of trees. In many cases there is no ladder like that in our engraving, but, as a substitute, pieces of wood are fastened cross-wise, at intervals, to two of the supporting stakes. The Cossacks, who are keeping guard on the watch-towers to observe the movements of the enemy, set fire to a faggot of wood attached to a cross-beam above, whenever they think it necessary to give a signal. It is scarcely possible to form an adequate idea of the patient endurance exhibited by these sentinels. In spite of the severest cold, they remain whole days and nights on these watch-towers, exposed to the rain, snow, and wind, immovable and erect as statues, with their faces turned towards the quarter pointed out, never suffering themselves to be diverted for a moment from their duty by what is going on behind them.

Ker Porter, in his work on "Travels in Georgia," has given a view of a watch-tower which he saw near Mozdock, in the Valley of Robbers, facing the Caucasus. Another traveller, Robert Lyall, gives a drawing of one which he saw on the Kouban, and states, that bour and a commanding position, it has been very strongly fortified on scientific principles with an array of ramparts, bastions, batteries, and curtains, which are well calculated to strike terror into the heart of the bravest commander of a powerful fleet and numerous army. Nor can we reasonably wonder—however much we may regret—that so much hesitation should have been exhibited with regard to venturing upon an attack on this chief source of that domineering influence which Russia has been long exercising and extending over the Black Sea. With such a home for a powerful navy, she may bid defiance to every attempt to rob her of her supremacy in this part of the world. But if once it be wrested from her grasp, she will have lost the right arm of her strength, an effectual check will be put upon her aggression, and there will be some hope for the cause of peace, freedom, and civilisation.

At the present time, when warlike operations against the Crimea are much talked of, our readers may be glad to have a representation of one of the military watch-towers established there. The construction of these watch-towers is very simple. A wooden platform or trellis, four or five feet square, sometimes, but not always, surrounded by a sort of balustrade, is raised a height of thirty from the top of the watch-tower at Petrovskoye he was shown a marsh full of reeds, where about a thousand Circassians were said to have been drowned in October, 1821. The engraving which accompanies these remarks is taken from a drawing of one of the watch-towers ranged at regular intervals along the military line by the river Kouban, which forms the boundary between Russia and the tribes west of the Caucasus. "These posts of observation," says the artist, "are merely a kind of watch-towers raised on four props to a height of fifty feet above the ground. Two Cossacks are on guard there day and night. On the slightest movement of the enemy in the vast plain of rushes by which the river is bordered, a signal fire is lighted and hoisted to the top of the watch-tower. If the danger is more than usually imminent, they set fire to an enormous torch of straw and tar. At this signal, which is repeated from post to post along the line, the whole force take arms, and almost in an instant five or six hundred men are assembled at the point which is threatened. These military posts, each of which generally has a dozen men, are placed very near each other, particularly in dangerous passes, and at regular intervals small forts are raised with batteries and several pieces of cannon."

THE AMERICAN SPARROW-HAWK.

THE AMERICAN SPARROW-HAWK.

At the head of the interesting class of birds—induced, no doubt, by the usual tendency of mankind to honour those who are pre-eminently endowed with the faculty of destructiveness—most naturalists have placed the rapacious tribes, which wage continual war upon all their less powerful neighbours. It is true that, in these latter days, when old prejudices are gradually passing away, some naturalists have cast them from their high estate to make room for other perhaps not more worthy occupants; but in the popular mind the eagle is still the "king of birds;" and when viewing his majestic form, his piercing eye, and strong and lofty flight, bearing in mind at the same time the terrific weapons with which he is armed, it is not easy to imagine any more expressive emblem of those qualities for which men were and are still raised above their fellows.

The rapacious birds are characterised especially by the form of the beak, the upper mandible being considerably longer than the lower and hooked at the end, forming a most formidable instrument for tearing the flesh from the bones of their prey. The legs and feet, too, are very powerful, and the strong sharp claws partaking of the form of the beak, are adapted for seizing their victim with a deadly grasp. They are remarkable also for their great length of wing and strong and rapid flight—qualities in which, as probably in courage, the eagle is excelled by many of his smaller relatives, the falcons.

The males of these birds are generally much smaller than the females, and often differ from them considerably in colouring; their plumage also changes greatly with age, the young birds often appearing in a dress very different from that which they are ultimately to wear, and as the mature plumage is generally attained by degrees, the birds sometimes exhibit such multifarious characters in the different phases of their existence, as to have given rise to the establishment of half-a-dozen species in place of one.

One of the handsomest of the smaller hawks is that of which our engraving (p. 105) contains four representations—the American sparrow-hawk (Falco sparverius). This elegant little bird inhabits almost every part of the United States, but is especially plentiful in the northern portions. The female is about eleven inches long, and twenty-three in expanse of wing; the male is about an inch and a half shorter, and measures two inches less from tip to tip. The head is of a bluish ash colour, with the crown reddish; round the head is a whitish border, in which are seven black spots; the back is reddish bay, barred with black; the under side of the body yellowish white streaked with brown; the quill feathers of the wings are black, spotted with white. The tail feathers are reddish bay, with a broad black band near the end, and beyond this a yellowish white tip; the two outer tail feathers are white. The beak is of a light blue colour, tipped with black; the cere and legs are yellow, and the claws blue-black. Such are the general colours of both sexes of this handsome bird, which differ nevertheless in several minor particulars which space forbids our pointing out.

The American sparrow-hawk builds its nest in a hollow tree; it chooses a hole pretty high up, where some large bough has been broken off. The female is said to lay four or five eggs of a light brownish yellow colour spotted with a darker tint. Wilson, the American ornithologist, who devoted his life to the study of the birds of his adopted country, has left us a most animated account of this little hawk. He says: "It flies rather irregularly, occasionally suspending itself in the air, hovering over a particular spot for a minute or two, and then shooting off in another direction. It perches on the top of a dead tree or pole, in the middle of a field or meadow, and, as it alights, slurs its long wings so suddenly, that they seem instantly to disappear; it sits here in an almost perpendicular position, sometimes for an hour at a time, frequently jerking its tail, and reconnoitring the ground below, in every direction, for mice, lizards, &c. It approaches the farm-house, particularly in the morning—skulking about the barn-yard for mice or young chickens. It frequently plunges into a thicket after small birds, as if by random; but always with a particular and generally with a fatal aim. One day I observed a bird of this species perched on the highest top of a poplar, on the skirts of the wood, and was in the act of raising my gun to my eye, when he swept down with the rapidity of an arrow into a thicket of briars, about thirty yards off, where I shot him dead, and on coming up, found a small field-sparrow quivering in his grasp. Both our aims had been taken at the same instant, and, unfortunately for him, both were fatal. It is particularly fond of watching along hedge-rows and in orchards, where small birds usually resort. When grasshoppers are plenty, they form a considerable part of its food." The remainder of its sustenance is made up of small snakes, lizards, mice, and birds, and it rarely eats anything that it has not killed for itself, and even this is occasionally rejected, if out of condition. In illustration of this, Wilson relates the following anecdote:—"One morning, a gentleman observed one of these hawks dart down on the ground and seize a mouse, which he carried to a fence-post, where, after examining it for some time, he left it, and, a little while after, pounced upon another mouse, which he instantly carried off to his nest, in the hollow of a tree hard by. The gentleman, anxious to know why the hawk had rejected the first mouse, went up to it, and found it to be almost covered with lice, and greatly emaciated! Here was not only delicacy of taste, but sound and prudent reasoning—If I carry this to my nest, thought he, it will fill it with vermin, and hardly be worth eating." The voracity of this hawk may be imagined from the circumstance, also related by the great American ornithologist, that in the stomach of one of these birds, he found the greater part of the body of an American robin (Turdus migratorius), "including the unbroken feet and claws; though the robin actually measures within half an inch as long as the sparrow-hawk."

The blue jay (Carrulus cristatus), a very common bird throughout the United States, is one of the greatest enemies of the sparrow-hawk—at least as far as most vociferous attacks with the tongue may be regarded as signs of enmity. Like all his congeners, he has the greatest facility in imitating sounds; and, when disposed for a little quiet fun, can mimic the notes of other birds with such exactness as to deceive the most practised ear. He appears to be particularly fond of teasing the sparrow-hawk with his garrulous nonsense, "imitating his cry wherever he sees him, and squeaking out a—if caught; this soon brings a number of his own tribe around him, who all join in the frolic, darting about the hawk, and feigning the cries of a bird sorely wounded, and already under the clutches of its devourer; while others lie concealed in bushes, ready to second the attack. But this ludicrous farce often terminates tragically. The hawk, singling out one of the most insistent and provoking, sweeps upon him in an unguarded moment, and offers him up a sacrifice to his hunger and resentment. In an instant the time is changed; all their buffoonery vanishes, and loud and incessant screams proclaim their disaster."

A much smaller bird than the jay, however, is able singly to drive this depredator from his haunts, at least during the breeding season, when affection for his mate and young prompts him to exert all his powers and dare every danger to save them from the destroyer. This is the king-bird or tyrant-flycatcher (Muscicapa tyrannus), a bird of passage in the United States, whose dauntless courage makes even the eagle fly from his attacks.

NEW ENGLAND IN THE REIGN OF CHARLES II.

It seems to be a law of the human mind, that the feeling of loyalty and the desire of conserving old institutions diminishes as the distance is increased between the individual and the land of his ancestry. A new soil, where all the facilities of man have full scope for their development, fosters that love of freedom which is inherent in human nature, and distance from the seat of power suggests ideas of independence.

The law to which we have alluded showed itself in operation in the American colonies of Great Britain at a very early period. The vessel that conveyed to America the intelligence of the restoration of monarchy in England, bore from the vengeance of Charles II. two of the judges who had signed the warrant for the execution of his father—Whalley and Goffe. Indeed, the governor of Massachusetts, received them with kindly hospitality; and before the royal order for their arrest reached Boston, the fugitives were enabled to escape to New Haven. The authorities of the Bay State, being required to execute the warrant, published a proclamation against them; but no one betrayed them, or made any attempt to accomplish the royal purpose. Dixwell, another of Charles's judges, joined them shortly afterwards, and, in spite of all the efforts to apprehend them, they passed the remainder of their days in America.

It was not until nearly twelve months after the receipt of the news of the restoration that Charles was publicly proclaimed in New England, and then all demonstrations of joy were strictly prohibited. The restrictions which the English government had placed upon their commerce had aroused a feeling of indignation among the colonists, and the General Court had drawn up a declaration of rights, which evinced their boldness and the advanced state of development which their political ideas had already attained. They claimed a degree of liberty which left the crown but small prerogative, though not more than had already been conferred, by royal charter, upon the colonists of Connecticut and Rhode Island. But his lauded intentions of revenge probably rankled in the mind of Charles II., for he refused the same rights to Massachusetts, and a struggle immediately commenced between the colonists and the government at home.

A remonstrance was drawn up for presentation to the king; but some of the sturdy democrats thought this unnecessary, arguing, that their compact was to pay a certain amount to the king, and that all notice of him beyond that was only by way of civility. The remonstrance was received unfavourably, and Massachusetts was ordered to send Bellingham, the governor, Hawthorne, an influential magistrate, and three other gentlemen, to England, to answer the charges made against the colony. The General Court assembled to deliberate upon the measures to be adopted; and, after fortifying themselves with prayers and psalms, they decided upon refusing to comply with the royal mandate. The colonists triumphed; England was then engaged in war with Holland, and in a condition to reduce them to obedience. The Navigation Act became a dead letter; not a single custom-house was erected, and the port of Boston, enjoying all the benefits of unrestricted commerce, became the most prosperous on the shores of the Atlantic.

The charters conferred by the king upon the colonists of Connecticut and Rhode Island have already been mentioned. The results were such as gladden the heart of the philanthropist to contemplate. Free and self-governed, enjoying all of independence but the name, the population of Connecticut doubled in twenty years, and such a degree of material prosperity and social happiness was attained as had never been known before. "To describe its condition," says Bancroft, "is but to enumerate the blessings of self-government by a community of farmers, who have leisure to reflect, who cherish education, and who have neither a nobility nor a populace." Contemporary writers speak of it as realising the Homeric fable of the Age of Gold. So great was the general prosperity, and the sense of morality, that locks and bolts were unknown; the richest of the colonists had no other fastening to their doors than a simple latch. We again quote Bancroft. "There were neither rich nor poor in the land, but all had enough. There was venison on the hills, abundant fish in the rivers, and sugar was gathered from the maple of the forest. The soil was abundantly justly divided, or held faithfully in trust for the public and for new comers. Happiness was enjoyed unconsistently; like a sun and heat, it was the condition of a pure and simple life. There was for a long time hardly a lawyer in the land. The husbandman sold his own plough, and fed his own cattle, was the great man of the age; nor was any one superior to the matron, who, with her busy daughters, kept the loom of the wheel incessantly alive, spinning and weaving every article of dress. Fashion was confined within narrow limits; and public buildings had no grand magnificence than a pillion, exalted only in the common splendour of the blue and white linen gown which, proudly stretched and framed, was worn on public days by every woman of the land. The time of sowing and the time of reaping marked the progress of the year; and the plain dress of the working day and the more ornate attire of the sabbath, the progress of the week.

"Every family was taught to look up to God as the funder of all good. Yet life was not somber; the spirit of God breathed with innocence; religion itself assumed a garb of gaiety, and the annual thanksgiving was as joyous as it was sincere. Frugality was the rule of life, both private and public. Half a century after the conclusion of the charter, the annual expense of government did not exceed eight hundred pounds.

"Education was always regarded as an object of deepest concern, and common schools existed from the first. A small college was early established, and Yale owes its birth to its worthy fathers, who in 1700 assembled at Bradford, and each one laying a few volumes on a table, said, 'I give these books for the founding of a college in this colony.'

"Political education was a natural consequence of the constitution. Every inhabitant was a citizen, and every citizen, irrespective of wealth, condition, or any other circumstance, was possessed of the franchise. When, therefore, the progress of society and of events furnished a wider field of action than mere local politics afforded, the public mind was found equal to its circumstances; emerging then from the quiet of its origin into scenes where a new political world was to be created, the simplicity which had regulated the affairs of the village gained admiration in the field and the forum."

The constitution of Rhode Island was as liberal as that of Connecticut. George Baxter, of whom nothing more is known, arrived with it on the 24th of November, 1663, and was received with a suburban joy, worthy of men who fear God, love their fellow-men, and respect themselves. Our second illustration represents Baxter holding up the charter to the gaze of the immense concourse of people that was assembled on the shore to receive it. The scene is thus described by Bancroft in his history:—"The letters of the agent were opened, and read with good delivery and attention; then the charter was taken forth from the precious box that held it, and was read by Baxter in the audience and view of all the people; and the letters, with his Majesty's royal stamp and broad seal, with much becoming gravity, were held up on high, and presented to the perfect view of the people." Perfect liberty of conscience was secured by this charter, and Rhode Island, like Connecticut, became, in the words of the pious John Haynes, "a refuge and receptacle for all sorts of consciences." The constitution of Maryland, while disregarding the minor distinctions of sect, required subscription to the faith of the Gospel; but that of Rhode Island was based on the broad and beautiful principle of universal brotherhood, and excluded no man, whatever his belief, from the rights of citizenship.

New Hampshire was at this period a portion of the state of Massachusetts, and shared in its prosperity and happiness; but in 1679, the English government, which had neither forgiven nor forgotten the obstinate resistance of the sturdy colonists of the Bay, separated New Hampshire from its jurisdiction, and erected it into a royal province, the president and council of which were to be appointed by the crown. The change was unwelcome to the people; and the discontent with which they viewed it was increased by the attempts of one Mason to enforce a claim to the lands of the province, a claim which had long lain dormant, but which was now revived with the concurrence and support of the English government. Mason departed as his agent a needy adventurer named Cornfield, who arrived in the province with a mortgage on all the lands for twenty-one years, and the appointment of governor conferred upon him by the home government. He calculated upon realising a splendid fortune, as, by an arrangement between Mason and the government, one-fifth of all quit-rents had been alloted to him as his salary; but in this anticipation he was greatly disappointed. The colonists opposed a steady and determined resistance to all his measures. Association was formed for the purpose of hindering the collection of the tax which he imposed. The sheriff and his officers were forcibly expelled whenever they pursued themselves to distrain upon the goods and chattels of the inhabitants; and his soldiers, he was told, and I found his mind, found behind him, and a halberd on his back, was in the hands of the people, and he was driven out of the province.

The war of independence was not yet proclaimed, but the spirit of the people was already kindled up. The government of the province was in a state of confusion, and the people were in a state of rebellion. The British government, however, did not wish to shed blood, and in 1776, the province was restored to the crown.

government, gave validity to that measure by an act of its own. The king was exasperated rather than mollified by this step, and was more determined than ever to annul the charter. A deputation to avert his anger was unsuccessful. The entire population was roused and agitated; the General Court deliberated a whole fortnight as to whether the king's forbearance should be purchased by implicit submission to his will. The majority were still firm. "The civil liberties of New England," said they, "are part of our inheritance; shall we give that inheritance away? It is objected and shall be accounted martyrs in the next generation and at the great day." This view of the matter was accepted and persisted in; and on the 2nd of July, 1685, the act for annulling the charter arrived in Boston, where it was received with all the signs of mourning and woe.

JAPAN AND THE JAPANESE.

THE people of Japan appear to be, when left free to themselves, of a very jovial and merry character, capable of strong feelings and lished letters contain very curious details. comes rushing up at a very early hour, and, as usual in all military countries, from Great France to Little Nippon, is kept back by the soldiery. These individuals, however, necessarily vary much in costume, according to the country. In Japan the soldiers of the imperial guard are clothed in white vestments, with head-pieces varnished with black wax, and armed with two scimitars and a pike. These guards, on a grand field day, keep the centre of the road, which is strewed with white sand, clear for the coaches and horses and palanquins. Meanwhile scaffoldings arise on all sides for the sight-seers.

The first sign of the show, on a recent visit from the Ziogoon to the Mikado, was the running about of servants with presents in square lackered chests. Then came sedans of white wood about a fathom high, painted and inlaid with copper, in which were the ladies of honour to the Deera, or Ziogoon. Then came twenty-one sedans more, covered with black wood gilded, all full of ladies; then twenty-seven more containing nobles; the whole with gilded doors and windows.

Following these might be seen a crowd of twenty-four nobles on horseback, with small black waxed caps, with a little black plume; wide-cuffed sleeves, and pantaloons somewhat in our fashion, of satin of various colours, embroidered with gold. They looked grand indeed, says Cramer, with their golden scimitars, their quivers and bows, fastened by needle-worked scarfs, with long-tasselled fringes hanging over each horse's side. They wore black boots, like Wellington boots, with golden stripes. The horses were very handsome creatures, with golden and waxed saddles, the seat being silver and gold, or made of tiger skins, their manes plaited with silk, silver, and ribbons of gold. They wore also a kind of net-work over the breast and hind-quarters, of crimson silk full of tufts, and on their foreheads a golden horn. To deaden the sound of their steps, their shoes were of interwoven silk. Each horse was led by two grooms, while two great umbrellas, made of fine linen, covered with red cloth, with a silk fringe about them, being carried before, served to cover each horse, which was further attended by eight pages or servants, all in white liveries.

Next came three rich coaches, drawn by black bulls, covered by red silk mats, and led by four grooms in white livery. These vehicles are said to have been eighteen feet high, twelve long, and six wide, like our advertising vans, and adorned with latten figures and gold. They had three windows on each side, and two before, which were hung with red curtains. The entrance was behind by steps, ascending with turrets on each side, the windows beneath shaded with black wax, the tires of the wheels gilded, the spokes neatly turned and inlaid with gold and mother-of-pearl.

In these huge vehicles were the wives of the great man. The pages who waited on them were in white and very numerous, each carrying a gilded footstool and a pair of slippers. Besides their suite of pages, a train of ladies followed them in twenty-three sedans, made of white wood and plated with copper, each having an umbrella, two pages, and four stout men to carry them.

Then came horse-men, slaves, pages, and page-boys, then presented two gilded scimitars, all but the blade of massive gold, a curious trebuch, a sun-dial, two stately golden candlesticks, two large pillars of ebony, three square polished tables of the same wood, the corners tipped with gold, three disks, two mighty chargers of massive gold, and a pair of wax slippers, all carried by men of rank.

Then, says the narrator of this particular scene, there came two magnificent carriages exceeding all the former in gold, all gold, in which sat Sudofew-minamo Tonofindebanda, the Ziogoon, and the heir apparent, Oendefion-minamo Tonoyonemijtsauma. Eighty noblemen walked two-and-two before this pair of coaches, with scimitars and pikes, and eight men with ebony staves and steel batons to clear the way. After this came a confused and splendid mass of noblemen, inferior wives, and sedans full of men and women; and then thirty-four disguised like masquerades, being the Mikado's musicians, playing on several instruments, as pipes, tabors, cymbals, bells, and some string instruments unknown to us."

On such days as these the Japanese enjoy unusual amusements. The race-course is then open, the theatre plays. At Osaka, the Dutch travellers say, the theatre is superior to what it is elsewhere. The house is described as very large, containing, besides the pit, three tiers of boxes. The decorations, scenery, and dresses are said to be in good taste; but others declare that it is occasionally difficult for a stranger to comprehend the decorations on account of the extraordinary manner of placing the lines on the paintings. This is owing to the total absence of perspective.

The plays are usually founded on natural history or tradition, and the subjects are the feats, exploits, and lives of ancient Japanese heroes and gods. Many are devoted to enforcing moral precepts. The general tendency is said to be good, but Fischer modifies this observation in a way quite characteristic of the race. "In their heroic dramas the thirst for revenge shines pre-eminent as a natural characteristic, but always in union with a lofty courage. I saw a theatrical representation of one of the punishments by torture, which was astoundingly cruel."

Declamation is the great delight of the audience. The more the actor rants and raves, the more he delights, which is not an especial characteristic of Japan. But a greater merit still is to take many parts and play them well. There is little illusion, as the performers pass through the pit on their way to the stage. There are no actresses. In this the Japanese imitate antiquity. The female parts are played by boys. This arises from the fact that the Japanese, holding the profession in very low estimation, will not allow women to degrade themselves to it. A play in three acts is not represented all at once, but an act of another is played between, so that the spectators who have come for one particular piece can go out between whiles and smoke, drink sakee, and attend to business. The ladies remain with servants and change their dresses several times during the performance.

Dancing and music, we have already said, are favourite amusements. Minstrels and mount-banks frequent the streets, with tumblers, conjurors, and jugglers, and are very popular. Their beggars are merry vagabonds. They exhibit odd touches of humour. A bond of halt, lame, and blind will solicit alms in doleful strains; and the next moment, throwing off all dignity, leap about and chant merrily, as if under the idea that mirth is a more likely mood in which a man will give them melancholy.

In the great world the young ladies find delight, at their social meetings, in every description of fine work, the fabrication of potty boxes, artificial flowers, the painting of fans, birds, and animals, pocket-books, purses, quilting thread for hair-dresses, all for the favourite use of giving presents. These employments while away the winter evenings. In the spring, on the other hand, they participate with eagerness in all kinds of out-door amusements. Of these the choicest are afforded by the pleasure-boats, which, adorned with the utmost art and beauty, cover their lakes and rivers. In the enjoyment of society and music, they glide in these vessels from moon till late at night, realising the words of Thomas Moore:

"Oh, best of delights, as it everywhere is,
To be near the lov'd one! What a rapture is his.
Who, by moonlight and music, thus idly may glide
O'er the Lake of Cashmeer, with that one by his side."

The climate in the summer makes this amusement peculiarly delicious.

The women of Japan are very superior to the men. The men indulge in low and debasing pleasures, the women occupy their time in refined society and more harmless occupations. Even the Japanese gentleman is polished in his manners, but the ladies are exquisitely so. James Drummond said (we are assured by Macfarlane): "they have a natural grace which cannot be described. The Japanese are the most fascinating, elegant ladies that I ever saw in any country in the world." This is high praise, but it appears not undervalued.

The feast of Luaps is one of the great amusements of the people. It was a festival instituted out of respect to the dead, but it has departed somewhat from its origin in modern times. It appears to be a very showy and brilliant affair.

Wrestling, however, is a general popular institution. It is delighted in by high and low. It has been the favourite pleasure of all warlike and semi-barbarous nations. It was in use among the Greeks from the earliest ages. Homer gives a long description of a match between Ajax and Ulysses, the prize being a tripod of the value of twelve oxen. The Romans followed the example of the Greeks, and made it one of the sports of every class and time. In England, in the early times, when physical strength was the greatest merit a man could have, it was common. A man was a very ordinary prize. Chaucer says of the miller:

"At wrestling he would have away the ram."

In the old poem of "A Lytel Geste of Robyn Hood," prizes of greater value are mentioned, such as a white bull, a horse with saddle and bridle, a pipe of wine, &c. The Londoners, who in the olden time were a noisy, quarrelsome set, were great wrestlers. Matthew Paris tells us of a great wrestling match on the sixth of Henry II. In Stowe's time it was very popular. At present the amusement is almost unknown, being left to more barbarous times and countries.

In Japan the amusement is very popular. In general the combatants struggle within a ring, such as that given in our first engraving, but at other times they wrestle wherever they can find a convenient place. They are very rough in their way of scrambling, and many accidents happen. In some instances the object is to drag the adversary out of the ring; in others, to tie his hands and render him helpless. When it is a public display, several couples are always waiting to go into the circle in turns. The interest which the Japanese take in these trials of strength and skill is something like that of the ancient Greeks in the Olympic and Isthmian games. Among those who train themselves for the combats, great muscular power and suppleness of limb are required, and they resort to every possible means for their attainment. It is common for those who desire to become very expert in the art of wrestling to get their companions to bend back their limbs in constrained attitudes, and thus leave the wrestler for hours and hours together, and indeed, in some instances, even dislocate and reset any particular limb, in order to procure the greatest laxity and suppleness at the combat. At ordinary wrestling-matches, bundles of manilla, tied up in lengths of about two feet each, are laid around upon the ground in the form of a ring. If the wrestler is crowded out of the ring, thrown within the ring, or falls upon any portion of it, or disturbs any portion of it with his foot, he is considered vanquished, and another steps forward to take his place. The judge who decides points of dispute in wrestling-matches, steps into the ring previously to the encounter. The wrestlers stand back to back, and the judge fastens the cord to the elbow of one and the knee of the other. Sandy evolutions are then ordered by the judge, calculated to bring the contender round upon the hind of the opponent. In other trials the one is allowed to take the exercise, frequently provided he is excluded from the ring, the other is declared victor, and comes out triumphant in every way.

But the best and most interesting matches are those which take place upon the high field, and are not enclosed. They are usually conducted between the best wrestler of the empire, and are conducted in a flat in the gardens of the palace of the Kobo, in a retired manner. The prizes are numerous, and the attainment of one confers a rank upon the winner much valued by the lower classes, besides a pension from government during his natural life. There is in this in no manner an outer enclosure besides the inner ring, and the crowd does not forcibly attach until the defeat has been signified from the outer enclosure. But, when thrown out from the inner ring, the victor has the privilege, if he can do so quickly enough, to lift the fallen wrestler boldly and eject him. When fallen within the inner ring, this privilege is denied. Upon one side of the ring, the outer enclosure is omitted. This is the side toward the retired seats of the dignitaries; and upon this side neither of the combatants is allowed to step over, without forfeiture to both of the right to continue the contest. Upon each post of the enclosure surrounding the ring is tied a blanket, for the purpose of shielding the wrestler, if pitched with force against them. A species of vinegar, mixed with water, is kept in two pails close by the ring, with which the nostrils and mouths of the disputants are occasionally washed.

Not infrequently wrestling assumes the nature of a mortal combat, by its intensity and fierceness. Every nerve is strung to the highest pitch; every nerve is strained to its utmost tension; the eyes protrude, the breath grows short, and the whole anatomy of the figure appears marked on the outside of the body, so distinctly do the swelling muscles develop themselves to the spectator. Almost frantic efforts are made by each wrestler to lay his opponent by the girdle bodily, in which position he can be easily carried from the ring. By mere strength alone this can be easily accomplished, but the wary antagonist is always careful to prevent it. But a fixed period is allowed for each contest, therefore the wrestlers must proceed with some dispatch, yet must proceed cautiously as well. These trials of strength are said to be intensely exciting, and a source of as much bantering and betting among the Japanese, as cock-fighting in Cuba, bull-baiting in Spain, or horse racing in England.

THE GROTTO OF ANTIPAROS.

This grotto, though known to the ancients, appears to have afterwards been forgotten for a long series of years. In 1673, however, it was visited with a kind of solemnity by Nointel, ambassador from the king of France to the Sublime Porte. The people of the island also ventured to descend at this time; and he was accompanied by two clever designers, and three or four masons, provided with the necessary implements for detaching and removing the more heavy of the spars. Most of the spars were forwarded to M. Bandelet, of the Royal Academy of Inscriptions and Medals; and one of the most remarkable of them now figures in the rich collection of the Museum of Natural History, at Paris. Forty years later, the grotto was more minutely explored by the celebrated lemnist, Tournetot, who gave an account of his visit in his "Relation d'un Voyage du Levant," published in 1717. In our own times the grotto has recovered all its ancient celebrity, and receives an increased number of visitors every year.

Antiparos, the island which contains this remarkable natural curiosity, is situated opposite Paros, in the Grecian Archipelago. The grotto is a mile and a half from the sea, in view of the Isles of Nio, Sikino, and Polienbro. A cavern first offers itself to your notice, with a descent of about thirty wide steps; the passage is divided into two by natural pillars of strabition, and over the largest of these, which resembles a tower attached to the roof of the cavern, there is an ancient inscription, very much defaced, containing several names, which the islanders believe to be those of the conspirators who aimed at the life of Alexander the Great, and who, after the failure of their criminal project, took refuge in this place as one of security. Amongst these names, that of Antiparos is the only one that favours this tradition. Dioclus S. indeed does indeed relate that several historians had accused Antiparos of the death of Alexander. The monarch had left Antiparos agent in Europe, when he departed for the conquest of Persia; but that minister, irritated by the manner in which Olympias had injured him with his master, was suspected of having endeavoured to get the king poisoned by his son, one of the royal eunuchs. Diodorus remarks that Antiparos did not preserve any part of his authority after the death of Alexander; but then explains why he consoled himself in this island.

When the grotto was visited by Tournetot, he was enabled to read a portion of the inscription; but all important passages were espied, taken before it was detected, which the learned traveller thus translates:—"To the memory of Crity, the son of Crity, who came to this spot. Menander, Strabon, Menocrates, Antiparos, Iphimodan, Ariston, Pithon, Geras, Diogenes, Philonotes, Gerasimus."

Perhaps these names are simply those of children of the island, at the time of Crity, who, as we have just seen, had just arrived at the grotto. Near this inscription there exists a very remarkable law, which does not appear to have any other than the figure of a cross for a model on it, indicating that it was intended than the Christian era. On the left, and at the base of a rock, is another Greek inscription, but much more worn than even the preceding.

Between the two pillars on the right, is a gentle declivity, separated from the centre of the cavern by a low wall; in this place some one has engraved on the rocky wall some words, which indicate the period at which the grotto was visited by Nointel. The bottom of the cavern is reached by a more rude declivity; and here the passage becomes so dark, that the visitor cannot proceed without torches. The descent is aided by a rope attached to one of the stalactite pillars, a measure of precaution rendered necessary by the steep and rugged nature of the declivity. At the bottom of this precipice another is reached, still more frightful, and so slippery that the further descent has to be made by means of a ladder. Probably there are other chambers yet unexplored."

Nointel and his party remained three entire days in the grotto, which was brilliantly illuminated, and celebrated high mass there on Christmas-day, using as an altar the pyramidal stalagmite which is seen in the centre of the illustration. This remarkable object is twenty-four feet high, and must have presented a splendid spectacle when glittering in the light of the numerous tapers which illuminated the grotto. With this flood of light reflected from the thousand glittering points rising from the floor or depending from the vaulted roof, and the strains of sacred music echoing through the stalactite chambers, the scene must have been more than usually imposing.

pery that the further descent has to be made by means of a ladder. "In this manner," says Clarke the traveller, "we reached the spacious chamber of this truly enchanted grotto. The roof, the floor, the sides of a whole series of magnificent caverns, are entirely invested with a dazzling incrustation, as white as snow. Columns, some of which were seventy-five feet in length, pended in fine icicle forms above our heads; fortunately, some of them are so far above the reach of the numerous travellers who, during many ages, have visited this place, that no one has been able to injure or remove them. Others extend from the roof to the floor, with diameters equal to the mast of a first-rate ship of the line. The last chamber into which we descended surprised us more by the gran-

At the bottom of the cavern which serves as the vestibule of this magnificent grotto, we find another small chamber, called the cave of Antipater, into which the visitor enters through a square aperture. This chamber is covered entirely with glittering stalactites and stalagmites, which look like large crystals of the purest white marble, and are supposed by geologists to be formed by the filtration of water through the limestone, of which the entire island is composed. Tournefort, however, thought that he had here found conclusive proofs of his singular theory of the vegetation of stone. The top of the hill from the side of which the passages leading to the grotto are entered, is paved, as it were, with transparent crystallisations of the lozenge form.

ORNAMENTAL TOBACCO BOX.

As ornamentation is one of the departments included in the plan of THE ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE OF ART, we cannot do wrong in calling the attention of our readers to the beautiful specimen of ornamental work which adorns this page. It is a snuff-box executed by Avisseau, the celebrated enamel worker at Tours, an artist who is described by one of his countrymen as a second Bernard Palissy. No greater honour could be conferred upon him than to give him this distinguished title, but the specimen of his workmanship here exhibited as it may, there can be no question that it is a beautiful work of art—at once a gem and a picture—rich, but not overladen with decoration, elegant, and finished. It represents the hollow trunk of an old tree amid a mass of rocks, and twined around with ferns and climbing plants. An adder, coiled about it, is on the watch for a frog upon the lid. Lizards crawl about here and there, showing their heads from the various crevices. On the right and left hand are two stone tablets, one of which contains a drawing of a peasant goes far to prove that it is not at all more than he fairly deserves. It is one of his most recent chefs-d'œuvre, and is rendered by our artist with great fidelity and perfection. The reader might be puzzled to know what it was, if he had not the assistance of the title. From that, however, he will learn that it is nominally a tobacco box or pot, though of course hardly likely to be really employed as such. Indeed we can easily imagine that, to many of our readers—especially those of the gentler sex—it would seem a shameful profanation to apply it to any "such base uses." Be that of Brittany smoking his pipe, and the other the arms of Touraine and Brittany. Inside the lid there is the following inscription, "A. M. PÈRE-CHEVALIER, AVISSEAU PÈRE ET FILS, 1851." This inscription, with the tablets, explains the nature and object of the beautiful production. It symbolises the union of Touraine and Brittany, literature and art; Avisseau being an artist of Touraine, and M. Chevalier, to whom it was presented, a distinguished author, who has written a work upon the history of Ancient and Modern Brittany.

PEERS AND M.P.S.,
OR,
LORDS AND COMMONS.

PARLIAMENTARY ORATORS AND ORATORY.

THE Marquis of Lansdowne is rarely heard in the house now; but in the Commons, which he entered as Lord Henry Petty, his first speech raised great expectations of his subsequent career, and some were so enthusiastic in their praise as to deem him worthy to rival the oratorical fame of Pitt. His speech on the charges of embezzlement, brought against Lord Melville, was highly applauded at the time. He said: "Let it be remembered how the persons were situated who were thus connected together. Mr. Mark Scott, the broker, confidentially employed by Mr. Trotter, the paymaster; Mr. Trotter, the paymaster, confidentially employed by Lord Melville; and Lord Melville confidentially employed by the public. He had heard of Jacobin combinations and of other combinations, but it would be difficult to imagine any combination more detrimental to the public than that of these three persons, who sat on the cabinet on the one side and the stocks on the other. What changes of fortune, what convulsions in finance, was it not capable of effecting? He trembled that the event of that night would show that, whatever difference of opinion might exist, it indeed there did exist any, on the principles of government or on the application of those principles to public measures, yet when such questions as these came to be determined—whether the law should or should not be observed; whether the public expenditure should be watched or should not be unexamined or uncontrolled—there was to be found but one voice, one opinion, and one cause; the cause of men of all descriptions, who pretended to any sort of principle, in opposition to those who either did not profess any, or, what was as dangerous if not as bad, who thought none essential to the honour, the safety, and the existence of the country." The Duke of Newcastle is young, and has yet to win fame, but he has much in his favour. He possesses a great power of fluent oratory, and whenever he addresses the house, is listened to with attention and respect. Lord Clarendon has been the hero of many a party contest. He cannot take his stand amongst the first orators of the day. His rank in political life has, and undoubtedly, been acquired by his abilities. The fact that he rose from being a Customs' commissioner to be viceroy of Ireland and secretary for foreign affairs, as a late writer in the Athenæum remarked, is proof of his secretarial energy and talent in a department of the state. As a debater he wants practice and physical power. His voice is not loud enough for the stormy combats of the senate. He often hesitates, and his nervous temperament gives him a flurried manner which detracts from the weight of his argument. Yet he has great insinuation and address. Parliament as are his talents, even his admirers would scarcely say that he has the virtus civium of Lord John Russell or Lord Palmerston. He wants massiveness and manliness of intellect. The Duke of Argyll, the youngest member of the cabinet, is perhaps one of the most fluent men in it. You are not long in the Lords before you are weary of his presence. His red face and small juvenile figure attract you at once. He took his seat in that assembly on his father's death in 1817, and in May of the following year, he delivered his first speech on the motion for the second reading of the bill for admitting Jews to Parliament. His speech made a great impression on the house, presenting as it did a defence of the measure on religious rather than political grounds. He commenced by disclaiming all sympathy with certain theories that had been put forth—that Christianity had nothing to do with making the laws of a country. He showed in a strain of clear argument, enforced by an easy, flowing, and natural eloquence, that Christianity lay at the root of all that was just and right and true; and that the nation which systematically excluded Christianity from its laws, must end in speedy ruin. At the same time he could not agree with the opponents of the measure, that Christianity consisted in a mere set of forms and symbols, compliance with which should secure and refusal exclude admission to the legislature. On the contrary, he maintained that Christianity would be best manifested by abolishing all invidious distinctions which excluded any citizen from obtaining the offices and honours of the state, and by maintaining the right of the constituencies of the empire to their free choice of whatever representatives they pleased to select. The speech was received with great favour in the house, and the duke was at once hailed as one of the most promising ornaments of which the senate could boast. Like another nobleman who courts honour on his order—the Earl of Carlisle—the duke lectures to mechanics' institutions, and lectures well.

But, after all, the real orators in the house are not in the cabinet, but out of it; and they live upon their reputations, and are satisfied, as well they may be, with the pleasures of memory. Foremost amongst them is the Earl of Derby, the utramque domum of one of the most powerful parties in the state. But as with all true orators, it was in the lower house that his laurels were won. His first speech of any importance was that against Mr. Hunt's motion on the temporalities of the Irish Church. That speech helped him to the honourable title he has so long worn as "the very Rupert of debate." One of the most remarkable feats he ever accomplished was his delivery, during one of the Irish debates, of Hotspur's address to his men, at the close of a great debate, and when the house was eager for a division. His rating the Whigs with their truckling to O'Connell was terrible when it came couched in the language of England's dramatist—

"But shall it be that you—that set the crown
Upon the head of this forgetful man,
And for his sake wear the detested blot
Of meritorious subordination—shall it be
That you a world of cur'es undergo;
Tying the agents, or base second means,
The cords—the ladder—or the hangman rather,
Oh, pardon me! that I descend so low
To show the line and the predicament
When in your range under this subtle king,
Shall it for shame be spoken in these days,
Or fill up chronicles in time to come,
That men of your nobility and power
Did gaze them both in an unjust behalf,
As both of you, God pardon it! have done,
To put down Richard, that sweet lovely rose,
And plant this thorn, this canker, Bolingbroke?
And shall it in more shame be further spoken,
That you are foiled, discarded, and shook off
By him for whom these shames ye underwent?
No, yet time serves wherein you may redeem
Your banished honours, and restore yourselves
Into the good thought of this world again
Revenge the jeering and disdained contempt
Of this proud king, who studies day and night
To answer all the debt he owes to you
Even with the bloody payment of your deaths?"

The effect Lord Stanley—for that was the earl's title then—produced by this extract was startling. It required no ordinary degree of courage to deliver a quotation so long and so dangerous to a crowded house at a late hour. The sensation created was appalling from the extraordinary power of emphasis thrown into the delivery. No actor could have given the passage with more startling effect. It has been remarked, that no nobleman of talent it is a disadvantage to commence life in the House of Peers. It is but rarely that the debates are conducted there on a scale large enough to justify those flights of eloquence which, successful in a crowded assembly, seem almost ridiculous before a couple of score of languid peers. The Earl of Derby had the advantage of entering public life in the lower house, and at a time, too, when party feeling was high. His contest with O'Connell was personal and passionate in the extreme. The latter held him up to the indignation of the Irish as the scorpion Stanley, and the former repaid the Irish agitator with terrible invective, equally vehement, and far more polished than his own. In the upper house, the debates would be indeed dull, were it not for the earl's appearance on the scene. Lyndhurst is a masterly orator; but he belongs to the past. You can hardly recognise, in the now shrunken form, a man formerly deemed one of the most powerful intellects of our age. It

LINCOLN.

THE magnificent cathedral of Lincoln is, next to that of York, the most stupendous, as well as the most beautiful, monument of Gothic architecture in England, and stands on a hill, overlooking the town, and commanding a very extensive view, comprising the scenery of five or six counties. Its length from east to west is 530 feet, and its breadth 227 feet. The doorway and two of the three towers date from the eleventh century, and justify the opinion of those antiquaries who attribute the foundation of the one to William the Conqueror, and of the others to his son William Rufus. It was afterwards rebuilt by Henry II., and dedicated to the Virgin. The most remarkable portions of this immense edifice are the choir and the chapel of the Virgin. The great bell, celebrated by the name of Tom of Lincoln, was long famous for its deep and resonant tone, which was heard at a great distance. In 1827 it by some means got cracked, and in 1834 it was broken in pieces. It was refounded, and replaced in the central tower the year following. Its diameter in the widest part is eighteen feet and it contains five earth and the trunks of trees placed with the branches outward. To defend themselves from the incursions of these barbarians, the Roman masters of the country surrounded the city with walls, and formed the Foss-dyke, a canal about ten miles in length, connecting the waters of the Witham with those of the Trent, and thus forming a complete internal navigation between the Wash and the Humber. Henry I. cleared out the Foss-dyke, and improved the navigation; and it is still used as a canal from Lincoln to the Trent. The city derives its name from occupying the site of the Roman military station called Lindum, and stands on the line of the great Roman road called Ermine-street. The fortifications were increased and improved by the Saxons, and at the time of the Domesday survey Lincoln was one of the richest and most populous cities in the kingdom.

The ruins of the bishop's palace, which was demolished during the civil war, stand a little to the south of the cathedral, and comprise a fine hall, a gateway, and part of the kitchen. In the neightons and a half of metal. The weight of the old bell was only four tons and a half. The difficulty of swinging the enormous clapper is the reason why the bell is used only on rare occasions. Before the Reformation, the cathedral of Lincoln was one of the richest in the kingdom, but Henry VIII. appropriated the greatest part of its treasures, and during the civil war between Charles I. and the Parliament, the sumptuous tombs were mutilated, and this splendid religious edifice was used as a barrack by the soldiers of Cromwell.

The cathedral is not the only remarkable monument in Lincoln; the ruins of the castle erected by William the Conqueror, and the Newport gate, attract the attention of visitors, and prove the antiquity of the city. The latter is an imposing structure of Roman architecture, ten feet thick, and sixteen feet wide in the archway. When the country was under Roman domination, the district in which Lincoln is situated was inhabited by the Coritani, a warlike tribe of savages, who painted their bodies with blue pigment extracted from the wood plant, and wore rings of iron on their arms. Their towns were mere collections of huts, defended by ramparts of beehood of these ruins is a modern building, which the bishop occupies during his stay in the city. Besides a great number of monasteries and nunneries, and other religious edifices, Lincoln formerly contained upwards of fifty churches, of which only eleven remain, exclusive of the cathedral, and most of these are small and much dilapidated. One of these, St. Peter at Gowths, is an old conventual church, and has a lofty square tower of Norman architecture. Some remains of the old castle are still standing on the hill, westward from the cathedral, and the site of the other portions is occupied by the county gaol and court-house, erected from the designs of Smirke. The gaol is constructed on the plan recommended by the philanthropist Howard, but is said to be too small for the purpose of classification. The Guildhall (an ancient Gothic edifice), the market-house, the assembly-room, and the theatre, are the only other public buildings. But if there is nothing remarkable in the modern edifices of Lincoln, the deficiency is amply made up by the number of ancient remains, of which few towns in England contain so many.

THE OLD ENGLISH HALL.

During the period when the nobles of England were engaged in the civil wars occasioned by the disputed right of succession between the houses of York and Lancaster, or vied with each other in the number of retainers which they supported, and the extravagance of their living, the merchants of London, by persevering industry and a steady increase of commerce, became a rich, and consequently an influential portion of the community.

John Thornbull could scarcely be termed a merchant. He had started in life with a sum of money not equal in value to twenty pounds of the present coinage. With this capital he furnished a stall in the Cheape, for the sale of woollen caps and hose. John was a man of thrift. He rose early and retired late; he never lost

The successor to Master John attained the civic rank of alderman, purchased an estate, and was called Squire Thornbull; for which he is falsely considered by his descendants to have been the founder of a very ancient family.

It is hardly necessary to inform the reader that, previously to the time of the first Tudor, land was held only by feudal tenure. The sovereign granted estates to his vassals, subject to certain conditions, as the reward of military service. Henry VII., however, resolved to weaken the power of the nobles, whose force, when united, had often proved so detrimental to the interests of the crown, and even fatal to the life of the sovereign. Moreover, as he knew the plodding traders of London had large stores of gold in their dusty chambers, a customer, whose patronage could be secured by attention, civility, or persuasion; his own garments were usually cast off by the most respectable of his customers, before he appropriated them to his own use; and ere he laid them by, it would not have been by any means an easy matter to decide on their original colour. His diet was exceedingly simple, and it is doubtful if, during the whole course of his life, he was a dozen times within the walls of a tavern.

When John Thornbull died, he bequeathed a respectable inheritance to his son, who, having considerably enlarged the business of his late father, became in reality a merchant, and first assumed the honorary title of Master. Fortune favoured most of his schemes, and, though he did not practise such rigid economy as his parent, he became one of the richest men in the city.

and being a keen-sighted man, he resolved that a portion of it should be transmitted to his own coffers. With this view, he invited the lord mayor and the principal citizens to pay a visit of state to Westminster Hall, to witness the games given in honour of the queen on Twelfth night. On this memorable occasion, Alderman Thornbull was one of the party, but what is of far greater importance he was privately introduced to his Majesty, and given to understand that a certain officer of the royal household would be ready on the morrow to draw up a deed, by which an estate, lately ceded to the crown by confiscation, might become the freehold property of Alderman Thornbull and his heirs for ever.

Thus did the king enrich himself, at the expense of the ancient nobility, and create a new class of aristocracy, whose power was far less dangerous to the interest of the throne: and thus did the grandson of a peer become the first of that famous community of "Landed Gentry," whose rank and influence have long since obliterated the distinction, once so clearly marked, between the nobility and the people. The first business of Squire Thornbull, upon becoming a lauded proprietor, was to erect a hall upon his estate, of such extent as became the dignity of his new sphere. The situation which he selected was sheltered from the northern blasts by a range of hills, whilst gentle slopes of luxuriant woollands on the east and west stretched far away into the opening valley. A noble river slowly wound its way along the plain, fringing, with the surrounding objects, a scene of remarkable beauty and grandeur, of which the inmates of the hall might command a perfect view.

The building itself enclosed a quadrangular court-yard, was surrounded by a moat, and approached by a drawbridge. A covered gateway in the southern range of the building, which in time of danger could be entirely closed, was the only entrance to the court.

As will be seen by a glance at the ground plan, was occupied by various domestic offices. The frame-work of the whole building was of oak; numerous beams and joists being fastened together by means of cross-bolts, and the interstices filled up with lath and plaster. Externally there was no appearance of order; the roof was of various heights, and the upper apartments invariably overhung the lower. Gables formed the principal architectural feature, and the windows extended across the whole range of apartments. In the interior, the great hall was, of course, the principal part of the mansion. Its walls were lined with oak wainscot, and the floor was strewn with rushes. The principal articles of furniture were the oak dining-table, forty feet in length, with benches to match. Within a fire place, almost as spacious as a modern parlour, a huge pile of wood was constantly burning on the hearth. During the winter season, the doors were covered with loose arras, which the imperfect workmanship of the joiners rendered absolutely necessary to the comfort of the inmates. The buttery, divided from the kitchen only by means of a paneled

The ceiling of this passage was machicolated, or pierced with holes like a cullender, so that persons in the room above might, in the time of siege, pour hot water, oil, or melted tallow on the heads of the assailants below. Exactly opposite, in the northern range of the building, was the principal entrance, which led to a spacious lobby communicating with the great hall, the buttery, and the cellar. Over the two latter apartments was "my lady's chamber," which occupied a middle station between the upper and lower stories, and resembled in appearance a housekeeper's room in a modern mansion. From this apartment Dame Thornbull could look into the kitchen, which stood on the eastern side of the court, by means of a half door, such as are sometimes still seen in old shops; and thus she could watch the domestic arrangements of the household, scold her maids, and be satisfied that everything went on in proper order. In the western range was the family chapel, with apartments for the priest and steward. The remaining side, screen, was furnished with a dining service of highly-polished pewter, and a large quantity of wooden platters and trenchers for ordinary use. Here the visitor always found a plentiful supply of substantial fare; and, during the proper season, a dish of trout or a haunch of venison was never wanting. The cellar was stored with ale and cider only; the family stock of wines being more safely deposited in the lady's own room. Such was Squire Thornbull's residence at the Woodlands.

When, however, he had established himself as a country gentleman, it must be confessed that he soon felt somewhat disappointed with his new sphere of life. In London, he had been a member of an influential corporation, daily associated with men of his own rank, and frequently dined in the presence of distinguished guests at the Guildhall. But at the Woodlands, he enjoyed no more society than a broken emigrant might expect in the back woods of a rising colony. For country sports he had neither taste nor skill, and though, as a matter of duty, he persevered in the pursuit, he derived from them more of pain than of pleasure. He was a very indifferent horseman, unskilful in the use of the hunting-spear and the bow, and by no means expert in the exercise of the leaping pole. His dogs would never follow him, nor could he recall his Hawks, when once he set them at liberty. He made no pretensions to learning, and had he desired to cultivate such a taste, the necessary books could only have been purchased at a vast expense.

The produce of the home farm was mostly consumed in his own household. The rents, which he received from his tenants, did not exceed £100 per annum, for the greater portion of the estate was left unenclosed.

On the other hand, there were circumstances connected with his new sphere of life which both flattered his feelings and gratified his taste. On his own estate he possessed as much power as a sovereign prince. He heard all causes of dispute, and decided them according to his own discretion; he admitted the proper rate of tithes, and he commanded the service of all the peasantry during a certain portion of the year; first, in consideration of their being allowed to cut wood in his forest; and secondly, as compensation for the land which they cultivated for their own subsistence. Jack of the Webbs was required to plough ten acres in the spring or autumn. Will of the Beck to shear a hundred sheep in summer. It was the duty of some to gather in the squire's corn, or to bring a given quantity of fuel to the hall. The smith and the carpenter also paid their rent by a specified amount of their handicraft; for, like the general population, the mechanics spent a considerable portion of their time in the cultivation of the soil, to provide for themselves the necessaries of life. In the arrangement of such matters, Squire Thornbull's word was law, and the peasants knew of no court of appeal.

The whole family at the Woodlands rose at an early hour. Breakfast was served at seven in the morning, when the squire regaled himself with a plentiful supply of beef and ale. At ten in the forenoon the family assembled in the great hall for dinner, where, with their domestics, they took their places at the same table according to their rank. The position of the salt marked the boundary-line between the gentle and the vulgar. The squire and his family, the chaplain, and the principal guests were seated at the head of the table, whilst the steward occupied the most honourable place at the foot. The dishes were placed on the uncovered board, cups of horn or pewter supplied the want of glass, but persons of the highest rank were compelled to use their fingers instead of a fork. At four, the relationer gave the call for supper, and at eight, the whole family was usually in bed.

The amusements which the society of the Woodlands offered were few, and of the most rustic order. The morning of May-day was all flowers, laughter, and good fellowship; at noon, all excitement, produced by the spectacle of bull-baiting in the courtyard of the hall; whilst evening witnessed no small number of battles in races and cock-fights.

On several companies of strolling players arrived at the hall, so that every some neighbouring fair, when in return for a plentiful supply of food and ale, would exhibit their dramatic powers for the amusement of the hearers. For this purpose they erected a temporary stage, upon which, assuming the characters of angels, saints, and Satans, they performed all the more representations of scripture history, or related dialogues abundant with Middle-age legends. The Temptation and Crucifixion of the Saviour, the Day of Judgment, and even the Creation of the World were, at that period, the most popular subjects for the theatrical display.

The travelling merchant was a welcome and constant visitor to the hall, for he not only supplied the family with many necessary articles of domestic use, but, on the fine days of ribbons and gewgaws to the maids, but also detailed to the squire an account of the principal events which had taken place in the city and court since his last visit, which the latter communicated to his family and chaplain, with numerous explanatory notes and reflections.

Christmas at the Woodlands was a solemn and true English hospitality. The hall appeared like a gothic forest of good holly. The yule-log burnt briskly on the hearth, the barrel of beer and the four's-head were borne to table in solemn procession, preceded by musicians, producing no very harmonious sounds to the bull-horns. A heavy welcome was given to all, and the yule-supper highly satisfactory. When these were dismissed, the merry dances were soon seen skipping up the sides and down the middle, with no more idea of being tired than an express train with the steam up. But, alas! the wassail-bowl invariably destroyed their bon-moy; and even in those primitive and good old times, none were the disorderlies who were forebly coated with cuts and kicks from the premises of their host. It is well-said, too, that the spirit himself was not infrequently found in his chamber in a state of utter helplessness, when he was wont to call down the heaviest curses on things in general, and to vow the fiercest vengeance against real or imaginary offenders.

What changes have been wrought in the state of the Thornbull family by the hand of time! Part of the hall is still standing, but is inhabited by a hind and his family. The great yard has been formed into a modern homestead, and the chapel is used as an animal stall.

FLORENTINE MOSAIC WORK

FLORENTINE MOSAIC WORK.

THE city of Florence, which, with Rome and Venice, was long one of the most distinguished seats of Italian art, is remarkable for having produced a beautiful kind of ornamental work which bears its name. It is a species of mosaic in costly materials, based upon directly opposite principles to those recognised by ancient artists. One of the chief of these consists of an intelligent selection of the various shades of colour presented by agates, jaspers, and other hard stones, cut into forms adapted to a settled plan, and artistically arranged with a view to one predominant effect. This ingenious combination produces a kind of painting, in which the varied hues of these beautiful productions are employed to imitate the true colours of nature, as well as the effects of light and shade. Leaves, flowers, butterflies, birds, and even varied landscapes, are cut out with the chisel and polished with the file. The artist contrives to give them the richness of tone which is found in nature, and at the same time the harmony of that great model by bringing together objects which there usually appear together.

In the churches of Florence masterpieces of this kind of work may be seen, either decorating altars or forming part of the architecture of these edifices. The palaces and museums of Europe also contain specimens, more or less remarkable, of this work applied to the ornamentation of furniture of various kinds. The most ancient Florentine mosaic work is plane, like that which the artists of antiquity produced with small cubes of various colours, and which those of modern Rome imitate; but in later times the Florentines sought to give some kind of relief to their mosaic pictures, by inlaying upon the surface hard stones and other costly materials, which they modelled after nature, at one time to represent a fruit, at another a leaf, and at another a flower. Fine pearls, and even diamonds, also found a place in these bas-reliefs. At the present day there are artists in France who produce works of this class.

In the Museum of Cluny there is a remarkable specimen of Florentine art at the commencement of the seventeenth century, of which an engraving is given on the opposite page. It is a rich cabinet, partly covered with mosaic work representing landscapes, birds, fruits, and butterflies. Small bas-reliefs in precious materials are mingled with the lively colours of the mosaic, and form a magnificent ensemble by means of the variety of framing in lapis-lazuli, cornelian, and silver. Numerous figures, seated or standing, caryatides in silver, give a brilliant effect to the whole, and present a luxuriant richness of materials, which can be but imperfectly represented in any drawing or engraving. The upper portion, which exhibits a beautiful contour in its form, is, like the body of the work, enriched with mosaics and bas-reliefs surrounding carved work and projecting ornaments in silver and gilt bronze. Five statuettes in gilt bronze surmount the whole, giving it somewhat the form of an elegant pyramid.

This piece of furniture, supported by four sphinxes, rests upon a table enriched with squares of jasper, covered with inlaid mother-of-pearl, and having for supports four columns, the capitals of which are adorned with beautiful carving and gilding. The cabinet opens in front by the separation of the two doors, which meet in the middle, and the inner sides of which are decorated with landscapes and birds in Florentine mosaic. The interior compartments, which are divided into recesses and drawers, underwent great changes about the time of Louis XV. Most of the Florentine mosaics, which ought to have been here, have been replaced by miniatures in the style of the eighteenth century.

This valuable article of furniture was first removed to Poland, and afterwards to France, under the empire of Napoleon I. It now stands, as we have already stated, in the Museum of Cluny, a town in France, formerly more celebrated than at present for an abbey of the Benedictine order, founded in A.D. 910 by William I., duke of Aquitaine and count of Auvergne. In the course of about three centuries from its foundation, the establishment had become extensive enough to accommodate within its walls Pope Innocent IV., twelve cardinals, three archbishops, and other ecclesiastical dignitaries, besides St. Louis, the king of France, with his three sons, the queen mother, and a host of attendant lords and ladies, amounting altogether to four hundred.

THE BRIBE OF ROMANOFF.—II.

BY SILVERPEN.

THAT day Olga wonders why her beloved mademoiselle is so pale and silent, but gains no information. There are topics concerning fathers that daughters may not learn.

Olga, though so young, is an habitué of the opera, and prepares to go this evening, accompanied, as usual, by Miss Temple. The latter hastens her toilet, for an attendant informs her that his excellency's daughter awaits her in a certain room; she descends, enters, the door is heavily closed—she is again alone with the mareschal. The light is but imperfect, but she can see that passion has passed like a tempest over his soul.

"Ida," he says firmly, yet with a show of sincerity as well as a respect which seems genuine, "I love you still more profoundly for what passed this morning; forget it—do be my wife! the wife of the proud mareschal, if you wish. I must have you at any risk, come what may; I have loved you too long and profoundly to be gainsayed. Come, it is settled—let there be the peace of love between us." His manner is all entreaty, all respect; he is subdued to the humility of a child.

"My lord," is the firm, unhesitating answer, "under no circumstances can any tie exist between us, even under the sanction of the proposal with which you have just honoured me. I love another man, and I am an Englishwoman."

It is wonderful to see the change a few words can effect; no greater than this was ever instantly beget. It is like the change said to take place in Eastern seas; one instant the waves lie in a summer's calm, the next heave as in a winter's tempest. There is no mistake now to what race this man belongs—the ruthless eye, the clenched lips, the freezing words, are true to the pictures De Custine, Golovin, and others, have given to the world.

"Go!" says that iron voice; "this is Russia, not England. Go! I am unmoved from my purpose; what love cannot effect power shall. Go!—but you will not escape me."

Perhaps not, for despotism, as I have said, is Argus-eyed; but purity can be strategic as well as baseness, and eternal justice attends the first.

Unattended, except by Prince Romanoff, the grandfather of Olga, and the usual retinue of servants, mademoiselle and her beloved charge pass on to the opera. Good angels are propitious. Here, round the stalks of a bouquet delivered to her by a pretended servant, are full instructions from the excellent chaplain of the embassy. Miss Temple contrives to conceal the paper, and beats it safely home. In this she reads, as soon as her attendants are dismissed for the night, that Nova, the Servian shipwright's daughter, and an assistant in the palace kitchen, will be ready to assist in her escape, as well as be prepared with a dress; that Golovitz, one of the grooms of the chamber, will let her pass, as will also Karl, the porter; and that outside the palace wall the shipwright will await her, whose wife she must affect to be.

Losing no time, but changing her dress for the one she finds ready in an appointed place, securing her jewellery and money carefully about her person, packing up in the smallest possible compass such few articles as she will need, Miss Temple awaits the appointed signal from Nova. Sitting down, she writes a brief letter to the mareschal and a longer one to her beloved Olga, entreating the latter to bear her in recollection, to write to her, and, if ever opportunity admit, to visit her in England. She then takes this last letter into Olga's chamber, kisses her sleeping face, and retires with a hushed step and sorrowing heart. All the rest of her property Ida has to abandon; but she hopes that, with Olga to plead for her, the mareschal, when his anger is less, will be just enough to let it be packed and sent to England.

At the given time, she escapes from the palace without observation, and joins the good shipwright. Her dress is that of a peasant woman, and she passes through the street unrecognised, though keenly regarded by several of the police on duty. The palace lies at a considerable distance from the port, but the latter is at length reached in safety. The ship by which she is to sail is laden with corn, and bound to Carlscrona; but it has yet to lift its anchor and make some other preparations. As it would never do to run the risk of applying for a passport, arrangements have to be made that mademoiselle be concealed in the cabin till Cronstadt be reached, and whilst these are effected she rests in the shipwright's little wooden house, and refreshes herself with food.

At length all is ready; she takes leave of these kind though humble friends, who, in spite of poverty, have shown themselves superior to Russian venality, and going on board the little ship, hidden in the hold amidst corn that has been ear-browned upon the plains of Finland. The captain, a stalwart Finn, though somewhat lethargic, is honest, and his ship takes its course to the Baltic. But it has not been long and well before he is on a sail in pursuit, and his purpose being suspected, the fugitive Englishwoman is still more closely hidden; for punishment will be his and his ship's crew's, if found conniving at the escape of one marked out for official vengeance. The captain's surprise is correct; his ship is overtaken by a swift government corvette, is boarded, and is strictly examined; but the Englishwoman's hiding-place escapes detection, and the ship is permitted to pass, with an official document, which will secure it free from a second inspection in the port of Cronstadt. But too wary to be killed asleep, the captain bids the fugitive keep still hidden till they are out in the Baltic—a wise precaution, as, in spite of the charm of the official pass, there is a second search, though with result like the preceding.

At length, out amongst the sun-washed icebergs of the Baltic, the poor lady may come forth for rest and air. She has suffered immensely from sickness and intense anxiety; but the quiet of the captain's little cabin, which he generously gives up to her medicinal use, in conjunction with pure air and the power to take food, soon restores her.

Troubled by adverse wind, and the low, pitching waves of the inland sea, the corn-laden vessel makes but slow progress towards Carlscrona. On the fourth day the captain deserts sail a head; and towards night they are borne down upon by a ship wearing the English ensign. The Finnish captain and his Russian sailors have no means of resistance, and none wisely is attempted. Their ship is boarded—captured; but otherwise they meet with that generous treatment habitual to Englishmen when conquerors.

It is now that Miss Temple meets her countrymen—tells the tale of her escape from St. Petersburg—and receives in return the most noble offers of protection. It is sufficient that she is an Englishwoman—an educated Englishwoman—an Englishwoman with youth and beauty. But whither would she go? The fleet has left the Sound; but a corvette going thither would find her in Copenhagen, where she would get a ship to England. As it often is, one important question is answered by another.

“Yes.”

“How far a-head?”

“Not many leagues. The prize will be taken thither.”

“Let me go there with it. I have a friend on board the Amphion who will best advise me. It is Lieutenant Elliot.”

The boarding officer bows. Lieutenant Elliot is a friend of his. Every facility shall be afforded her.

A haze springs up; and some four-and-twenty hours elaps, before the fleet is heard, or the prize towed into it, amidst deafening cheers. The captain of the beautiful ship proceeds at once to make report to the admiral; his second lieutenant gaining leave at the same time, puts off with a crew of sailors for the Amphion. He is the bearer of no long message—simply a name. It is broad morning; and the bulwarks of the Amphion can be distinctly seen from the Russian vessel. In no length of time the lieutenant re-enters his boat, in company with another officer, as appears by his gold-banded cap which glitters in the sun. As though the sailors knew their errand, they row gallantly across the pitching waves, and bring the two officers to the Russian ship's side. The one rapidly ascends—meets on the gangway by one who has fled from despotic Russia for his and his country's sake. The recognition is mutual, the joy profound, though too intense for one to bear; the woman falls senseless in the lover's arms. Human nature is the same, with no difference, the world round. Finnish sluggishness is aroused, and Russian hostiness interested. She is borne down to the cabin; once there, she soon recovers.

There is little time for lovers' words or lovers' dalliance; time is as brief as duty is stern. As concisely as he can, Lieutenant Elliot says what he has to say. He proposes, if permission be granted, as there is a chaplain with the fleet, that they be married, as a matter of safety and future good. They must be separated immediately after; that is no matter; for the corvette that will bear her to Copenhagen sails that night; but the brave and the true can yield to the necessity of duty when time austere-ly needs.

“Under the sanction of my name, your position—even through the brief transit to Copenhagen—will be more satisfactory. Once there, it will lead to an official care for your further safety and your passage to England. If I fail, it will not only secure you a permanent provision, as well as add to it what property is mine—but to bear it even for its own sake will not, perhaps, be the weakest or least tender argument.”

Thus the lover pleads; nor, happily, in vain. In a few minutes after this decision, the officers' boat is again occupied; this time by a lady, in addition to the seaman and their officer, and it shoots off from the side of the Russian brig amidst the cheers of its rough-limbed crew. They are sorry to part with their beautiful guest; it is a trouble on far more accounts than the fact that they are prisoners of the enemy.

The Amphion is reached; and all on board are astonished that an English lady should have formed part of the Russian prize. But she is treated with great honour, and a chief cabin is at once assigned to her brief use. After retiring to consult with his captain, Lieutenant Elliot again quits the ship in the officers' gig, and is rowed to that of the admiral. He soon returns; this time not in his own gig, but in that of the admiral, who is on board, by the sign of the flying pennon. There is another stringer—a grave, elderly man, of clerical aspect.

No time is or can be lost. The gig, reaching the ship, the admiral descends to say a few brief words to the English lady; then he ascends with her to the chief deck; the fleet's chaplain has on his gown—has his open book; the lieutenant of the Amphion and the English lady are ranged on either hand; the admiral stands to give her away; and so, amidst the listening silence of the mighty crew—amidst bristling cannon, and howitzer, and pyramids of cannon-balls—amidst all the stern appliances of slaughter and conquest—amidst the low catch of the sounding waves, with the glory of the sun trailing its golden length across the waves—with God above—with stern brave hearts around, the seaman and the unlaboured with Russian gold are made one. Human cheers, that carry their echoes across the sea, give the Amen of the celebration.

After taking some refreshment, the young wife has to bid a weeping farewell to her husband; the admiral's gig awaits her, for this is a time for only the austere human duties.

In half-an-hour more she is on board the corvette; in an hour it has set sail, and the fleet, in the haze of evening, is lost to sight.

For two days Ida Elliot is in Copenhagen, under the kind care of the consul and his wife.

As soon as she is sufficiently recovered from the effects of fatigue and anxiety, she sets out for her home amidst the hills of northern England, where a beloved father waits to grow glad in her return.

Here now she waits the issues of peace and war—issues pregnant with the fate of man—issues which she and others must leave to God and his never-failing justice. Amongst other things He grants, may there be the return of that beloved husband!

And no advocate of war—it is inimical to civilisation—retrogrades the advance of Christian religion and Christian morals; yet important as is human civilisation, there seem to be seasons when it is the only power that can crush the armies of rulers and give liberty to nations. This present time is one. May He who sits enthroned in justice give victory to the allied forces, and make them givers of a blessed and a crowning peace to all who fear or suffer under the fellest despotism that ever crushed men formed in the image of their Maker!

no hope; their portion is the lowest pit of Jehannum—the Moslem hell. Wicked Jews and Christians, dying impenitent, are condemned to portions of the burning pit where the heat is a degree less intolerable; and Mohammedans, of the same class, receive a little more favour as the reward of their faith. The heaven of the Moslems is eminently sensual—a paradise of odoriferous groves and pellucid streams, where the faithful enjoy the society of the dark-eyed Houris—celestial females, whose more than earthly beauty is described in the Koran in the most glowing language.

The practical duties enjoined in the Koran are: prayers at five appointed times each day, the face of the worshipper being turned towards Mecca; frequent ablutions, Mohammed well understanding the near relation of physical and moral purity; attendance at divine service in the mosques every Friday; fasting during the month of Ramadan; alms, to which the fortieth part of each person's income must be devoted; and a pilgrimage to Mecca, if possible, and the system which he founded to have done all the good that it can do. It has outlived the time when it had a great purpose to serve, and now only exists as a protest against idolatry. The fatalism which so strongly pervades the Moslem theology, and the strictness with which the powers and duties of the Sultan are prescribed by the Koran, form an insuperable barrier to the attainment of a high degree of civilisation, and the development of free institutions. Absolute predestination leads directly to individual apathy and social stagnation. The recognition of the precepts of the Koran as the only foundation of Moslem law, though it has in many instances given a check to oppression by the restrictions which it imposes on the exercise of arbitrary power, has now become an evil by fettering rulers in their efforts to promote the advance of civilisation and effect desirable reforms. This is the great difficulty which Mahmoud had to contend with, and which now dogs the progressive tendencies of his son. Reform and infisible, once in the course of a person's life. Good works are much dwelt upon; without them, prayer and fasting, though they may advance the worshipper to the portals of paradise, will not obtain him admission. Circumcision was an Arabian custom, which Mohammed retained, probably because it was also practised by the Jews. Polygamy had existed in the East from time immemorial; the prophet merely regulated it, restricting the number of wives which a Moslem may legally have to four. Murder, adultery, perjury, and false witness, are enumerated in the Koran as deadly sins; and usury, gaming, and the use of wine and pork, are prohibited in strict terms. Creditors are also forbidden to imprison their debtors or make slaves of them.

We have now to examine the influence of these doctrines and precepts on the character of the people among whom they have for centuries been received. Looking at its effects from the lofty point of view occupied by the Christian and the friend of social progress, the mission of Mohammed appears to be accomplished, and the system which he founded to have done all the good that it can do. It has outlived the time when it had a great purpose to serve, and now only exists as a protest against idolatry.

Without a change in the national faith, the progress of the Mohammedan nations must be very slow, leaving them always very far behind those of Western Europe. Whether a religious reformation is possible, would be an interesting subject for investigation. To external influences they have hitherto been inaccessible, and the experience of our missionaries seems to show that the first change must come from within; that some point must be found in the Moslem creed itself whereon to plant the lever of progress. Islamism is not without its sects; the Shiites, one of the two great divisions, reject the traditions, and are more tolerant and liberal than the Sunnites, or orthodox believers. Among these it is possible that some Moslem Luther may arise to reform the Mohammedan church, and give a new reading to the Koran; after which it would be more susceptible to the influence of Christianity.

MOSCOW.

Moscow, the city of Russia, is the largest city in Europe. The population of the city is about 600,000. It is situated on the Moskwa river, and is the capital of the Russian Empire. The city is very ancient, and has a long history. It was first mentioned in the year 878. In the year 1248 it was taken by the Mongols, and remained in their power for about 120 years. It was then recaptured by the Russians, and since that time has been the capital of the Russian Empire. The city is very beautiful, and is famous for its architecture, its art, and its industry. It is one of the most important cities in the world.

covered with tin, which, when it is cold, is in the form of these cupolas, and the numerous towers and minarets, which give the city its peculiar appearance.

The tremendous conflagration of 1812, with the subsequent renovation and improvement of the city, has so completely changed its appearance, that the descriptions published previously are now altogether no longer correct. The extraordinary mixture and contrast of magnificent palaces and petty huts, so often noticed by travellers, says Dr. Lyall, though still occurring in a few places, no longer strikes the eye as formerly; Moscow is daily losing its Asiatic features, and assuming the appearance of the capitals of Western Europe. Happily for the lovers of venerable antiquity, the Kremlin, which suffered comparatively little, is withstanding the attempts of the French to blow it up, retains unimpair'd its ancient irregularity and grandeur.

skilful construction, that it can be used in any kind of weather, and is perfectly safe and sound. The city is very beautiful, and is famous for its architecture, its art, and its industry. It is one of the most important cities in the world. The city is very ancient, and has a long history. It was first mentioned in the year 878. In the year 1248 it was taken by the Mongols, and remained in their power for about 120 years. It was then recaptured by the Russians, and since that time has been the capital of the Russian Empire. which is the great bell, said to be the largest in the world, containing the enormous quantity of 13,000 cwt. of metal. This tower was destroyed by an explosion in 1812, but has been rebuilt in the same style, and is much admired for its height and architectural beauty.

The Khitai-gorod, also surrounded by a wall, with towers and gates, is the trading quarter of Moscow, and contains the bazaars and principal shops, besides linen, cotton, and woollen manufactories, iron and brass foundries, distilleries, paper mills, &c., most of which are under the superintendance of foreigners, chiefly English, Germans, and French. The chief public buildings in this quarter are the municipal hall, a very handsome edifice, and the printing-office of the holy synod, which contains thirty presses for printing theological works in Slavonian, and educational books in Greek, Latin, French, and German, for the schools under the control of the synod. In the Khitai-gorod is the monument erected by order of the Emperor Alexander in honour of Minin and Pozharski, who delivered Russia from foreign domination in the seventeenth century, and placed Michael Romanoff, the first monarch of the reigning dynasty, on the throne. It consists of bronze statues of the two patriots, fourteen feet high, on a pedestal of red granite, adorned with bas-reliefs, and was executed by Martos, an eminent Russian artist.

The B. Bogorod, the third great division of the city, surrounds the Kremlin and the Khitai-gorod, except on the south, on which side the river Moskwa flows; and contains the principal public offices, the university, the governor's palace, a number of churches and monasteries, and the palaces of many of the nobles who make Moscow their winter residence. None of these edifices are remarkable for architectural beauty; but the palace of the governor is a magnificent edifice, and occupies a fine elevated situation. The palace of General Apraxin exceeds in length every other private edifice in Moscow; but that of Pashkoff is considered the finest specimen of architecture. Surrounding the three quarters described, and extending to the opposite side of the river, is the Zandien-gorod, containing the depôts of the commissariat and the imperial distilleries, the Imperial Philanthropic Society, the Medical-Chirurgical Academy, which has a good anatomical museum, and a fine collection of stuffed animals, fossils, and minerals; and the church and monastery of St. Anna, a handsome Gothic edifice, with a very splendid interior. This quarter was formerly surrounded by a rampart of earth, which no longer exists, the space being now planted with trees, so as to form a promenade entirely round the city, like the Bois de Vincennes at Paris.

The suburbs of Moscow form an irregular polygon, completely surrounding the Zandien-gorod, on both sides of the Moskwa. Some parts consist of streets and lanes, in which superb mansions alternate with wretched hovels, while others are like villages, separated from each other by market-gardens, meadows, and even corn-fields. In the suburbs are the noble hospital, founded at the end of the last century by Prince Galitzin, and named after him; the expensive and magnificent hospital, in the Grecian style of architecture, founded in 1810 by Count Sheremetoff; the military hospital, founded by Peter the Great; the splendid barracks, built for a palace by Catherine II., and converted to its present purpose by the Emperor Paul; and a number of churches and monasteries, some of which are worthy the attention of travellers. The asparagus-grown in the suburban gardens, is celebrated all over Russia for its size and superior flavour.

The manufactures of Moscow have made considerable progress during the last fifty years. In 1808, the number of large manufactories of linen, woollen, cotton, silk, and leather goods, hats, paper, soap, and earthenware, in the province, most of them in the capital, was 394, which, in 1820, had increased to 700. It is also a place of great trade, and, indeed, may be called the centre of the inland trade of the empire, as St. Petersburg is of the maritime trade. The annual value of the imports is estimated at five millions of rubles, or about 2,750,000*l.* The population of Moscow is stated in the most recent accounts at 360,000.

The amusements of Moscow are numerous. The principal theatre is the Italian, but very inferior, both in internal decoration and the character of the performances, to the imperial theatre at St. Petersburg. A tenth of the proceeds is appropriated to the support of the Beneficent Hospital, founded by Catherine II. in the year 1762. Concerts are given occasionally, but the chief resort of the aristocracy in the winter is the Assembly Rooms, where balls are given every Tuesday evening, from October to May, in a fine saloon, with an alabaster ceiling, supported by a colonnade of Corinthian pillars, of white sarsiola. Only members of the nobility have the carté, the annual subscription being for gentlemen fifty roubles, married ladies twenty-five roubles, and unmarried ladies ten roubles. Fêtes are sometimes given at the Prunk Gardens, with music, and an illumination at night. For the humbler classes, there are places of amusement, where the entertainments consist of singing and dancing, the performers being generally of the gipsy race.

According to Russian tradition, Moscow derives its name from Meshoch, the son of Japheth, and grandson of the antediluvian patriarch Noah, who settled on the spot shortly after the deluge. Until within a comparatively recent period, this idea was countenanced by the best biblical commentators; and a Jewish rabbi, about half a century ago, made this application of the passage — "We is no, that I sojourn in Meshoch." In consequence of this, it is said that the prayer for the emperor, which, up to that period, had been read in the synagogue, has been omitted, except when some Christian, supposed to be acquainted with Hebrew, has happened to be present. According to more reliable accounts, the city was founded by the Grand Duke George in 1147, and enlarged and improved by his son Andrew. It did not become the capital, however, until 1328, when the Grand Duke Ivan transferred the seat of government from Vladimir to the rising city of the Moskwa. At this time, however, and long afterwards, the city did not extend beyond the Kremlin quarter, which became as much an object of veneration to the Muscovites as Mecca to the followers of Mahomed. The capital has always been regarded with this mingled admiration and reverence: "Who can resist God and the great Novgorod" was a common saying when that city was the capital; and when the seat of government was transferred to Kief, that place was regarded as "the holy city," and the "mother of all the Russian cities." Hence Moscow has also been called "The Holy City," and more familiarly, "Mother Moscow," or sometimes "Stone Moscow," because the principal buildings are of that material, which is rarely the case in Russia, where, except in the large towns, even the churches are built of wood.

The history of Moscow embraces the usual series of fires, pestilences, famines, and tumults, common to most of the great cities of Europe. In the reign of Boris it was decimated by a famine so severe, that the inhabitants were reduced to cannibalism; and no city, except Constantinople, has been so often devastated by fire. These have been mainly owing, as in the case of the Turkish capital, to the general use of wood in the construction of dwelling-houses, great numbers of which are still built of that material. The tremendous conflagration of 1812, the effects of which have been already noticed, constitutes an important epoch in the history of Moscow, and is soensed by the inhabitants in their calculations. With the haplessness of that event the Russians are so fully impressed, that the 25th of December has been made a day of thanksgiving for "the deliverance of the Church and the Russian empire from the invasion of the French and twenty other nations who came with them."

Out of Russia, the belief is general that the conflagration, which destroyed two-thirds of the city, was the work of the Russians themselves, and that it was ordered by Count Rostopschin, the governor of Moscow, in order to deprive the invaders of winter quarters, and compel them to retreat in that inclement season. The disastrous consequences to the French are too well known to need relating here; and it is almost to suppose, that they would have destroyed a city, upon their possession of which all their hopes of success depended. But in Russia the belief is general that the destruction of the city was the work of the invaders; and much indignation is manifested on the expression of a contrary opinion. That it is still attributed to the French is probably owing to the fact, that Alexander charged them with it at the time as a means of exciting the passions of the army and people against them; and to deny the truth now would be hardly to deny. Count Rostopschin would never acknowledge that he was the author of the fire, and published a pamphlet in 1823, in which he positively denies that it was the result of his orders. The truth, however, must be known to many of the upper class, though policy has dictated its concealment; and, indeed, there are allusions in the works of Russian authors which leave little room for doubt. Karamzin, the historian and poet, has a tolerably plain avowal of the fact in a poem which has been translated by Dr. Bowring, in his "Russian Anthology":—

"Thou city! Sovereign Mother thou
Of all Slavonian cities now;
Work of seven ages—beauty one;
And glory wars around thee spread;

SEALS.

With the exception of the whales and their allies, the seals, perhaps, at first sight exhibit a greater departure from our ordinary idea of beasts than any other mammalia. Although still undoubtedly quadrupeds, their legs are so completely included within the skin of the body, that nothing but the feet project, and of these, the toes are enclosed by skin, so as to form fins or paddles, adapted almost solely for the propulsion of the animal through the water. The position of the hind legs, too, is very singular: they are turned completely backwards, so as to form a sort of broad double-tail fin, very similar, both in appearance and action, to the tail fin of the whale. But in these, as in the fore feet, all the parts existing in the most perfect quadrupeds are to be recognised; whilst the tail of the whale is really a fin, and has nothing whatever to do with the hinder extremities. As might be supposed from the form of the hind feet, the seals are by no means so home on dry land; when out of the water they flounder about in rather an awkward manner, by a wriggling action of the belly assisted by the fore paws. But in the water the fish-like form of their bodies and their powerful paddles render them very active; and in this, their native element, they swim and dive with great rapidity, in pursuit of the fishes and other marine animals which constitute their general food.

The common seal (Phoca vitulina), which is found in most seas, but is especially plentiful on the Arctic coasts, is of a yellowish-gray colour, usually covered with dusky or blackish spots. Its usual length is about three feet, but it sometimes measures as much as five or six. It has a rounded head, somewhat resembling that of a dog, whence it has obtained the name of "the sea-dog." The eyes are very large, soft, and black, giving it a most intelligent expression of countenance; it has no external ears, but the orifices are furnished with a valve, which the animal can close when under water, so as to prevent the ingress of that fluid. These animals are common on some parts of the British coast, but on the coast of Greenland they exist in innumerable herds, in spite of the destructive warfare that has been waged against them for ages, both by the native Esquimaux and by Europeans. To the latter the seal-fishery, as it is termed, furnishes only two products, oil and fur; but so indispensable is the seal to the very existence of the Greenlanders, that it has been said that the sea is his field and the seal-fishery his harvest. The skin of the seal, when deprived of the long and rather coarse hair which forms its outer coat, furnishes a soft and warm fur of a light brown or fawn colour, which was formerly in considerable repute in England for making caps, great-coat collars, waist-cots, slippers, and similar articles of winter comfort; but it provides the Greenlanders with the whole of his clothing; and to a people who depend so much on sea-faring life for their subsistence, its capability of resisting water is not one of its least desirable qualities. The oil, which is used in Europe only for burning in lamps, not only serves this purpose amongst the Esquimaux of Greenland, but is also employed by them for heating their huts or dwellings, and, strange as it may appear to European tastes, it likewise forms one of their favourite beverages. Mr. Mitchell, however, in speaking of the oil, says, that "when extracted but not putrefied has a mellowed, it is beautifully transparent, free from smell, and not unpleasant in its taste."

But every part of the seal is of importance to these people. The skin not only furnishes them with the warm clothing so necessary in their climate, but provides their hats and caps with a valuable covering, and when tanned forms a strong and serviceable

Tail-gathered riches blessed thy sons,
And splendid temples crowned thy head;
Our monarchs in thy bosom lie,
With sainted dust that cannot die.

Farewell! farewell! Thy children's hand
Have seized the all-destructive brands,
To which in ashes all thy pride

And heaven and earth be cursed
With thee, the nation's head and tail, leather for their shoes. The intestine are used to form wind curtains for the front of their tents, summer clothing, shirts, and a number of other articles; the sinews furnish them with thongs to sew them together; the bones are used as tools and for the heads of spears; and the flesh forms their most important article of food. This is said to be far more palatable than that of the whale, and the dried liver is said by Singsby to be esteemed even by Europeans "as an agreed delicacy."

In fine weather the seals are very fond of basking in the sun; and vast herds of them are often seen thus engaged upon the field-ice. In these situations, which are called "seal-meal-ways," the hunters endeavour to surprise them while sleeping, so as to intercept their attempted retreat into the water, to which, as an asylum, they always direct their course when alarmed. They are generally destroyed by knocking them on the nose with clubs, a single blow being sufficient to dispatch them. The European seal-fishery has been carried on almost entirely by ships sent out every spring from Hamburg and Bremen; and some of these have captured as many as four or five thousand in one voyage. The whalers, also, frequently take to sealing, probably to make up for bad success in their regular occupation.

In their character seals exhibit many amiable points. They are affectionate to their young; and the latter, in return, are said to be most dutifully obedient to their parents; and the males fight valorously in defence of their wives and families. In confinement, especially when taken young, they are easily tamed, and then exhibit much of the attachment of a dog for their master.

There are many other species of seals, all inhabiting the coasts of different parts of the world, but delighting principally in the coasts of the Arctic and Antarctic regions. Some, indeed, are found in hotter climates; and one, the Monk Seal (Phoca monachus), represented in our illustration, is tolerably numerous in the Mediterranean. It bears a considerable resemblance in form to the common seal; but the toes of the hind feet are destitute of claws, and the animal sometimes attains a length of from ten to twelve feet. This seal is often carried about the continent of Europe in shows, and some extraordinary accounts are given of its docility; thus it has been said to pronounce words; and Abroyard describes a Frenchman, proudly of this species, which had been taught to utter a cry of pleasure whenever the name of a Christian prince was mentioned, but to remain perfectly still when the Grand Turk, then the terror of Europe, was named.

The largest of the northern species is the Murre or Walrus (Trichechus communis), which is sometimes as much as twenty feet in length, and as thick in the body as an ox. The most striking peculiarity of this animal consists in a pair of tusks or tusks, which hang down from the angles of the lower jaw, and serve a great service to him in raising his body high above the water, when he wishes to rest upon the ice, or to stand on the beach. The walrus appears to feed almost entirely on sea-weeds and a portion, which he takes up from the sea at St. Petersburg, was purchased on a recent visit to the city, which exports and other subordinate ports a large number of parts. The tusks of the animal furnish excellent ivory; and the soft and spongy fat called blubber yields a large quantity of oil; but the qualities of the latter are not so valuable as those of the whale, and are not so much in demand. The walrus is chiefly taken on the Sea-horse, occasionally wanders to a considerable distance from its accustomed haunts; and, according to Dr. Fleming, a specimen was shot in December, 1817, on the coast of Harris, in the Hebrides.

One of the southern seals, called the Fur Seal, parceollone (Arctophalus Falklandicus), furnishes by far the greater portion mas acre was so indiscriminate— the mothers being killed before the young were able to shift for themselves— that the animals became nearly extinct.

Of the other species inhabiting the Southern Ocean, several attain a considerable size. One of the most singular is the Lionine Seal of the article known in Europe as seal's-skin. This species was formerly very common on the shores of the islands of the Southern Ocean, especially about the Falkland Islands, from which its name is derived. But in the course of a year or two, the avarice of Europeans destroyed as many as three hundred and twenty thousand of these animals; thus defeating its own object: for the or Sea Elephant (Moronga elephantium), the male of which has a curious appendage to the nose, resembling a proboscis, of about a foot in length. This seal, which lives in large herds on the shores of the islands of the Pacific Ocean, is often five-and-twenty or thirty feet long; and as its fat furnishes a large quantity of most excellent oil, its pursuit has become of great importance.

FRANCOIS ARAGO.

FRANCOIS DOMINIQUE ARAGO, the eminent astronomer, was born on the 26th February, 1786, at Estagel, at the foot of the Pyrenees. His father was a small proprietor, owing some vineyards and olive groves in that commune, the proceeds of which scarcely sufficed to maintain his numerous family. But removing to Perpignan at the Revolution, he distinguished himself by his public spirit, and was enabled to place his son in a good school at

On leaving the Polytechnic, he received an appointment at the observatory of Paris, and was shortly afterwards associated with M. Biot, in the operation of measuring an arc of the meridian in Spain. The operation was one of toil and difficulty, for he had to travel on foot through the mountains which divide the provinces of Valencia and Catalonia from that of Arragon; but youth and a robust constitution enabled him to surmount every obstacle. While Toulouse. The youth had already given evidence of superior abilities, and on presenting himself as a candidate for pupilage at the Polytechnic School, his first answer so astonished the examiner that he sent him to Paris at once, with a complimentary recommendation. At the Polytechnic he made rapid progress in his studies, and gave the first public evidence of his republican tendencies by refusing to subscribe his adhesion to the constitution of the empire.

engaged in his measurements, war commenced between France and Spain, and the mountaineers, whose ignorance incapacitated them from appreciating young Arago's scientific labours, attempted to seize him, alleging that he made fires in the mountains to direct the movements of the French troops. He found means, however, to reach the coast in disguise, but being unable to get away, he retraced his steps, and placed himself under the protection of the authorities, who put him in prison for safety, but not till he had been wounded and narrowly escaped death at the hands of a furious mob. By the connivance of the captain-general of the province, he escaped from prison after a brief incarceration, and embarked in a fishing-boat for Algiers, where he hoped to find a vessel bound for Marseilles. In this hope he was not disappointed, and was within sight of that port, when the vessel in which he had embarked was captured by a Spanish privateer and taken into Rosna. The authorities there seem to have desired some pretext for consenting the vessel, and confined Arago in a dark and dirty cell, alleging that he was a refugee Spaniard; for the vessel in which he had embarked was an Algerine one, in which the Dey had sent two lions as presents for the emperor. One of these had died on the voyage, and Arago found means to forward a letter to the Dey, informing him of the seizure of the vessel, and that the animal in question had been starved by the Spaniards. The Dey was terribly enraged, and addressed an angry letter to the Spanish government, demanding compensation for the seizure of the vessel, and threatening war in the case of refusal. This led to the surrender of the ship and the liberation of Arago, who proceeded on his voyage in her; but the crew were incompetent to the navigation, and losing their reckoning, landed him at Bougie, on the Algerian coast. From thence he travelled on foot to Algiers, disguised as an Arab, and on his arrival found the Dey dead, and the city in an uproar, occasioned by a conflict between two claimants to the succession. One of those was killed, and his victorious rival demanded payment from France of a pretended debt, imprisoning as a guarantee every Frenchman in Algeria.

After enduring many hardships, Arago obtained his liberation; and having narrowly escaped capture by a British cruiser, at length reached Marseilles. He immediately repaired to Paris, where he was elected a member of the Institute. Now commenced his long and glorious career of scientific discovery. To mention all that he has done in this way would far exceed our limits. His determination of the diameters of planets, afterwards adopted by Laplace; the discovery of coloured polarisation, and that of magnetism by rotation, which gained for him the Copley medal of the Royal Society, would alone suffice to place him in the first rank among the scientific geniuses of the age. In a few years he became a member of every great scientific society in Europe. He visited England, and received the honorary citizenship of Edinburgh and Glasgow; and in his own country he won the esteem and respect of all classes, and of men of all shades of political belief. His lectures on astronomy were invariably attended by crowded audiences; and the chairs which, after his elevation to the post of secretary to the Academy of Sciences, it became his duty to compose on the decease of any of its members, were superior to any that had appeared before.

The political opinions of which the eminent academician had given evidence in his youth underwent no modification in mature years, though he never took so active a part in politics as his brother Etienne. His sympathies were always with the people; and when the revolution of 1793 broke out, and the streets of Paris were red with blood, he went to Marshal Marmont, with whom he was on intimate terms, and besought him to seize the opportunity of redeeming his reputation from the stain of 1814, by resigning the command of the army, and thus staying the further effusion of blood. The marshal was deeply affected, but seemed to feel that such a step would subject him to the stigma of a double treason; his position was a painful one, he said, but he must do his duty to the king. Arago left his presence with regret; but the firmness of the marshal only retarded, without preventing, the downfall of the elder branch of the Bourbon dynasty. In the elections which followed the revolution, Arago was chosen to represent the department of the Pyrenees Orientales in the Chamber of Deputies, and joined the party of the extreme left, that of the ultra-liberals and republicans.

Two years later, when the barricades were again raised by the Parisians, he was one of those leaders of the opposition who assembled at the house of Lahtie, and, believing the insurrection triumphant, appointed a deputation to wait upon Louis Philippe, to dictate to him the terms on which he would be allowed to retain the sovereignty of France. But by the time the deputation reached the royal presence, the insurgents had been driven back upon the Boulevard St. Antoine; and they judged it prudent to confine their mission to urging upon the king the policy of making some concessions to the people, and extending his clemency to those who had risen against his government. The insurrection being suppressed, and no hope remaining of a speedy subversion of the monarchy, Arago turned his attention to the best means of conserving the freedom which still existed, and, in conjunction with Lafayette, Armand Carrel, Garnier-Pages, Armand Marrast, Corcos, and others of the republican party, established the Association for the Defence of the Liberty of the Press.

Though his republican opinions and his connexion with the men we have named rendered him ineligible for office under Louis Philippe in a political capacity, his reputation as an astronomer and mathematician was so high that he received the appointment of chief of the Royal Observatory at Paris, which he retained till his death. The active part which he took in politics during the latter years of the reign of Louis Philippe did not diminish the ardour of his scientific pursuits; and the distinction which the Paris Observatory has gained in the annals of astronomical science was mainly owing to his genius and assiduity. Among the subjects upon which his powerful intellect threw additional light at this time was the scintillation of the stars, which he ascribes to the circumstance of their rays passing through atmospheric strata having various degrees of heat, density, and humidity, and combining in the focus of the telescopic lens, where they produce images of varying colour and intensity.

During the session of 1847, a union of the various sections of the left was effected on the question of a reform of the electoral law. Thiers and Dupin, unable any longer to endure their exclusion from office, tendered their support to Odillon-Barrot, who had long been known as an advocate for an extension of the suffrage, and who readily accepted the aid of such distinguished converts. Arago cordially joined and promoted the fusion, as he would have done any measure which tended to further the greater end which he and his party had in view. The nation received the project with unbounded enthusiasm; but, in the agitation which then commenced, the republican leaders kept in the background, permitting Odillon-Barrot, Thiers, and Dupin, to receive all the honour of the movement, while they secretly prepared the people for the struggle which they saw impending.

The result proved the soundness of their judgment, as well as the hold which they had upon the public mind. When the republicans were armed and successful, when every street had its barricade, and the blood of the people crimsoned the pavement, it was too late to talk either of a reformed ministry or a regency. The republic was established with the assistance of Odillon-Barrot and his colleagues, but very much to their disappointment and regret. The prominent part which the venerable academician had taken in politics for so many years, and the steadiness and consistency with which he had voted with the ultra-liberal party, obtained his nomination as a member of the provisional government, and the ministry of marine was assigned him. He had now an opportunity of assisting in the application of the principles for which he had contended from his youth, and he succeeded in obtaining for the republic the adhesion of the whole of the marine service. During the brief administration of the provisional government, he discharged the duties of his office with honesty and ability; and when the republic merged in the empire, he retired from the arena of political strife, and applied himself with undiminished ardour to those scientific pursuits, which had already obtained him such high and honourable celebrity.

When all persons holding appointments under the imperial government were required to take the oath of allegiance to Napoleon III., Arago remained true to his principles, and refused. The emperor paid him the high but deserved compliment of dispensing with the oath, at the same time allowing him to retain his appointment at the Observatory. Having lived nearly sixty-eight years, seen the first republic and the first empire, the restored monarchy, the second republic, and the restored empire, and enjoyed the friendship of the most distinguished men of the day, the illustrious astronomer died on the 2nd of October, 1853, regretted by all who knew his worth or admired his genius.

AN ADVENTURE ON THE COAST OF AFRICA.

AN American schooner not long since sailed from New York to the west coast of Africa with salt beef and on board to exchange for ivory, which was to be taken to St. Helena for sale. Having landed, one evening, near Delagoa Bay, they wished to set sail on the following morning, but such was the violence of the sea and contrary winds that they could not possibly get out. In this trying position the captain and the second steersman resolved to go to Delagoa Bay by land and get more men, as all the sailors, with the exception of two or three, were attacked with fever. The undertaking was a venturesome one, even to ourselves, considering the danger of falling a prey to fever or the treachery of the natives. They took no weapons with them, thinking it of no account to burden themselves with them, and accomplished a journey of from twenty to five and twenty miles without any inconvenience. At length, however, they were joined by three natives, one of whom retired after a while on the pretence of fetching water, while the other two kindled a fire and began to roast some kind of corn, which they offered to the Americans. Meanwhile the one who had gone away came back with seven other natives.

The captain, anxious to save time, determined to proceed on his journey, though the sun was only just going down. To relieve themselves of the burden of their bundle of clothes, they entrusted it to the natives who followed. When they came to the foot of a steep hill, which afforded a fine prospect over a picturesque valley, they halted for the night and lighted a large fire. As might be expected, the curiosity, if not traitorous intentions, of the natives prompted them to look into the bundle to see what it contained. This the captain would not endure, and such was his violent indignation that a quarrel ensued, which was just what the natives wanted. Their object might have been easily conjectured when one of the three went professedly to fetch water and came back with seven comrades. Although a natural dread of the whites restrained them from open attack till night came on, their wild passions now suddenly burst forth with tremendous fury. They rose as one man, collected together in a body, and hurled their spears at the two unfortunate whites. The captain advanced boldly to meet them. Soon, however, having received several wounds, he was compelled to seek safety in flight. Exhausted by loss of blood, he was almost immediately overtaken and struck to the earth—all appearance dead, though it is not certain that he really was so.

The steersman, who had turned aside when the first spear was hurled, was pierced by two in the right arm, and hit near the right eye. Yet he scratched up a spear and hurled it with dreadful violence at those who were standing nearest, two of whom immediately fell dead. But against such a disparity of numbers it was hopeless for the most desperate courage to prevail, and he was at last struck down by a blow on the head from a club. As he lay in a state of perfect unconsciousness and without the slightest motion, they naturally thought he was dead. They dragged him to the fire, as he afterwards found, and stripped him of all his clothes, inflicting various injuries upon his person. When he came to himself again, he found he was lying naked upon the sand in a state of such utter exhaustion that he could neither speak nor move. By degrees his strength began to return, and he was able to look round at intervals without being noticed by the natives. At length he was horrified to see the body of the poor captain, which was lying near the fire, while several of the natives were engaged in cutting long strips from the fleshy parts of the body, and others were roasting them at the fire—all expressing by their looks a readiness to partake.

It is scarcely possible to conceive of a more horrible situation than that of the unfortunate wretched man. As if his own sufferings and fears were not enough, he had to look on in addition the distress and disgust of seeing his more fortunate, whose fate was yet worse than his own, thus brutally mangled by cannibals. He gave the last sign of life, which still lingered in him, he was sure to be instantly despatched by a most cruel blow of a club than the last. On the other hand, it would seem that the natives, if apparently hostile, it was but too probable that a savage's thirst had partially satisfied the cravings of their insatiable appetite with the blood of the unhappy man, they would be inclined to let him go, and let him to finish their blood meal. The very thought of what he must have endured all this time is enough to make one shudder. There he lay, as minutes after minutes passed by without being in any prospect of escape, in spite of his situation, an involuntary witness of the most revolting scene.

At last, after the natives had gorged themselves all they could eat and more, they lay down overpowered with drowsiness, and soon fell fast asleep. The poor man was once observed thinking upon his sudden desperate attempt to run, which, from his debilitated dreary state, that he might avoid his supposed misfortune by flight; but how, or where he could fly, he could not tell at all. He tried to get up, but could not stand; still he could he walk. Every time he made the attempt he fell down from utter exhaustion and debility. All he could do was to crawl along upon his hands and knees to some bushes that were near, and there hide himself. Happily, he managed to accomplish this without disturbing the slumbers of any of the inhuman monsters who were snoring away most lustily. In this retreat he lay in a state of utter helplessness the whole of the night, trembling every moment lest he should fall a prey to wild beasts, even if he escaped the fury of the natives, which seemed scarcely possible, and should, if still near, a horrible death from starvation if he survived the other two dangers. But scarcely had the morning light arrived, when the savages, having now slept off their last night's gluttony, woke up, and looking round, quickly perceived that their prey was no longer within sight. They at once commenced a diligent search, and discovered the poor fellow in his place of concealment. He made signs to them for some water to drink, but not only was this denied him, but he was plainly given to understand that they looked forward with delight to the gratification of feasting upon his flesh in the evening, and they shewed him a rough table upon which they intended to butcher him after an approved method of their own. They then left him to himself to dwell upon his miserable fate. Afterwards, when he cried with means for a draught of water, they brought him something to eat instead, and forced him to swallow it in spite of all his efforts to resist. As may be conjectured, it was positively a part of the poor captain's body which was left from last night's meal.

When the shades of evening began to come on, the unhappy creature, who was by this time somewhat recovered from his wounds, made a second desperate effort to escape. He could now walk, and slowly and cautiously he pursued his way with a security which nothing but courage and despair could impart. The darkness of the night favoured his design, and sometimes slipping down among the bushes of the wood, and sometimes reposing in the open air when it was too dark for him to be seen, he gradually gained fresh strength to continue his course, with an alacrity which increased with every step, as the prospect of deliverance became more and more distinct. At length he found he was getting near the shore, off which his companions were waiting his return. Forgetting his fatigues, and for a moment unconscious of his weakness and his wounds, he quickened his pace, and was on the point of reaching the malignant wretches, who had pursued him for a considerable distance. His companions at once took him to hand and the schooner in a state of complete exhaustion, from which it would scarcely be possible for him ever to recover. Happily, however, lost of body and peace of mind, together with the marvellous attention of his mates, at length reached his vessel in health.

During the boat's absence the vessel sailed on, doubtfully on board. Many of the crew were killed, and several that remained, who were still living, were so much exhausted by the storm, that they were never again capable of performing any duty, and among the vessel. After a time the fire was extinguished, the sailors went in a boat to the shore, and the vessel, being now of the coast, sailed with a favourable breeze. Had it not been for the explosion, the vessel would have sailed on, and the vessel, being now of the coast, sailed with a favourable breeze. The vessel, being now of the coast, sailed with a favourable breeze.

FIELD SPORTS OF ASSYRIA.

THE excavation of the ancient cities of Nineveh, Babylon, and Khorsabad, has presented us with glimpses of the every-day life of their former inhabitants, their amusements, their religious rites, and their domestic customs, which would have remained lost to us had the accumulated sand and rubbish of ages continued to cover their ruins. In leaving to the daylight and the curious eye of the visitor the long-buried towns of Pompeii and Herculaneum, we come upon the villas, the temples, and the theatres of the luxurious patricians of Rome, and acquire a knowledge of their manners and customs which renders intelligible many an otherwise obscure passage in Ovid, or Horace, or Juvenal; but in exploring the ruins of Nineveh, we survey the monuments of periods, in comparison with which that of the towns buried by the lava of Vesuvius is modern. We stand on the site of the oldest city in the world, dating from the epoch of Nimrod, the "mighty hunter," and walk through the chambers of the palace which Sennacherib raised and Sardanapalus destroyed.

and on a slab found in the same mound were sculptured a hind and fawn, and a wild sow with her young ones among tall reeds.

Other indications of the nature of the chase in that remote epoch were afforded by the designs traced on the bronze and iron utensils discovered in the excavations of Nimroud. Among these was a bronze plate, the rim embossed with figures of greyhounds pursuing a hare, and the centre representing encounters between men and lions. Another bore figures of stags, wild goats, bears, and leopards, with a rim of trees and deer. A third had figures of deer, hares, and lions, represented upon it. A large bowl has a hunting-scene represented in bold relief on its sides. The hunter stands in a chariot drawn by two horses, and driven by a charioteer, and turning round, discharges an arrow at a lion, which is already wounded; while another hunter pierces the animal with a spear. Above the second hunter a hawk is hovering. All these animals are still denizens of the woods and plains bordering the Tigris, though probably in diminished numbers. Speaking of the patches

ASSYRIAN CHASE IN THE FOREST.—FROM A BAS-RELIEF IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

Notwithstanding the thousands of years that have glided down the resistless stream of time into the ocean of eternity since the palaces of Nineveh and Khorsabad were raised, the sculptures on their walls afford as much information on Assyrian life and manners at that remote epoch, as the vessels and ornaments, found at Pompeii and Herculaneum, do of the days of Pliny. In the present article we propose to notice the field sports of the Assyrians, as illustrated by the bas-reliefs now in the British Museum. In clearing away some rubbish at Khorsabad, one of Mr. Layard's overseers discovered two bas-reliefs sculptured in black stone. On one of these slabs, from a restoration of which the above engraving is taken, a fowler is represented discharging an arrow at a bird on the wing, apparently a partridge, or perhaps a wild pigeon. Behind the sportsman are two others; one carrying a bow and arrows, the other a hare in his hand, and a gazelle over his shoulder. Among the seals, also, which Mr. Layard discovered at Konyunjik, was one representing a horseman in pursuit of a stag;

of bush which form green oases in the arid plain of Sinjar, Mr. Layard says: "Among them lurked game of various kinds. Troops of gazelles sprang from the low cover, and bounded over the plain. The greyhounds coursed hares; the horsemen followed a wild bear of enormous size, and nearly white from age; and the doctor, who was the sportsman of the party, shot a bustard, with beautiful speckled plumage and a ruff of long feathers round its neck. This bird was larger than the common small bustard, but apparently of the same species. Other bustards, besides many birds of the plover kind, rose from these tufts, which seemed to afford food and shelter to a variety of living creatures." The lion, too, is not uncommon in the jungles of the Khabor, and the Bedonins frequently find their cubs in the spring. The footprints of these animals were also discovered by Mr. Layard and his party about the mound of Niffer; and in the jungles bordering on the Tigris, leopards, hyenas, jackals, deer, antelopes, and wild boars are frequently met with.

The chase of the more formidable animal, as the lion and the wild bull, appears to have been pursued in chariots, as that of the tiger is in India on the backs of elephants. One of the bas-reliefs from Kouyunjik, now in the British Museum, and engraved below, represents a hunting scene very similar to that of the lion already described, but the object of the chase in this instance is the wild bull. The chariot is driven by a charioteer and drawn by two horses; the hunter holds by the horns a wounded bull, who is plunging over the wheels, and his spear is fixed in a socket made in the back of the chariot to receive it. A horseman, leading another horse, and carrying a spear in his right hand, is riding behind, and the hunter in the chariot is looking back towards him, as if invoking his assistance. Another bull, pierced with several arrows, and apparently in the agonies of death, is lying upon the ground, under the feet of the chariot-horses.

Probably the chase of the lion and wild bull was reserved for the kings and chief men, similar reservations having existed in most countries, while passing through what may be called the hunting stage in the history of society. As the animals of the chase became scarce, the idea of their domestication would suggest itself, and society would gradually pass into the pastoral stage. In the wild plains of south-western Asia, the adoption of the new mode of obtaining subsistence would necessitate a wandering life, such as the Arabs and Turcomans have continued to lead to the present day; but, in time, fertile spots would be found where agriculture could be pursued, and there villages would spring up, to become cities as the population increased, and the mechanical arts began to be acquired and practised. Still, as in all semi-barbarous communities war and the chase are the only honourable occupations, the laws of the hunting epoch would be preserved, and enforced with the more strictness in proportion as the objects of royal and princely sport became scarce. The lion and the wild bull, from the character of savage majesty associated with them, would be regarded as appertaining to the amusements of royalty, while any one would be allowed to chase the deer, the gazelle, or the wild goat.

PEERS AND M.P.'S.

Nothing, observes Disraeli, is more singular than the various success of men in the House of Commons. Fellows who have been the oracles of coteries from their birth; who have gone through the regular process of gold medals, senior wranglerships, and double-firsts; who have nightly sat down amid tumultuous cheering in debating societies, and can harangue with an unruffled forehead and unflinching voice from one end of a dinner-table to the other; who on all occasions have something to say, and can speak with fluency on what they know nothing about, no sooner rise in the house than their spell deserts them. All their effrontery vanishes. Common-place ideas are rendered more uninteresting by commonplace delivery; and keenly alive as even bodiles are in these sacred walls to the ridiculous, no one appears more thoroughly aware of his unexpected and astounding deficiencies than the orator himself. He regains his seat, hot and hard, sultry and still, with a burning cheek and dry hand, repressing his breath, lest it should give evidence of an existence of which he is ashamed, and clenching his fist, that the pressure may secretly convince him that he has not as completely annihilated his stupid body as his false reputation. On the other hand, persons whom the women have long deplored, and the men long pitied, as having no manner; who blush when you speak to them, and blunder when they speak to you, suddenly jump up in the house with a self-confidence which is only equalled by their consummate ability.

Another thing very remarkable in the House of Commons is the decline of oratory there. It is common to talk of the decline of oratory. We are all of us apt to look at the men and times of earlier days as more grand and spirit-stirring than our own. It is true, as Campbell sings, but still the fact is clear, that men do not talk of the orators of our times as our fathers talked of the orators of theirs. One reason may be, that oratory—the power of making a neat and appropriate speech—is much more common than it was. The average debating power is greater, and therefore particular talents shine less. But we are inclined to believe that the standard of excellence in the old House of Commons was higher than it has been since it has become reformed. The speeches of Chatham, Pitt, Sheridan, Fox, Grey, Plunkett, and the earlier speeches of Brougham, were delivered to an assembly, the élite of whom were the chosen spirits of the age. The greater part of the members of these parliaments were men to whom politics were a profession—with too many a trade. A man could not then so readily ride into office on the shoulders of the multitude. To sway the House of Commons was then much more essential than it is now. A great proportion of the members were undergoing their training for parliamentary speaking, to whom a rigid observation of those who were to form their models was a part of their duty, as being a part of their political education. The majority of the remainder were men of education and long political experience, grown old in the habit of weighing the relative value of different speakers. Another reason may also be given for the change. Mr. Francis, in his "Orators of the Age," says: "Another and a more influential cause of the altered tone of contemporary eloquence is the altered character of the House of Commons. The extension of the elective principle, which dates from the Reform Bill, has much augmented the numbers and increased the importance of a class of members for whom orators half a century ago would have entertained the most profound contempt—the bona fide representatives of borough constituencies. Public men find it necessary to conciliate them, and a particular style of speaking has grown into favour in consequence. Parliamentary orators now find it necessary to do something more than merely display their own talents. The commercial, calculating spirit of the bourgeoisie—though these borough members will very likely reject the term—jeers at fine speaking. It comes to transact business, not to be amused; for that it has the theatre, or the last new novel. It has railway bills, local government bills, and free trade dogmas to uphold or oppose; and its time is too precious to be wasted on prepared orations or magnificent exordiums. It requires something practical, plain figures of arithmetic to figures of rhetoric, and pounds, shillings, and pence to poetry. Still, however, there are some excellent debaters in the house. A few of them we will briefly refer to here.

“’Tis distance lends enchantment to the view;”

Lord John Russell, of course, stands first on our list. Though the son of a duke, he is a man of decided views, of extensive information, and of high knowledge of parliamentary warfare. To gain his position has been the labour of his life. As he tells us in "Don Carlos:"—

"It was my aim,
And I obtained it; not for empty glory;
For as I rooted out the weeds of passion,
One still remained, and grew till its tall plant Struck root in every fibre of my heart.
It was ambition—not the mean desire
Of rank or title, but great glorious sway
O'er multitudes of minds."

Yet Lord John has much to contend with. His outward form is frail and weakly; his countenance sicklied over with the effects of ill health and solitary communing; his figure shrunk below the ordinary dimensions of humanity; his general air that of a meditative invalid. But within that feeble body is a spirit that knows not how to cower, an unshaken heart, an aspiring soul. His voice is weak, his accent mingling with affectation, his elocution broken, stammering, and uncertain, save in a few lucky moments, when his tongue seems unloosed, when he becomes logical, eloquent, and terse. Then is his right hand convulsively clenched, his head proudly thrown back, the outline of his face becomes rigid, and his dwarfed figure expands as if he were a giant. Lord John is sometimes very happy, as when, in his letter to the deacons of Strand, he declared that "the whisper of a faction shall not prevail against the voice of a nation;" or when, in answer to Sir Francis Burdett, who charged him with the want of patriotism, he told the baronet there was also such a thing as the zeal of patriotism. One of Lord John's most celebrated speeches is that known as the Aladdin Lamp Speech, delivered by his lordship in 1819, and which Sir Robert Peel read to the house during the debate on the Reform Bill, in 1831. "Old Sarum," said Lord John, "existed when Somers and the great men of the revolution established our government. Rutland sent as many members as Yorkshire, when Hampden lost his life in defence of the constitution. If we should change the principles of our constitution, we should commit the folly of the servant in the story of Aladdin, who was deceived by the cry of 'New lamp for old!' Our lamp is covered with dust and rubbish, but it has a magical power; it has raised up a smiling land, not to be trod with overgrown palaces, but covered with modest dwellings, every one of which contains a freeman enjoying equal protection with the poorest subject in the land. It has called into life all the busy creations of commercial prosperity. Nor, when men were wanted to defend and illustrate their country, have such men been wanting. When the fate of the nation depended on the line of policy which she should adopt, there were orators of the highest degree placing in the strongest light the arguments for peace or war. When we decided upon war, we had heroes to gain us laurels in the field, and wield our thunder on the sea. When again we returned to peace—the questions of internal policy, of education of the poor, of criminal law, found men ready to devote the most splendid abilities to the well-being of the community. And shall we change an instrument, that has produced effects so wonderful, for a tarnished and tinsel toy of modern manufacture? No; small as the remaining treasure of the constitution is, I cannot consent to throw it into the wheel for the chance of obtaining a prize in the lottery of revolution." Amongst leaders of the Commons, Lord John has been signally successful. The post is one of prodigious difficulty. Its duties must be discharged in the face of a watchful opposition. It demands readiness in debate, and resolution in confronting adversaries. There must be courtesy, and good temper, and firmness. Character is indispensable, as Lord John wrote with significance: "It is the habit of party in England to ask the alliance of a man of genius, but to follow the guidance of a man of character." "It is a curious fact," observes a writer in "The Athenæum," "that a Dutchman has never yet led the British House of Commons. Only two Scotchmen, the Earls of Bute and Aberdeen, have been prime ministers of England. Two Irishmen, Castlereagh and Canning, have led the Commons; and amongst prime ministers Ireland counts three—the first Marquis of Lansdowne, the Duke of Wellington, and Mr. Canning. As successful leaders, Sir Robert Walpole and the younger Pitt are untrivalled in the duration of their power."

Lord Palmerston stands next in our list. In office under ten administrations, he is indeed the hero of a hundred fights. As a great member of parliament, his political power is very formidable. He is one of those of whom it is truly said: "On his policy Europe has two opinions: on his energy and eloquence the world has but one." Mr. Francis, who has painted a better portrait of him than any one else, says: "The dexterity with which he fences at the case opposed to him, touching its vulnerable points with his sarcastic venom, or triumphing in the power with which he can make a feint of argument answer all the purposes of a real home-thrust, is only equalled by his corresponding watchfulness and agility in parrying the thrusts of an opponent, guarding himself from his attack, or skipping about to avoid being hit. Lord Palmerston, besides all these practised arts, has also great plausibility, can work himself up admirably to a sham enthusiasm for liberal principles, and can do it so well that it really requires considerable experience and observation to enable one to detect the difference between his clever imitation and reality. He is almost unsurpassed in the art with which he can manage an argument with a show of fairness and reason, while only carrying it and his admirers far enough to serve the purpose of a party in the debate. He seldom commits himself so far as to be laid open to even the most practised debaters. They may rebuke him upon his excessive official vanity and imperviousness to criticism on that score; but they can hardly discover a flaw in the particular case which it suits him for the time being to make out. On the other hand, he possesses himself considerable power of ridicule; and when he finds the argument of his opponent unanswerable, or that it can only be answered by alliance with some principle that might be turned against himself, he is a great adept at getting rid of it by a side-wind of absurd allusion." Lord Palmerston's most remarkable speeches have been on the Catholic question in 1829, on Spanish affairs in 1837, and in the Pacific debate, when he defended the whole course of his foreign policy with extraordinary ability. His manner on this occasion lost its tone of jaunty and levity, his occasional haw-hawing passed, and for nearly five hours he poured forth a stream of political argument.

"Though deep yet clear, though gentle yet not dull, Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full."

A conservative member, walking home that night, said to a literary member of parliament: "I have heard Canning and Plunkett and Brougham in their best days, and I never heard anything to beat that speech." Sir Robert Peel's testimony, delivered in his last and ever-memorable speech, could not be surpassed. When alluding to it, he said: "We are all proud of the man who made it." During the whole time, the attention of a crowded house was maintained unflinching. The details of his policy, which in other hands would have been dull and uninteresting, served with him as the vehicle of lofty sentiment, of brilliant repartee, of broad and irresistible humour. It was universally admitted to be one of the greatest triumphs of parliamentary eloquence in our age.

William Ewart Gladstone is, perhaps, the most successful man in the house, and is another instance of what oratory can accomplish in the British Senate. Mr. Gladstone took his seat in the first reformed parliament, which met in the spring of 1833, as member for Newark, and took his place on the Conservative benches, under the leadership of Sir Robert Peel. He entered public life deeply and conscientiously attached to the then great conservative parties of the day—the conservatives in politics and the conservatives in theology. But Sir Robert Peel, who had an eye for talent, saw the young member possess the requisites of a first-rate parliamentary debater, and in 1834 appointed him a Lord of the Treasury—an office usually considered as the first step in official life. In his twenty-sixth year he had succeeded in establishing for himself a commanding position in the house. After the great chiefs of the party—after Sir Robert Peel, and Lord Stanley, and Sir James Graham—there was no conservative orator that could command more attention—none, the announcement of whose name would more quickly empty Bill Alley, or the smoking room, or the library, and fill the benches of the house with eager listeners—than Mr. Gladstone. His voice is clear and musical; his expression ready and fluent; his patience and resources inexhaustible during the tedious progress of his budget; inexhaustible. There is a staidness and flow in his periods which is seldom heard within the walls of St. Stephen's. He is sure, also, to take the question out of the beaten path of debate; to present it in some new and unexpected light; and to invest it, without any trace of pedantry, with historical and classical allusions, rich and rare. The author of the "British Chronicle" says of Mr. Gladstone: "It is impossible to listen to him without admiring the beauty of his language—the stately march of his measured tones—and the perfect mastery he possesses of our language, and which never allows him to be at a loss for a word. His chief defect is an occasional obscurity of meaning, arising from the subtle and penetrating intellect of the man, which seems constantly suggesting doubts and modifications of the principle he is advancing; so that there occurs to be carried on at the same time throughout his speech, not only the main proposition he is concerned to prove, but, in addition, a sort of under-current of thought, which insensibly modifies its sharpness and blunts its edge. It ought to be added, however, that his later speeches have been singularly free from this defect; that he has shown himself more of the practical statesman and less of the schoolman. As a model of eloquence, he is undoubtedly, next to Macaulay, the most finished orator in the House of Commons."

Sir James Graham has exercised more influence than most men in the House of Commons. Big and burly—with a large body and a large head—he seems a power in himself. Mr. Roebuck, in an unflattering criticism, thus describes him: "To a clear and logical understanding he added great industry; and all his expositions were distinguished by an exceedingly neat and appropriate diction; a solid and grave sarcasm lent interest to his arguments; and while an accurate arrangement made his statements clear and effective, a sedate and collected manner gave weight and a certain sort of dignity to his discourse. As an administrator he shone afterwards without a rival among his Whig associates, and seemed by his abilities destined soon to lead his friends amid the stormy conflicts of party warfare. The result has not hitherto justified this last anticipation. Timid and fastidious, he needs the robust hardihood of mind requisite for a political chief. As a soldier, none can surpass him in usefulness and ability. The responsibilities of a chief, however, seem to oppress his courage and paralyse the power of his intellect. To the reputation of an orator he has no claim. He is, nevertheless, an admirable speaker, and ready and effective in debate; but that inspiration which passion gives, he never knew, and, unmoved himself, he is unable to win his way to the hearts of others. His speaking, indeed, is almost without a fault: simple, clear, grave, often earnest; it always wins attention, because always deserving it. He, nevertheless, leaves his hearer unmoved; and is more apt, by his own cold denunciation, to repel and offend his audience, than by his tried arrangement and accurate argumentation, to convince and lead them." While parliamentary meets, you may see him as Mr. Francis so emphatically describe him: "He looks like some red-tape minister of the Turbulet school, or some pompous placeman conceited of his acres. But, by and by, you learn to separate the more fixed habit of the features from the odd expression of the countenance, till you see that the superficialness is real, though exaggerated by the physical peculiarity. There are no traces of ill nature in his face; but, on the other hand, there is nothing to encourage. Meanwhile, he has seated himself, placed his red box on the table before him, stretched himself out to his full length, and awaits, with arms folded and hat slouched over his face, the questioning to which he knows he will be subjected at this particular hour, from half past four to half past five."

Such are the orators of the cabinet. Sir W. Molesworth, now he is in office, rarely speaks. Sir Charles Wood has not yet attained the rank of much more than a second-rate debater; and Messrs. Cardwell and Robert are absent, and nothing more. Undoubtedly, apart from the cabinet and their supporters, the first place is due to the late ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has won for himself his present position by his oratory alone. When you enter the house, you see, on your right, fronting Her Majesty's Ministers in general, and Lord John Russell in particular, a Jewi-looking, individual, generally, particularly well dressed, with a wait-er which renders him the observed of all observers. You are looking at the leader of what was once the great Protectionist party, whose battles he has fought—whose councils he has guided—whose chiefs at one time he placed upon the Treasury benches. Up in the gallery no one is watched so anxiously as he. Lord Palmerston is the next best stared at man in the house, and then the diminutive Lord John. But all like to look at the man whose talents exalted him to the leadership of the proudest aristocracy on the face of the earth. So far as the opposition are concerned, the debate generally languishes till Disraeli rises to speak. His custom is to sit motionless as a mummy, all night, with his chin buried in his bosom, and his hands in his pockets, except when he takes them out to bite or to examine the state of his nails a nervous action which he seems unconsciously to perform. His speeches are fine displays. His celebrated speeches on his budget, when, alone and single-handed, he bravely combated his parliamentary opponents, were pre-eminently such. But that part of them which is generally the best is the personal; as when he taunted Roebuck with his "Suller's Wells sarcasm" and "melodramatic malignity," or charged Sir Robert Peel with catching the Whigs looting and stealing their clothes. Disraeli's speeches will not be read as Burke's are read. They are happy, telling, eminently adapted for the party purposes of the passing hour—clever, sophistical; but not widely reasoned, to last when the exigencies of the hour have passed away. Yet Disraeli's first speech was a failure. His subsequent success has, however, proved him to be a true prophet. "A time will come when you shall bear me," cried the discomfited Disraeli, as he sat down blushing and confused, after his maiden speech had been greeted with universal laughter; and time has proved him correct. He has a fine rich voice, which you can hear in every part of the house; and he has an unrivalled power of mixing up business details with general principles and with a happy variety of graceful phrases. There is a daring, sunny look in his face, which at once excites your interest. He is not a large man; but he looks well put together, with his head in the right place. But he never seems in earnest, or to have a great principle, or to extend his views beyond party objects; yet he is an admirable actor, and blends together the necessary business talk with the ornamental and picaresque of other men in the house. Generally he looks glum, and sits by himself—"a thing apart; amongst them but not of them." At times, however, he looks more cheerful. On that memorable December morning, when he was ousted from place and power—when the price, the labour of a life, was rudely torn from the hand that had but just grasped it the ex-Chancellor came out of the lobby gay and fresh as if the majority had been with him, not against him. There was an unwonted liveliness in his step and sparkle in his eye; but the excitement of the event was hardly over. The reaction had not yet commenced. The rest of the story was still to be told, and in his ear, the thunders of applause and hurrahs in the lobby, which greeted his daring reports and audacious predictions.

THE BOULEVARDS OF PARIS, BEFORE THE REVOLUTION OF 1789.

It is a strange thing to call up the appearance of an old city, to think, amid the ruins of the Colosseum, of the imperial glory of the world's mistress; to picture to ourselves what London was in the golden days when the Roses fought, and "every knight was true as his sword, and every lady fair as the dawn;" and strange to walk the crowded Boulevards of Paris on some high holiday, and think of what wonderful changes have occurred since grim walls occupied their site and were named Boulevards.

The pencil of M. Saint Aubin has furnished some very interesting sketches of the aspect which old Paris bore, and from one of his designs our engraving is taken. The picture is full of life and animation, and the utmost attention has been bestowed on the details of the drawing; so that the costume, the decorations, the employments, the houses, the trees, everything, from the rough garb of the water-carrier to the gorgeously bedizened figures, made glorious with hoop and stomacher, of my ladies proudly walking with the cocked-hat nobles, and looking as if the water-carrier, and the market-woman, and the curter, and the rest, were made of other clay than themselves: all indicate the spirit of the times.

THE BOULEVARDS OF PARIS IN 1789.—FROM A PAINTING BY M. ST. AUBIN.

There is something in the picture peculiar to those luckless days in the stiff, formal look of the scene, and still more so in the gay groups that throng the avenue and lounge at the tables. There they are, those butterfly flutterers, basking in the sunshine of their high and privileged condition. They have no fear of the coming storm; they see no cloud, as a man's hand, to darken their horizon; they are forgetful that the flood of light upon them is that of a setting sun—blood-red. They have heard, perhaps, that the people are complaining; that the people—a many-headed monster—are crying aloud for bread—only bread; that poverty and utter destitution have set the people thinking about whether the things that are, are the things that should be; whether the right is all on the side of might; and whether it would not be possible to break down a few barriers that separate high and low, titled and untitled, and effect thereby a change for the better. They, who are dighting in all their gaiety and splendour, whose cabs and carriages and quiet sedans have brought them hither, and are waiting for them now—they suspect no evil; they rest in perfect security. The only sort of revolution they fear is a revolution in costume; and one of those titled beaux, brilliant in scarlet and gold lace, whispers to the belle upon his arm that the flood-gates of society are in danger, for M. — has actually come to court in shoe-strings instead of buckles!

If those gay groups are thinking at all of the murmurs of the people—murmurs very soft and far away, like the murmuring in a sea-shell—they take courage in referring to the days of old, and calling to mind the masterly statesmanship of Louis Quatorze. They think of him who said, "I am the State;" and when the ambassadors of foreign countries begged to know who was prime minister, said, "I am my own prime minister;" and thinking of him, and how he always hushed popular murmurs with the strong hand—made stronger by an iron glove—they take courage.

But the murmuring people look further back than the days of Louis XIV. They think of the good King Henry, and how the effort of that prince's life was the good of his subjects, and the wish of his heart that every peasant might have a fowl in the pot on Sundays; and if ever comparisons were odious, they are odious there. Henry IV. and Louis XIV! Recent events have set the people thinking of Liberty. They have heard the strain borne from the other side of the Atlantic, and are beginning to learn the tune. Though overawed by bayonets, they dare not sing it loudly as yet.

But things are ripe for a change. The sun will soon be set, and the red glow of its declining glory pass away; then night will come—black night, and with it nightmare-horrors. The murmuring in the sea shell is growing louder and louder, and will soon swell into a roar, a shout of angry defiance and long pent-up fury, which shall echo from every side of Paris, be heard all over Europe, and plunge the world in war.

Spout away, Messieurs, while the day endures, display your peacock plumes, and feast and rejoice while the light lasts—night is coming!

Previous to the Revolution, the Promenade of the Boulevards exhibited the clear distinction of rank, and the better and commoner sort of people—the delf and the porcelain—walked on different parts of the road. After the Revolution things were changed, and my lord's broadcloth brushed the blouse of the mechanic,

THE WOMEN OF SPAIN.

ALL who have travelled in Spain concur in admiring the beauty of the women; and we were once in company with a gentleman, who pronounced those of Barcelona to be the most superbly beautiful, whether in face or figure, that he had ever beheld. Those of Alicant, represented in the annexed engraving, are scarcely inferior; and the loveliness of the Andalusian women has long been the theme of admiration among travellers. In form, the Spanish women seldom exceed the middle height, and are often below it; but they are admirably moulded, and all their movements are characterised by a mingled voluptuousness and grace which is as “Black eyes and brown

You may every day see;
But blue, like my love's,
The gods made for me.”

Spanish women invariably dress in a becoming and picturesque manner, though the latter quality is exhibited in the highest degree among the peasantry, the costume of the higher classes, particularly in Madrid, being more susceptible to the influences from Paris. In manners, their listlessness contrasts strongly with the vivacity attractive as it is inimitable. Their hair is generally dark, often black, worn in smooth bands in front, and plaited or twisted and tied with ribbons behind. The tint of their complexion varies in different parts of the country: in Navarre and Biscay fair complexions are not at all uncommon, but in the South the usual tint is a clear light brown, sometimes inclining to olive. Their eyes are invariably full, bright, and expressive, generally dark-brown or black; but whatever the attraction these may possess for foreigners from a more northern latitude, they are less admired in Spain than blue eyes, perhaps because the latter are rarer there: for, as a stanza of a song popular in the southern provinces says:

of their fair neighbours on the other side of the Pyrenées; devotion and love-making occupy much of their time, and in both the senses are concerned more than the heart. The siesta in the afternoon, and the promenade in the evening, are indulged in by all. Teatulia, or evening parties, are very frequent in the towns; but the theatre is not so much patronised as in France and Italy. Music and dancing are, next to bull-fights, their favourite amusements; the guitar is in universal use, and all classes are passionately fond of dancing. The bolero and the fandango are the chief national dances, and the graceful movements of the former are much admired: the other is rather of a licentious character, and is seldom seen in what is called good society, though Spain is not a country in which the standard of morality is very high.

But the bull-fights are the most popular amusements of the Spaniards, whether men or women; and no mode of displaying gallantry is so much approved, especially among women of inferior condition, as voluntarily to a bull-fight. There they go in their holiday attire, and none applaud more energetically the courage of the bull or the dexterity of his tormentors. It is, in fact, the national pastime, and seems a passion with them; but that its indulgence has an injurious effect on the national character, obliterating respect for human life and preventing the development of a more refined taste, no one can doubt. It is to the Spaniards what the brutal sports of the amphitheatre were to the ancient Romans, and the moral and social effects are much the same.

SELF-DENIAL:

OR,

PASSAGES OF A LIFE.

BY A WAYFARER.

I.

I ALWAYS thought our village the prettiest spot on earth. There was the house of the rector, buried in foliage and surrounded by grounds kept with scrupulous care, and yet half wild with their growths of trees, with the tiny stream that flowed behind the kitchen-garden, and the little pond, where we as children used to float our boats and fish. It was an ancient house, too, with memories of the past clinging to it with as much tenacity as the ivy that clothed its aged walls. It had been the scene of tragedies, that were darkly whispered still, but which had occurred when the Parliamentarians and Royalists of past times held our village in turns.

The talk of Pemberton-Lee was, however, now of much more positive things: of the railway which was to come near soon—of the new houses being erected on the London road—of the age and prospects of its inhabitants—and, doubtless, on the occasion to which I am about to refer—of my own humble self.

It was scarcely dawn of day, when a window of the rectory was cautiously raised and a head protruded. It was the head of a youth about nineteen, not unintelligent, I believe, but much sun-burnt, as if its owner were fond of rambling in the fields in sunny places, and utterly careless of his complexion. This youth looked around observantly, and then cast a bundle on the greensward. Next came a double-knotted sheet, which served as a rope ladder, and the youth was down.

I had fled from my father's house, and was alone in the world, with nothing but a few clothes and little more than a shilling in my pocket.

We had had a conversation the night before about my future destiny. My father had wished one thing, I another. He had insisted; I had resisted, and raised my voice in passion. With a sternness which was his characteristic, and that made me quail at the moment, he had ordered me to bed. I had obeyed, as far as going to my room constituted obedience; but I had not even undressed, I heard him come to my door and listen about an hour later, and I thought I even heard a sob; but however this may be, I steeled my heart against every soft emotion, and buried my head in my hands.

At dawn of day I fled.

I had received a careful, even a polished education; and my father had given me the choice of the church, physic, or the law. I chose the army, to which my father had a most unquerable aversion. I had an equal dislike to those professions offered to me; and thus it was we quarrelled. He painted the profession of arms in such odious colours that my anger got the better of my reason.

"At all events, it is better than the drudgery of physic and law, or the trade of religion!" I said, in a voice that raised the echoes of the house.

There was a look on my father's face that made me feel sorry for my coarse language; but I had no time to manifest my grief; for, with words stern and cold, he ordered me to bed.

But of what is past let me speak no more. I have made my choice. I have resolved to do battle with the world, and I have commenced the strife, for I am on the highway to London, and alone. I had made up my mind to walk. It is true I could have travelled outside the coach easily, on the strength of my father's name; but I did not think this honest. I was wilful and obstinate; but I was proud in the right way also. I had selected my path; it was my business to find the means of subsistence for the future.

I walked slowly down a lane that led behind the house where I had been born, and where dwelt my parents, my sister, and a younger brother. I turned to gaze upon one window round which the honeysuckle crept; and as my eyes fell upon it, they were moistened; for there, ignorant of all that was passing, slept my mother. Then an impulse came over me to turn back, and yield. But I pictured a cold smile on my father's face, and I turned firmly away and walked rapidly down the green lane—scene of many of my happiest hours of study and innocence.

I had avoided the village, because I feared the questions which might be put to me. Somebody would be sure to nip, and I should, I thought, betray myself. I lost nothing, I knew, by taking this cross lane. It only took me to another part of the great road that led to London. Like all outcasts, I rushed at once towards the great modern Babylon, which attracts and lures, with unexampled success, so many from the green fields and quiet nooks of England.

It was about an hour after sunrise when I halted, and sat down by the road-side. I had with me a good lunch of bread and cheese, and I was near a little brook that rattled clear and soft over the well-worn stones. I was rather faint, and tried to eat. I confess that I burst out crying. It was very weak; but I verily do believe that the thought of the neat breakfast-parlour, the warm coffee, the hissing urn, the fresh eggs, and delicious bread which usually formed our morning repast, had an influence over me which I was ashamed to acknowledge to myself.

If we honestly review our characters and inclinations, we shall often find that trifles have an influence over our acts and proceedings which, in general, we are too proud to acknowledge; for myself, could I have crept back unseen to my room at that moment, I think I should have done so; have breakfasted, begged my father's pardon, and become saw-bones, lawyer, or clergyman, just as he had decided. But I feared ridicule above all; and at that moment an occurrence took place which somewhat diverted my thoughts.

I was eating my hard crust and drinking water out of a broken glass, when I heard footsteps, and, raising my head, saw approaching me a youth about my own age—short, red-haired, merry-looking, a stick in his hand, a bundle on his back—to all appearance, by his clothes, a mechanic on tramp for work.

"Good morning," said he cavalierly. I suppose, having seen my slender provender, he allowed himself the more liberty of speech.

"Good morning," I replied, rather surlily.

"Going my way?" he continued with perfect good humour, at the same time sitting down on the opposite side of the little brook, which escaped across the road under a neat little wooden bridge.

"I am going to London," I said again surlily.

"Are you?" he resumed. "Then you've got a very bad taste in shoes. Those light things will never take you to London, and that suit of clothes will be spoilt with dust. What trade are you, mate?"

"I have no trade," I said fiercely. "I am going to London because it pleases me to go; and I have my own reasons for being dressed as I am."

With these words I rose, and snatching up my bundle, hurried away without once looking behind. I soon, however, heard my questioner, after indulging in a hearty laugh, come whistling up behind me. I, however, paid no attention to him, but trudged on wrapped in my own thoughts, which were not of the most agreeable kind.

I felt an oppression and sinking at the heart which was of the most painful character. I could have sobbed and cried as I went, but kept down my rising emotions, because I was on a high-road, with people constantly passing, and also because every hour or so I came to a village, once to a town. I did not stop in any of them; the more because my persevering friend of the morning kept close behind me, never speaking, not even coming near me, but whistling in a happy and merry way that was peculiarly annoying. About one o'clock he hailed me.

"Ain't you going to eat?" he said in his rough way. "This is the last house for ten miles to come."

I made no reply, but raising my head, saw before me a house of refreshment for the poorer class of travellers. I went in, for I was really hungry, and I dined with an appetite which I had rarely known before, not having otherwise dined so many miles without eating. When I had paid for my dinner, I was penniless. I could not move the look of blank surprise which suffused my face when I made this discovery; I felt it, and I hurriedly rose and left the house.

"You won't do to travel," said my landlord following me, and this time coming close up to my side; "if you spend many one-and-sixpences for meat and bread and ale, you'll soon come to your last shilling!"

"I have spent my last penny," replied I, turning round and facing him with a dogged manner that reminded me of my school-days; "but what is that to you? Thank you for nothing—leave me then in peace!"

"Young gentleman," he said gently, touching his cap at the same time, "I see you ain't used to the road, and I only want to be civil. How are you going to travel six days without money?"

"I really do not know," I said, seating myself on a green bank, and yielding to the painful reflections evoked by this simple question.

"I suppose you don't. You are green, I can see. But look at me! I'm only a boy; I've travelled three years. I took my way."

"Ain't it New Year haven't started for pleasure, else you'd have a shov. You can't get your living, I can see; so you've run away from home. Never mind, Jack Prentice do sn't care, and if you don't go to London, why he's the lad to tell you how."

"Mr. Prentice," said I, without any of the pride and haughtiness I had hitherto assumed, "you are quite a stranger to me; but your manner seems kind. I shall be very happy to follow your advice."

"Do you value that watch and chain much?" he asked quickly.

"They are a present from my mother," I faltered.

"Then of course you do value them very good. Well then, young gentleman, I won't advise you to sell them. But take my advice—borrow some money, and leave them as security. You can go to London comfortably, and get your watch again when you like."

I stared at him. I had not taken lessons in the ups and downs, and miseries of life, and I, as yet, knew nothing of the system he alluded to. My ignorance and surprise could have been seen in my face. But he left me no time for reflection.

"Well! worse and worse—you never heard of but before! I thought everybody had. I've been for father and pledged his concerns, when he used to drink in bed—he don't drink in bed now, so somehow he's lost the habit of pawning. But it's useful, too, sometimes. It's useful to you now. So the first town we come to, that'll be the place we'll do it."

He rose, and left to my way, and I followed him to the county town. I was the first time, not in a carriage, but with the coach. The gentleman's appearance and manners, and I was thankful to be guided by a sober-headed, I found him a tall, humorous, experienced lad. He was a tall man, and had of him all the useful attributes for pawning. He had his watch in his hand, and at the present season was on his way to London, where he had on thought of settling.

His father had a large family, which he had originally brought up exceedingly well; but having taken to drinking, they had all got dispersed. One or two had done badly, and one or two witness Jack appeared getting on in the world. Jack had recently been down to visit his father, and found things much changed. Old Prentice had become a sober man, and was so comfortable in his home, that his son Jack was quite delighted. He told me some odd stories of his life which amused me very much, and made the journey seem no half so wearisome.

We soon reached L—, where, by the express which I had taken, I was at a loss to understand, I became possessed of my watch, having my watch as security for the loan. I can't say I felt much confidence in ever seeing it again. But I was utterly helpless without the money, and made the sacrifice. It was a painful one, but the alternative was also bad. I took it to the pawnshop, which was of a bladed hall, and placed it in my hand.

I thought, as I went about, of the many thousand who, like myself, had started from the quiet of the country in search of fortune. I almost imagined a forgotten poor Oliver Goldsmith. I had no particular friends to consult, and I reflected his little of life. There were many other such names about across my brain, and I felt sad. I had not the least notion of what I could do. I had a vague idea of trying to write for the press. I had read too much not to know how difficult it is for a mere tyro to succeed when so many men of experience and talent are out of employment at times. Still, I intended to try.

Jack Prentice often asked me what I meant to do when I should have reached London. I did not think proper to reveal to him my hopes and doubts of fancy. I said I did not know. The young workman smiled and shook his head. He had decidedly a very bad opinion of my prospects, to say the truth, but in common sense. Still he struck to my advantage, and was both useful and agreeable to me on the road.

When we reached Kew we parted. He had business there for a day or two. He gave me his address in London, and I promised to see him soon. We shook hands heartily, and I went on my way. The road has become familiar to me since, but then it was all new. I was much struck by the noise, by the traffic, by the houses that increased as I went, that became continuous streets, a town, a wilderness, until, stunned, overwhelmed, and almost fainting, I reached Hyde-park Corner. Quite overcome by the novelty of all around me, I flew towards some green I saw to my left, and lay down upon the grass.

Nobody noticed me. That was what struck me with most force at first. Had I entered a hamlet, village, or small town, and fallen fainting on the green, I should have had many hands held out to raise me up. I thought the Londoners selfish, hard-hearted, and brutish. I made a mistake. The men of the great city are no worse than others. But the rapid and complex life of a great town is such that men must attend to their own business; while imposture is so rife, and wretchedness so common, that a tall lad in shabby gentled clothes, covered with dust and carrying a bundle, could not hope to arrest the notice of foot-passengers or riders.

After a few minutes, I rose and penetrated timidly into the great street which led deep into the heart of the city. I no longer walked—I strolled and gaped. The crowd, the palaces, the noise, the movement, overwhelmed me. I believe no intelligence, however great, has failed to feel crushed for a moment at the first contact with a great city.

But I was exhausted and hungry, and I did not know where to go. Suddenly an idea, luminous and rapid as a lightning-bolt, came across my aching brain. My friend, Charles Oatley, was in London, reading for the bar. We corresponded occasionally—indeed, very seldom—but we did write a long letter at times; and the last time he dated his letter from a street leading out of the Strand.

I saw a policeman, and asked him the way to the Strand. He pointed it out, and I had walked right to it without knowing it. I slowly went on in my way, looking at all the names I saw. At once, suddenly, my eye lighted on the right one, and at the same moment, I recollected the number. It was 17, Strand.

I felt a bad foreboding, and I expected a very disagreeable as I knothed, very cordily, at the door.

"What may your pleasure be, young man?" said a Irishman, leaning from the archway.

"It is Mr. Charles Oatley's residence, and I have a letter from him, if you please."

The old fellow looked at me for a moment, with a startled expression, and then, after a moment's reflection, he said, "Well, Mr. Oatley, and then I'll be right in the street in the evening, and I'll be right in the street in the evening, and I'll be right in the street in the evening."

I had a bad foreboding, and I expected a very disagreeable as I knothed, very cordily, at the door.

GENERAL WASHINGTON.

This distinguished patriot was descended from an ancient English family which quitted this country in 1637, and settled on the banks of the Potomac, in Virginia. His father, who possessed considerable property in that state and Maryland, divided it at his death in 1743 among his six sons, of whom George, the subject of our memoir, was the third. He was born on the 22nd of February, 1732, and consequently was only eleven years of age when death deprived him of his father. He received his education at one of the common schools of the province, but the course of instruction did not include any of the ancient or modern languages, though he seems to have attained to a considerable degree of proficiency in trigonometry and land-surveying. He was a diligent scholar, and at the same time took an active part in the sports of his schoolfellows, among whom the amiability of his disposition rendered him a general favourite. After leaving school, which he did in his sixteenth year, he applied himself to the study of mathematics; and while passing the winter at Mount Vernon, then the residence of his brother

Lawrence, he attracted the notice of Lord Fairfax, who employed him in surveying some extensive property on the banks of the southern branch of the Potomac. The ability which he displayed in the performance of this task led to his appointment as public surveyor, and the next three years were passed among the wilds of the Alleghany mountains, the hardships of exploring in the wilderness being relieved by surveying at intervals the settled districts in the valleys.

At the expiration of this period, the frontiers were threatened by the Indian tribes, and war with France was looming on the horizon. To meet the possible danger, Virginia was divided into military districts, and Washington was appointed to the command of one of them, with the rank of major. He entered upon his new duties with zeal and energy, applying himself indefatigably to the study of military exercises and tactics, and the promotion of discipline. In 1754 he was appointed second in command of the Virginian militia, and on the 27th of May in that year he made his first essay in arms, encountering and defeating a French force under Colonel Jumonville, who fell in the engagement. Shortly afterwards, the chief command devolved upon him by the death of Colonel Fry, and he intrenched himself at the Great Meadows, expecting that a larger force would be sent against him as soon as the defeat of Jumonville became known. In this anticipation he was not deceived, but the strong force in which the French advanced obliged him to retreat, an operation which he performed so ably as to receive the thanks of the provincial legislature.

In 1755, he accompanied General Braddock on the ill-starred expedition which terminated in the death of that brave but rash officer. In marching through a forest they were suddenly assailed, flank and rear, by volleys of rifle-balls from unseen foes; officers and men were paralysed, Braddock was shot dead, and Washington with difficulty led the decimated band out of the ambuscade. Their assailants were the Indians in alliance with the French, who, having been informed of Braddock's march, had posted themselves behind the trees and in the thickets to receive him. After this defeat, Washington retired to Mount Vernon, which had devolved to him by the death of his brother Lawrence, in 1752, and the subsequent decease of Lawrence's daughter. The patrimonial mansion was an unpretending edifice of brick and wood, with a colonnade in front, supporting an open balcony, and pleasantly situated on an eminence near the Potomac. There he practised, on a large scale, the munificent hospitality characteristic of the southern planters, with the most reputable of whom he cultivated an intimate acquaintance. He was fond of the chase, and in this amusement and the supervision and improvement of his property he passed most of his time. In 1758 he resigned his commission as commander of the Virginian militia, and was elected a member of the provincial legislature, the sittings of which he regularly attended, though he seldom spoke.

At the commencement of the following year he entered the connubial state with Mrs. Custis, a young widow with two children, upon whom two thirds of her extensive property were settled, she holding the remainder in her own right. Washington's own estates were now of considerable extent and value; for, in addition to Mount Vernon, he held large tracts, of which he had obtained grants from the government. As he was his own surveyor, steward, and lawyer, the management of his wife's property and that of her children, in addition to his own, occupied much of his time; but he still attended the sessions of the legislature with the same regularity as before, and found leisure for the rational enjoyment of life and the amenities of society.

Fifteen years had been passed tranquilly and usefully, when the political horizon was clouded by the disputes between the American colonies and the parent state. Washington saw the impending struggle with regret, for he was far from being either an agitator by nature or a democrat by principle. In England he would probably have been a moderate Whig; that he was a republican was the result of a combination of circumstances peculiar to a colony. In fact, when the Americans had defeated the armies of the mother-country and declared their independence, no other form of govern-beneficial to his family and his country. He improved his estates, promoted schemes of internal navigation, gave his countenance and assistance to plans for the advancement of education and the civilization of the Indians, entertained the planters of Virginia with a hospitality more profuse than ever, and, amid all these multifarious occupations, found time to give his attention to the constitution that was being prepared for the young republic. He represented Virginia in the Constituent Convention, and in February, 1789, was elected first president of the United States.

His journey from Mount Vernon to New York, which was then the seat of government, was a continued triumph—so much and so generally was he beloved and respected. He supported the dignity of the presidential office in a manner as free from ostentation as possible, and realised the ancient ideal of a sage and legislator more fully than any other modern has done either before or since. His industry and application, and the methodical habits he had acquired in his youth, enabled him to get through a great amount of business, so that he was really the head of the government. The day ment was practicable. Washington, then, was a republican from circumstances, a pure and ardent patriot, but not to be confounded with the republicans on principle, with whom democracy is a faith. He embraced republicanism as a necessity rather than as a choice.

It is unnecessary to recapitulate here all the engagements in which Washington acted a brilliant part during the memorable war of independence. He was appointed to the chief command of the American forces in the summer of 1775, and resigned his commission into the hands of the president of congress at the close of 1783. By his exertions and achievements America had been freed, and henceforth was to take her place, and no mean one, among the nations of the earth. Between the period when he sheathed the sword that had liberated his country and that of his installation in the president's chair, there was an interval of five years, during which he resided at Mount Vernon. It is pleasant to contemplate the retirement of great men, and curious to note how the heroes of the sword occupy the leisure afforded them by peace. Washington was not one to suffer this period to pass idly, and without result was his reception day, when he was accessible to all; the rest of the week was devoted to the business of the republic. He never received company on Sunday; but regularly attended divine worship, and passed the remainder of the day in the privacy of the domestic circle.

In his inaugural address to congress, in January, 1790, he recommended the legislature to provide without delay for the public defence; to devise an effective system for the support of the national credit; to encourage agriculture, commerce, and manufactures; to promote science and literature; and to establish a uniform system of currency, weights, and measures. The funding of the domestic debt of the nation, proposed by Hamilton, secretary to the treasury, was adopted; and the measure received the decided approbation of Washington. This measure first brought into collision the two parties in the state, which had been incessantly formed during the discussion of the constitution. They were the Federalists, led by Hamilton and Adams; and the Democrats, headed by Jefferson. Washington, while inclining to the former, endeavoured to reconcile the two parties, but ultimately without success. Wisely refraining from identifying himself with either, he preserved the esteem of both; and when the time approached for him to surrender his trust to congress, Jefferson and Hamilton joined in the general wish that he would allow himself to be re-elected. He did not disappoint the desire of the nation, and resumed the duties of his high office for another term of four years.

The distance between the two great parties in the state continued to increase; and notwithstanding the position of dignified neutrality and independence which Washington usually maintained, he did not pass through his second presidency without evincing his real sympathy with the party of Hamilton and Adams in a manner which drew upon him the attacks of the democrats. The first occasion was when he expressed himself strongly against the democratic societies, which seem to have inspired him with groundless alarm; the second was the treaty which he initiated with Great Britain in 1795, and which was ultimately acknowledged by those to whom it gave offence, to have been justified by the exigency of the occasion. Men who occupy the high places in a state, invariably make some enemies; and it is in circumstances that speak high, for Washington's benevolence and judgment that he made so few, and none whose enmity survived the cessation that ended it forth.

In December, 1793, he delivered his last address to congress, recommending the gradual increase of the navy, a provision for the encouragement of agriculture and manufactures, and the establishment of a national university and a military academy. He remained in the capital until the installation of his successor, Adams, at which ceremony he was present as a spectator; and then he retired to Mount Vernon, there to pass the brief remainder of his days. He died on the 14th of December, 1799, leaving behind him the reputation of an honest man, a pure patriot, a brave warrior, and an enlightened statesman; and was buried in the unpretending tomb represented in our second engraving, situated on a gentle eminence between his house at Mount Vernon and the river Potomac.

The character of this distinguished man can never be better drawn than by his countryman and contemporary, Jefferson, who, though opposed to him in politics, has done him ample justice. He says:—"His mind was great and powerful, without being of the very first order; his penetration strong, though not so acute as that of a Bacon, Newton, or Locke; and, as far as he saw, no judgment was ever sounder. It was slow in operation, being little aided by invention or imagination, but sure in conclusion. He was incapable of fear, meeting personal dangers with the calmest unconcern. Perhaps the strongest fear in his character was prudence, never acting until every circumstance, every consideration, was maturely weighed; refraining if he saw a doubt; but when once decided, going through with his purpose, whatever obstacles opposed. His integrity was the most pure, his justice the most inflexible I have ever known; no motives of interest or consanguinity, friendship or hatred, being able to bias his decision. He was indeed, in every sense of the word, a wise, a good, and a great man." Posterity has confirmed this unprejudiced judgment, and so long as uprightiness of character and genuine patriotism are held in esteem among men, the name of Washington will be venerated.

OCCASIONAL LEAVES FROM OLD BOOKS.

WHAT with black letter, quaint spelling, and odd wording, most old books are beyond the reach of the ordinary reading class, even when their expense and rarity are not such as to exclude from them all who have not access to great national libraries. And yet there is much in old black-letter books which is indeed well worthy of being remembered. Those who have travelled over the whole or a part of a course could tell us of many more curiosities of literature than even Mr. Dibsdie ever has recorded. We purpose, then, to perform this journey occasionally with our readers, and to introduce them to the lore which is locked up in dark places.

One of the favourite fables in which old writers clothed their ideas was romance, which Bishop Percy attributes, with Mallev, to the ancient Scythians, who believed in the existence of giants and dwarfs, entertained opinions not unlike the more modern notions of fairies, were strongly possessed with the belief of spells and enchantments, and were fond of inventing combats with dragons and monsters. It, however, cannot be accepted here as a correct authority; for Eastern literature teems with fiction, and Solomon, by wisdom olden-ent, was long before enthroned sovereign of the gent and lord of the tall man.

Among the most applauded productions of the middle ages was the "Cesà Roma, comm." It was a kind of book of fables, written by the monks. It is compiled from old Latin chronicles of Roma, or, as Watt and Donce say, of German invention. It is made up of oriental, legendary, and classical fables, and many a great author has taken his plot from it. Gower, Chaucer, Lydgate and Ovidio, owed much to it. It is said to have been written by one Petrus Berchovans; but all the learned disputes on the subject have failed in proving anything authentic on this point.

It is interesting to know that out of this book Shakspeare took the plot of his "King Lear," and of the "Merchant of Venice," and Schiller of his "Friedrich." The peculiar style and manner of the work may be gathered by a few extracts.

OF HONOURING TALENTS.

In the reign of the emperor Dorothea, and ere was pessed the children should support their parents. There was at that time, in the kingdom, a certain soldier, who had espoused a very fair and virtuous woman, by whom he had a son. It happened that the soldier went upon a journey, was made prisoner, and very rigidly confined. Immediately he wrote to his wife and son for ransom. The intelligence communicated great uneasiness to the former, who wept so bitterly that she became blind. When the son said to his mother: "I will hasten to my father, and release him from prison." The mother answered: "Thou shalt not go, for thou art my only son, even the hold of my soul, and it may happen to thee as it has done to him. Hast thou rather ransom thy absent parent than protect her who is with thee, and preser thee to her affectionate arms? Is not the possession of one thing better than the expectation of two? Thou art my son as well as thy father's, and I am present while he is absent. I conclude, therefore, that you ought by no means to forsake me, though to redeem your father." The son very properly answered: "Although I am thy son, yet he is my father. He is abroad and surrounded by the merciless; but thou art at home, protected and cherished by loving friends. He is a captive, but thou art free—blind, indeed—but he perhaps sees not the light of heaven, and pours forth unheeded groans in the gloom of a loathsome dungeon, oppressed with chains, with wounds and misery. Therefore it is my determination to go to him and redeem him." The soldier saw and every one applauded and honoured him for the indefatigable industry with which he achieved his father's liberation.

It will be seen that these tales are sufficiently simple, and very much in the style of fables. The following is another specimen of a more complete character. It has been worked out in more than one modern novel.

THE KING'S SON-IN-LAW.

In the reign of the emperor Conrad, there lived a certain count, called Leopold, who, for some cause fearing the indignation of his master, fled with his wife into the woods, and concealed himself in a miserable hovel. By chance the emperor hunted there, and being carried away by the heat of the chase, lost himself in the woods and was benighted. Wandering about in various directions, he came at length to the cottage where the count dwelt, and requested shelter. His hostess prepared him a meal, and the same night was born unto her a son. While the emperor slept, a voice broke upon his ear, which seemed to say, "Take, take, take." He immediately arose, and, with considerable alarm, said to himself, "What can that voice mean, 'Take, take, take?' What can I take?" He reflected on the singularity of this for a short space and then fell asleep. But a second time the voice addressed him, saying out, "Restore, restore, restore!" He awoke in very great sorrow. "What is all this?" thought he. "First I was to 'Take, take, take;' and there is nothing for me to take. True, now, the same voice exclaimed, 'Restore, restore, restore;' and what can I restore, when I have taken nothing?" Unable to explain the mystery, he again slept; and the third time the voice spoke. "Fly, fly, fly!" it said; "for a child is born who shall same part of the world. It is rather smaller than the zebra; the fore part of its body is of a brownish colour, banded with white; the hinder quarters paler, or grayish, with very indistinct stripes and spots; down the back runs a black line, bordered on each side with white; the belly, legs, and tail are whitish. This, which is called the Quagga (Equus quagga), appears to be the most docile other sojourners in the wilderness, some of the natives of South Africa regarding that of the quagga as preferable to any other. The Rev. Henry Methuen states that quagga-steaks are exceedingly good, although the appearance of the meat—which is coarse and marbled with yellow fat—is rather against it.

In confinement, the zebra has frequently produced mules both of the zebra-like animals of South Africa; it is said to be occasionally broken-in and employed as a beast of draught in the Cape colony. Like the zebras, however, it is very courageous in defending itself from its enemies, fighting boldly with feet and teeth, and even sometimes compelling the hyena to beat a retreat.

The flesh of all these animals is frequently eaten by hunters and with the horse and the ass; but these, although still presenting distinct traces of stripes, are by no means so elegant in appearance as their African parent. They appear, however, to be more docile in their nature; and some of our readers will no doubt recollect a mule of this description which used, a few years ago, to be driven as the carrier of the Zoological Society's tandem.

ALLINGTON CASTLE.

This venerable ruin is romantically situated on the west bank of the river Medway, at the distance of a mile from the town of Maidstone. It is of great antiquity, a castle having occupied its site so early as the Anglo-Saxon era; but this edifice, called Medway Castle, was razed to the ground by the Danes, in one of their incursions into this part of the country. The estate was possessed subsequently by and from this family both the castle and the parish received their name.

In the beginning of the reign of Henry III., when, as appears by the Tower records, there was an exact survey taken of all the castles in England, and a return made of the names of the proprietors or governors, one Columbaris was found in possession of the castle

ALLINGTON CASTLE.

Uthoth, fourth son of Godwin, the powerful Earl of Kent; and after the Norman Conquest, became part of the domain of Odo, Bishop of Bayeux. On the disgrace of that prelate, it was transferred by the Conqueror to his kinsman, the Earl of Warren, who rebuilt the castle, and from whose possession it passed into that of Lord Fitzburghes. By the union of the daughter and heiress of that nobleman with Sir Giles Allington it came more changed owners and lord of the manor annexed to it; but in the latter part of that reign it came into the possession of Sir Stephen Penchester, who is supposed to have acquired it by purchase from one Osbert. It is probable that about this time it had very much fallen into decay, or else that it was merely a small building, not considerable enough to be termed a castle; for the Patent Rolls show that Penchester, who was then Constable of Dover Castle and Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, received the royal licence, in the eighth year of the reign of Edward I., to erect a castle there, and to fortify and embattle it. Sir Stephen dying without male issue, it became, by marriage with one of his daughters, the property of Stephen Cobham, in whose family it remained for several generations. In the beginning of the reign of Edward IV., we find the estate in the possession of the Brent family, by whom it was sold to Sir Henry Wyatt, who had been privy-counsellor to Edward IV., but afterwards attached himself to the rising fortunes of Henry Tudor, for which he was imprisoned in the Tower by Richard III., and treated with great severity. He owed his liberation, and perhaps his life, to the issue of the battle of Bosworth; and being plied by Henry VII. in a situation of trust and emolument, was soon enabled to purchase Allington, of which he received possession in 1493.

His son, Sir Thomas Wyatt, a literary character of some celebrity, was born in this castle in the year 1503, and received his education in St. John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated at seventeen years of age. He appears to have married within a year or two afterwards, the object of his choice being a daughter of Lord Cobham. Introduced at court by his father, he was appointed a gentleman of the royal bedchamber, received the honour of knighthood, and was afterwards nominated sheriff of Kent. He was a man of handsome person and fascinating manners, an accomplished courtier and a profound politician, a skilled musician and a poet, besides speaking French, Italian, and Spanish with fluency, and being an adept in all the sports and exercises then in vogue. These qualifications rendered him a great favourite with Henry, who sent him on an embassy to the court of Charles V., and to his diplomacy is ascribed the unfavourable reception which that monarch accorded Cardinal Pole.

His father dying in 1518, he solicited his recall, in order to attend to his affairs, and in the following year, took up his abode at Allington Castle, which he put in a state of complete repair, and re-decorated in a very magnificent manner. Though much of his life was passed amid the intrigues and intrigues of courts, he seems to have seized with delight every opportunity of retiring to Allington, that he might indulge in study and contemplation, moratise on the felicities of retirement, and attack the vanities and vices of a court with the honest indignation of an independent philosopher, and the freedom and pleasantry of Horace. His retirement was soon disturbed by a summons from the king to join the Emperor of Germany at Blois, and attend him in his progress through France and Flanders. On his return to England, he was arrested on charges preferred against him some time before by Bishop Bonner, but was acquitted, and received from the king a grant of land in Lambeth, and the post of High Steward of the Royal Manor of Maidstone.

This narrow escape, however, seems to have warned him of the prudence of withdrawing from public life; for though Henry appeared convinced of his loyalty, he knew that he had lost favour with him by advocating the policy of supporting the Protestant princes of the Empire, and that Cromwell's fall, which he saw approaching, would probably involve his own. He therefore passed the remainder of his days at Allington, where, as he informs us in a poetical epistle to one of his friends, he used to hunt and hawk when the season permitted, shoot with the bow in the depth of winter, and when the weather debarr'd him from these sports, read in his study or compose verses. His poems may be divided into two classes—amatory and satirical; of the former, the most polished is the one beginning, "Blame not my lute;" his satires are chiefly remarkable as containing the original, or at any rate the earliest, English version of the "Town and Country Mice." From this peaceful retirement he was called to attend the king, and in his eagerness to display his loyalty and zeal, he over-heated himself in the journey, and was seized with a fever, which terminated his existence.

His only son, commonly called Sir Thomas Wyatt the younger, distinguished him from the father, was a wild and reckless young man, who was imprisoned for breaking the windows of the citizens of London with stones shot from a crossbow at night, in which disreputable frolic he was assisted by the Earl of Surrey; and seduced the daughter of Sir Edward Darnall, though he had been married, when only sixteen years of age, to the daughter of Sir William Hawke. He alienated the estate of Tarrant in Dorsetshire, in favour of the offspring of this illicit connexion, soon after his succession to the property. After his release from the Tower, he raised a body of men at his own expense, and distinguished himself at the siege of Lambrook. This led to an appointment as Surrey, then Governor of Boulogne, which he held until the place was given up to the French in 1559. During the latter part of the reign of Edward VI. he lived chiefly at Allington, occupied with the sports of the field; but when the Duke of Suffolk raised his insurrection against Queen Mary, he was induced to take the command of the Kentish rebels, with whom he gained some considerable advantages over the loyalists. Advancing on the metropolis, he failed in an attempt to surprise the city, and was taken prisoner. His course forsook him on being confined in the Tower, and he made a confession, implicating Elizabeth and several of his friends. He was tried and convicted, and executed on Tower-hill, on the 11th of April, 1554; by which the castle and manor of Allington, with the advowson of the church, became forfeited to the crown.

Queen Elizabeth in the eleventh year of her reign, gave a lease of the estate to John Astley, master of the jewel-office; and on his death granted it in tail to his son and heir, Sir John Astley, to hold by knight's service, at the rental of £100 2s. 7d. per year. Dying in 1639, he bequeathed the manor and castle of Allington, with other estates in the neighbourhood, to his kinsman, Sir Jacob Astley, who distinguished himself by his courage and military skill in the early part of the civil war between Charles I. and the Parliament, for which services he was created by that monarch Baron Astley of Reading, in Berkshire. He died in 1651, and the title became extinct on the death of his grandson, the third baron, in 1688; but the castle, manor, and advowson devolved to Sir Jacob Astley, of Abington, who was descended from Thomas, the elder brother of the first Baron Astley. In 1720 they were sold by Sir Jacob, with other estates in Kent, to Sir Robert Marsham, father of the first Lord Romney, in the possession of whose family they long remained.

Allington Castle consists of two courts, one within the other, the outer being surrounded by a moat, and there are still some indications of the magnificence it boasted in the time of Sir Thomas Wyatt. Grose, in his "Antiquities of England," states that in 1760, when the view in that work was taken, the castle was in a very dilapidated condition, and the towers used as out-buildings to a farmhouse, which Hasted, the historian of Kent, supposes to have been built with the ruins of the mansion erected in the vicinity of the castle by Sir Henry Wyatt. There was formerly a park adjoining to the castle, but it was disparked soon after the attainder of Sir Henry, by which the estate became forfeited to the crown. Seventeen or eighteen years ago the old buildings underwent considerable repairs, and they are still used as farm-offices, one of the courts being used as a straw-yard for cattle.

PEERS AND M.P.'S.

NEXT in importance in oratory, far superior to Disraeli, is Balmington Macaulay. Like Disraeli, Macaulay is also an exception to one general system, which is always and essentially aristocratic. Nature has not been bountiful to Macaulay. She never intended him for an orator; there is little of form or comeliness in him. He is short and thick; seemingly more like an alderman than the beau ideal of an Edinburgh reviewer. His speeches are like Burke's, splendid essays, and will be read for many a coming age. They are thoroughly prepared, and display the utmost polish and research. They are listened to with delight, but fail in their effect. Macaulay's voice is harsh and bad, and his delivery is exceedingly rapid. He plunges at once into his subject, and never stops till his speech is done and he has no more to say. His speeches depend for their popularity solely upon their merits—upon the splendour of their language—the correctness of their argumentation—the variety of the historical illustrations with which they abound. They owe nothing to manner, in which Macaulay is remarkably deficient. Yet he has spoken to some purpose. His speeches have helped him to fame and to power; and when it is known that he is to speak, the house is crowded in every part; and the lobbies and the smoking-room are deserted for a time. He speaks but seldom now. Sickness, long-continued, has told upon his throne, and has given him the appearance of premature old age. Yet his voice is still as potent as it has ever been. And when he rises, immediately behind the Treasury benches, and addresses the house, you see by the expression of the faces of the occupants of those benches, that ministers deem that in the member for Edinburgh they have still a tower of strength. In the very last session, Macaulay did what is very rare—he decided the fate of a nation by his speech. It was generally thought that the majority for government, on the debate as to the Master of the Rolls retaining his seat in that house, was obtained solely by the brilliant speech of Macaulay; at any rate, that the majority was so huge, is attributable to him. This is a rare fact in oratory. It is set on a speaker in the British Senate attempt to convince any one, or succeed in the attempt. Of the great orators of the men who make speeches—posteriority will care to read Macaulay as the best in the house; and we much question whether his voice will be heard much longer within its walls.

Descending to a lower scale of oratory, we come to Richard Cobden, the quondam hero of the Anti-corn-law League, and now the apostle of Peace. Cobden's appearance is anything but aristocratic. He is a man of middle size and middle age, with a considerable amount of shrewdness in his face, but, in fact externally, by no means a formidable foe. He is the direct antipodes of Babbington Macaulay. Cobden makes no show of learning, or of erudition—quite the reverse. His is that eloquence which Sir Robert Peel happily styled as unadorned. Its characteristics are appropriateness and clearness. When Cobden rises, there is generally some indiscretion exhibited; he hums and haws occasionally—he frequently repeats himself. But as he proceeds, his manner becomes firmer and his voice louder. No man in the house goes more directly to the subject. If there be a point, he hits it at once. If there be a difficulty, he grapples with it immediately. His speech is an animated conversation; he seems to hold you by some invisible button—to meet the difficulties as they rise in your mind, and to quell them at once. So admirable is his power in this respect, that we remember well in the infancy of the League, when free-trade was not so popular as it is now, Cobden went down to an agricultural constituency, right in the very heart of the enemy's camp—and so delighted all, that we were told by a farmer present, that if he had held up a white sheet of paper before the audience, and asserted it to be black, and asked them to do the same, they would have done so at once. Cobden is a remarkable illustration of the fairness of the House of Commons. When he first entered there, there was great prejudice against him. He was considered an agitator and a demagogue; but now, no man is listened to with more attention and respect. The truth is, the house is a good judge of character, and will always honour a sincere man who makes a good business speech in a business-like way, and Cobden never attempts anything more. He is pre-eminently a practical debater, and is precisely the man for the House of Commons. Next to business-like speakers, the house affects gentled joking; hence it is, Tom Duneabe and Lord Palmerston are such favourites. If now it is, Henry Drummond and even Colonel Sibthorpe gain so readily the ear of the house. The house cares little for declamation—it would rather be without it; it considers it a waste of time. Figures of arithmetic are far more popular there than figures of speech. The latter are for schoolboys and youth in it to us—the former are for men. Business is one thing, and rhetoric another. Dr. Smith began his career as a rhetorician and failed. He wisely altered his plans. He learnt to keep accounts—to talk prose—to understand business; and he has been already Chancellor of the Exchequer, and for all that we wish he were to us again.

Our notice of parliamentary oratory as it is, would be incomplete were it not to add the name of Bright. Herbert told his maids of the northern and domestic that who could charm and the farmers at the level of all, and told him, that were it not for the campaign, he would have been a soldier like himself. To this class of men, Bright does a noble service. If he had not been a Quaker, and Lord Bunsick told him, he would have been a prize fighter, a more pugilist than does not exist in the house. It may always be said of him, that

Like Cobden, he is one of those men who have made their name, not only with a fair amount of eloquence, but with a more confident bearing than the meanest of the Royal Academy. It is strange that there should be any admiration of Cobden's oratory to possess. There is not so much of the "man of matter" in it, as one would naturally be inclined to think, but his ideas are harder, and more antagonistic to those of Cobden's. Bright is a much more powerful man; when he speaks he is contented all over with fury, to find all opposition, to tear everything that stands in his way to shreds and tatters. Enter the house, and he is a perfect Greek, distinguished as a Quaker, a Quaker teacher, a Quaker preacher, and a Quaker Christian, despised by the fine country gentlemen who sit round

“Let learning, laws, and commerce die,
That give us back our old nobility!”

Bright has now come to be one of the most powerful men in the house. His speech last session, on the India Bill, raised his character considerably in universal estimation. They displayed in a most favourable light his knowledge, his industry, and his talent. They lifted him out of the character of a class advocate into that of a statesman; and, perhaps, were the most powerful political delivery that session. Men speak of Bright very differently to what they did— and whatever may be men's opinions as to his politics, all now admit that he is one of the most powerful and readiest debaters in the house.

Going late into the house, William John Lubbock—the Newnham wayward-boy of the League, the Publicist of the De parish—but, however, maintained the reputation which his brilliant oratorical powers had won for him before he was returned M.P. For Oldham. Joseph Home, the oldest member of the house, and apparently the youngest man in it, never was an orator, and never will be; yet no man speaks more often, and, on the whole, no man is better heard. Mr. Edward Miall has won a position out of doors as an orator, but he has not done much in it. Such men as Sir J. Parkington, Fitzroy Kelly, Sir Benjamin Hall, Lord Dunsford, Stuart, are useful, able men; ready debaters, fluent on their legs; but they are not the men whose words live after them, or whose speeches our children's children will care to read.

Our task is at length complete. We have exhausted our subject. Our country has been styled—and, therefore, have we gone back to the first rude beginnings of what we have now come so completely to understand and admire. At times there is a danger of underrating the service done to us by our Peers and M.P.'s. Familiarity breeds contempt, and at times we are near losing our hereditary reverence for representative institutions. In the easy, bounding way into which the house gets, after sitting a few months, it is difficult to see anything heroic. It is not easy to remember what Parliament has done, or to realise what, in an emergency, it may yet do. Smith speaking to empty benches; Fitzmaurice fast asleep in the gallery; Vesight talking small beer in the Lobby, do not give the stranger a high idea of representative wisdom; and, after all, it is true that the house can never be what it has been. Time works wonders. There is a destiny that shapes our ends. In the past, of what can be displayed, has the house been the theatre. No future can ever rival that. So long as England remains great, all the melancholy vision of Macaulay be realised, and the traveller from New Zealand shall stand on the broken arches of Westminster Bridge and view the hoary ruins of St. Paul's, and beneath the power of Parliament must be paramount in our midst. As the source of legislation, as the great motive power of government, as the moral court of appeal, it must ever live; but pure work is less to do now; the wall of partition has been talon away. The moral momentum is fainter. Men have become more practical and less passionate. Outside the house, politics and religion are now but the direction which high water carries the vessel on its way, and we shall never see a political or religious controversy plunging the country into a moral or a political chaos. The blind, bright beam of the sun, that should be seen and felt, is dimming; the political and religious world is being drifted from our midst. Side by side with our land, there is a world where we form the twentieth part of the weight, and in the more sensitive view.

FELIX MANBY.

"Come on! come on, all!" cried a merry-looking boy in the playground of a suburban academy. "A basket and a letter for Felix Manby! Here, Felix! here is a letter from your aunt, and a basket of beautiful fruit."

Felix came running up, his countenance radiant with delight, and opening the letter, began to read:—"My dear Felix,"—

"Manby is well-named," said one of his schoolfellows, who had a happy facility in quoting passages from the Latin authors, and a knack of punning upon them. "Felix is a name of good omen; and the appellation shows that the old lady is pleased with him, and for that reason sends him this basket of fruit. Felix qui potuit r'eam cognoscere r'ausus."

"Silence, Charley!" cried another boy. "Let us hear the letter."

"My dear Felix," resumed the happy recipient of the billet and vine-leaves which covered the fruit, and began to dispense his favours. He felt himself a king for the moment, and consulted his preferences and indulged his caprices in regal style. To one he gave a delicious peach, to another a juicy pear, to the punning Latinist a fine bunch of grapes, accompanying each gift with some observation, sometimes joenkar, sometimes sarcastic. All were so intent upon obtaining a portion of the contents of the basket that no notice was taken of his caprices; and when he threw a bunch of grapes in Charley's face, the young pedant quietly wiped his face, murmuring, as he ate the grapes, a quotation from Horace: "Impavidum ferient ruina." Even the applause with which the rule act was greeted by his thoughtless playmates pleased him, and he continued the distribution of the fruit, each gift eliciting renewed flatteries.

"Docili!" said Charley, stretching forth his hands, when the present which accompanied it, "I am happy to apprise you that Mr. Westwood's report of your conduct and progress has given me so much pleasure, that I have sent you a basket of fruit to mark my sense of your endeavours. Continue to merit the same encouragements, and I will continue the same encouragements."

"Bravo!" cried his schoolfellows. "See what a basket of encouragements! Look at the peaches and the pears, the plums and the grapes! You can spare some, Felix; be a good fellow, and divide them."

And the joyous troop of boys surrounded the happy owner of the fruit, shouting in the exuberance of their glee, clapping their hands, and plying him with cajoleries. The vanity of Felix was gratified by the temporary importance which the possession of such a basket of fruit invested him with in the eyes of his fellow-pupils, and waving them from him with an air of majesty, he removed the

he had eaten the grapes; and when Felix responded to his appeal by throwing a pear, which struck him on the breast, he replied, in the sublime words of the wife of Paris, "Puto, non dolet!"

It was only when the basket was nearly empty that the sudden popularity of Felix Manby began to diminish. Then, murmurs against his partiality rose among those who had been less favoured than others; and those who had shared most largely the contents of the basket, but who conceived themselves injured by the humours which he had allowed himself, declared that his impertinence was insufferable. Charley kicked over the empty basket, repeating solemnly, "Felix coronat opus."

Felix was thus made to expiate his vanity and presumption. Each insult that he received was only a retaliation. "The sugar with which we sweeten injuries leaves a bitter taste in the mouth," says a Chinese proverb; and these humiliating taught the boy—though the lesson was a rude one—that there is a difference between prodigality and true generosity. But the first feeling which they produced was only resentment at what he regarded as the ingratitude of his schoolfellows, whom he reproached in no measured terms; his anger, however, produced only a laugh, and Charley chanted the first line of the Iliad, which alludes to the wrath of Achilles, to the air of “Rule Britannia.”

About a week after this incident, just as the boys had commenced their sports in the playground, another basket and another letter were brought, both addressed, as before, to Felix Manby. The boys gathered round him, and with an air of anticipated triumph, he broke the seal, and read as follows:—

“The basket of fruit which I now send was intended for you; but as I was about to send it off, I received a note of complaint from Mr. Westwood, who is dissatisfied with your late behaviour.

Latin pleasantry, “Felix is, like the Tityrus of Virgil, incubans sub tegmine fagi.”

When, however, all the rest had retired, each with his portion of fruit, regarding Felix as they passed him with a look of indifference or of mockery, Charley remained on the spot. He slowly approached the mortified and humiliated boy, and placed his hand upon his shoulder.

“Come,” said he, in a low voice, “hear what Ovid says.”

“Ah, would you mock me?” cried Felix, angrily.

“No,” replied the Latinist; “but I would have you be a philosopher. So long as your good aunt called you her dear Felix, and sent you fruit, you were courted; when she cooled towards you, and sent you nothing, you were abandoned; it is the way of the world, my dear fellow, and proves the truth of those beautiful lines

FELIX IN ADVERSITY.

In consequence of this communication, I desire that the fruit may be divided among your schoolfellows, without including you in the distribution.”

Felix turned pale and red alternately, and the billet dropped from his hands; but the announcement was received by his schoolfellows with gleeful shouts and clapping of hands. The basket was opened, and two stewards were elected by universal suffrage, who were charged with the duty of making an equitable distribution of its contents. Some of the more generous of the boys turned with a look of compassion towards Felix, who was seated on a bench, with his back to them, shedding tears of mortification, and proposed that he should be included in the division; but the majority appealed to the letter, insisting that the injunction to exclude him was positive, and ought to be adhered to. The stewards had no alternative but to abide by this decision, and carry out the lesson which Manby's aunt was anxious that he should receive.

“Tempo, a si fuerint nubila, solus eris.”

Felix shrugged his shoulders.

“Don't bring your Latin puns to me,” said he, sullenly.

“Perhaps you would like this better,” returned Charley, offering him a part of his own share of the fruit, which Felix accepted with a bad grace. “Eat it, and profit by the lesson. In this world, Manby, it is necessary to use our prosperity so as to retain the friendship which we may need in adversity. He who would meet kindness and forbearance, must show them towards others. Par pari est cur, says Phaedrus. There is a delicacy in giving which enhances the value of the gift, and there is a manner which deprives it of half its worth, and obliterates the sentiment of gratitude.”

This lesson was not lost upon Felix, and his future conduct, shaped by his remembrance of it, brought him a degree of real happiness which proved the appropriateness of his name, as his punning friend had pointed out.

RUSSIAN FORTS IN CIRCASSIA.

The progress and aggression of Russia have never been displayed in more marked colour than in the attempts made by that power to subdue the brave tribes of the Caucasus; those hard mountaineers, who, with their chief, Schamyl, have been habitually herds of horses all year, and who now, from peculiar circumstances, have come so prominently before us. The efforts of Russia to extend her territory have been for half a century incessant. She has gone on working her way, despite mountains, hills, rivers, and valleys, and yet has been enabled on her onward course, close to the frontiers of Persia, to the unending energy and courage of the Circassian tribes. Of late years, however, she was beginning to make much more impetus, and the possession of fortified towns and forts, in the possession of Russian troops, seemed to ensure the ultimate conquest of the country.

The native general, who seldom has kept the forces of the Czar at bay, did so by the exercise of the virtues of patience and self-denial. He never lost hope in the future destinies of his country, and even appeared to prefer death in battle to submission to the dead level of Muscovite civilisation, to the rule of "that good man the emperor," as the Rev. John Overton Charles calls him. Schamyl has, during the long contest of years past, proved himself a general and a statesman. Dr. Frederick Wagner says:

"The organisation of the Circassian army is a masterpiece of neatly-meditated precision, for it is constituted in a way calculated and designed to render possible the utmost strictness of discipline, without damping the natural warlike feelings of his subjects. Every unit keeps 300 horsemen at the disposition of the chief, and the conscription is so conducted that out of every ten families one horseman is drawn, and that family is free during life from all taxes, while the other nine have to furnish his outfit and sustenance. This is the standing army."

Schamyl has taken a lesson from the customs of other nations besides his own: "In his military arrangements he has so far imitated the Russians as to institute orders, marks of honour, and distinctions of rank. The leaders of a hundred men who signalise themselves in action, receive round silver medals, bearing appropriate poetical inscriptions; the leaders of three hundred men receive three-cornered medals; and those of five hundred, silver epauletts. Before 1842, sabres of honour, to be worn on the right side, were the only marks of distinction distributed. Now the leaders of a thousand men receive the rank of captain, and those of a larger number are generals.

It is this general and this people the Russians have sought to subdue, and to effect this purpose the more effectually, they have erected forts at different places. These forts are very interesting features in the scenery of the war, and we proceed to notice some of them.

Gezi was one fort. It stood at the entrance of a vast gorge, down which came rushing a mountain-stream, and from the peculiarity of its position it was the most healthy of all the Russian forts. The hills, which fall away into a steep slope down to the sea, are at the bottom clothed with magnificent foliage, here and there broken into wide, open, grassy spaces, which give the whole a park-like appearance; and there, says a British officer, writing in May, "are now decked in all the beauty of spring." Half-way up the mountains the trees were more bare, and a short distance above that they had no foliage at all. The following picturesque description of the scene is worthy of preservation. "We see promise in such narratives of a deeply interesting series of books, likely to extend our geographical knowledge when the war is over. "Then the scene changes from elm or oak to pine and larch, which at first runs up with a mixture of other foliage, and lights up the other trees beautifully, and afterwards in a thick black tinge have all the top to them eyes. Mountains such as these occupy either side of the gorge, their tops a mixture of black pine and snow. Toward beyond, in the centre of the whole view, are three peaks of unbroken and perpetual snow; the whole is a glorious combination of summer and winter, beauty and grandeur. The fort is a square, with bastions at the angles, and there is a black house at some distance from it up the valley, to command the passage."

Near this is the town of Pafuri, and the coast of Imzerilla, a country inhabited by Christians of the Greek church, favourable to Russia. The chief is bought at the price of 25,000 dollars, paid annually. "Some people," says a recent traveller, "the more that local scenery influences the minds of those who dwell amidst it. These people, then, should be the noblest on the face of the earth. The mountains have retired from the water's edge, and between them and the sea is a plain some mile across, upon which the trees and verdure are luxuriantly beautiful. Snake arises here and there, as if agriculturalists were at work; and distant houses of wood are bathed in the brightest sunlight. This is summer; winter approaches half way up the mountains, its boundary again marked by firs and pines and steady snow-patches in the ravines; again there is a splendid black forest of firs, many miles in length, along the mountains; above this, first-tops are seen struggling through the snow; above is winter, indeed, in all its dreariness and fieriness. The immense quantity of snow is perfectly dazzling. It lies in one thick, unbroken mass, extending high up into the heavens, except where abrupt precipices and rocks will not allow it to remain in their perpendicular surfaces; and peak upon peak, as fantastic as the most insane artist could desire, follow in rapid succession. A Russian monastery was seen enloured in trees, one monk alone had taken up his quarters there, as it had not been finished. It is now deserted. The circular green top, crowned by a gold cross, has a pretty effect."

Advancing towards Suchum-Kaleh, there is a fine view of snow and rock. The former, on the far-off mountains, appears to come down to the very base; but though ice and snow can be seen on all sides, the weather below is very hot. The scene is very picturesque. The snow-piles and drifts are partially lit up by the sun; elsewhere they are concealed by clouds. It is very difficult at times to define the limits of sky and hill, for they seem to melt into one another. One giant peak of porphyry, with a vast mass of perpendicular towards the sea, towers over the glaciers and snow-filled valleys.

A bay, of handsome proportions, forms the entrance to Suchum-Kaleh. In a part of it there are seventy fathoms of water. The place is very beautiful. Passing voyagers can smell the odours of delicious flowers wafted from the shore. Here the Russians and the Georgians lived together on terms of the greatest amity. It is a very populous district. Houses, homesteads, farms, are scattered all around. It has a red-hot shot battery on one flank, and the old Genoese castle on the other. This is surrounded by a strong wall, of great thickness and extent. Between these is a long street, with shops and houses of wood and stone. A spacious road leads to the country. It has walls on either side covered with trees, and behind them are cottages covered with roses and jessamine. There are botanical gardens in this place with whole hedges of roses. The place altogether seems to have been one which the Russians must have left with regret.

Beyond Suchum-Kaleh are the highest peaks of the Caucasus, which here runs inland. The highest peak is 8,000 feet, and forms one of the most splendid snow landscapes in the world. The next post of importance is Rebut-Kaleh, which the Russians almost wholly destroyed, previously to abandoning it. A personal observer says: "The place is entirely destroyed. Nothing remains of the main part of the town, but black beams strewed around. In the centre stood isolated the some steps which formed the approach to the church. The chimneys and ovens of the houses alone mark their site, all the rest having been of wood. Apparently a handsome street had run parallel with the river; but its houses must have been very unhealthy, as both on the north and south sides stretches a marshy country, covered with brushwood and large hills. The glass of the houses was seen in fused lumps; pottery strewed the ground; and occasionally were found rats and mice, from their position burnt to death in the act of running away."

This is a picture of war rather dark and desolate in its suggestions. There are several other stations, however, which have been recently visited. There is Wilhelmowsky, occupying a beautiful position on a fertile slope, with excellent defences, beneath which the cliffs fall abruptly into the sea, with valleys between at intervals, filled by luxuriant foliage. The next little station, of Lazaroff, is picturesquely situated in the very centre of some deliberate scenery. This is not, but it is now a strange corner of the outer walls of the centre of a little level, rising up the side of a vast gorge. On each side, and to every part of the distance, a valley and dale may be seen, a level covered in tall grass and cereals behind, closing up the cones of snow and pine clad mountains. Several mountain streams, sweet and wild, near Liszouk, and in those will now be seen Turkish and Circassian trading boats. Indeed, should the Allied Powers secure the independence of Circassia, this country might easily now be opened up to civilisation and commerce. The nation has confidence in us, which, if we do not abuse, may make of it a useful ally.

The next station is Gofirinsky, and then Point Bardan. The Russians had hitherto failed in capturing, and hence, being the only Circassian outpost, it was the place where the young ladies of Circassia were started to be rightly settled in the hands of Stambul. We will, previously to making any remark on this point, quote an extract from an intelligent officers letter, to which we shall afterwards reply: "As soon as we were landed, we were surrounded by a crowd of Circassians, who immediately led me by a path from the shore, through woods, brambles, and ditches, to a large field, surrounded by woods, among which several well built dwellings showed their roofs. This was a beautiful spot, and the ground beneath us a mass of daisies and but crocuses. A Circassian made me mount his horse. Crossing a stream, I gave it up again, and prepared, with a guide, to seek one of the mountain heights. We had a heavy pull up this hill, on a narrow pathway covered with briars and brambles. On our way we met two Circassian young ladies, rather more faded, but with beautiful complexions and pleasant expression. Our Circassian friend called to them to cover their faces; we had a dragoman with us, an order which they showed the good sense by neglecting. At the top we had a most noble view, a complete panorama of rich wood, overtopped with snow; several villages were dotted among the woods and upon the mountain sides, the dwellings being all of wood. We descended by another mountain-path to the sea; here we took another stroll, and entered the wood. We had been advised not to straggle far, as the Circassians of the mountains were ignorant of our arrival, and might take us for Russians. In the wood we met with a fine-looking old gentleman, mounted and proceeding slowly; with him were two Circassian girls—the daughters, as it appeared. Not knowing what to make of us, he drew his sword, or rather long knife, and looked fierce; but on hearing us, and seeing we were unarmed, returned it again, and was quite happy when he knew us to be Englishmen." Then his daughters came forward, and shook head with us. One of the two was not above five years old, the other not more than three. They were both tall, slender, and light-looking, with large, bright, intelligent, and lively eyes. They were quite dressed in the ordinary Circassian style, but their dresses were of a different material from those of the women of the mountains.

The same interesting scene is described in the Fort and Camp by the gentleman to whom our letter was addressed. The Russians have in the wood taken up the report that the Circassians are to be sold as slaves; they, to examine them, were invited in. But a Christian would be able to buy a Circassian girl. The young ladies were the daughters of the noble wife of a Circassian baron, and as the slaves. They came with an intention to be sold out to India on northern European shores. It is regrettable that our friends, the Circassians, did not be convinced it was not an ordinary slave-trade, and we should have to look up in them, with our noble-minded friends, very properly. The other young ladies had seen the French, the English, and the other. He sometimes had these Circassian girls look forward to this, as they wished to get a good education and a fulfilment of their wishes in England, just as a young lady in London might be "drilled" and her. Our little friend with the blue eyes looked in earnestly, in confirmation of papa's words, and in the son of our party a present of shells she had just picked up, which she pointed out I would bear a fine polish. But a Circassian girl had to be at Stambul are two very different beings. At home she wanders about in plain and rough dress, only dreaming of the gold and decoration that may some day fall to her lot at Stambul. They are generally educated in Turkish young lady-like accomplishments, music, etc., and imbrill by degrees the artificial life must lead home forth. No Turk ever marries, unless he provides well for his wives with all manner of ornaments and luxury, and hence a decrease in the population which would greatly gratify Mr. Dalrymple. As the Turks of the lower orders die at Stambul, this place is mostly filled by fresh imports from Asia. A French officer told me that boats had arrived to export a freight of the same nature as the little blue-eyed girl I have told you of, a French ship would hold 200 of them. On descending the mountain we saw a number of Circassian women, sitting in the brushwood among the ships; directly we appeared they dipped among the brushwood like so many specimens of "Jack-in-the-box." I cannot account for such excessive delicacy on their part, except, perhaps, by their being the wives of some of the warriors on the beach, who perhaps were very jealous fellows.

ROYAL TOMBS IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

In walking through the old Gothic abbey of St. Peter, and surveying the tombs of departed kings and queens, the spectator cannot fail to observe the similarity which they bear to each other. There is little variety in the reliefs which ornament them, and the statues are always executed in a stiff and formal style, and held flat on their backs, with their hands either crossed over the breast or joined in prayer. Previously to the accession of the Stuarts, most of the kings and queens of England were interred in Westminster Abbey, and their tombs are useful as records of the progress made in the ornamental arts during the period between its foundation and the death of Elizabeth.

The chapel of the founder, Edward the Confessor, is full of ancient remains, of which the chief is his own tomb, nearly in the middle. The relief work, though very much degraded, is a curious monument of antiquity, but the design is superior to that of a later date in a different style. This Adel Saxons king and king was originally buried at the rock of Westminster, on the erection of the shrine by Henry III., his remains were transferred to their present resting place with much pomp and solemnity. In the same chapel, a large, noble-shaped effigy, composed of 1123 slabs of Purbeck stone, represents the remains of Edward I. who was crossed in 1774 by a granite tomb, the Society of Antiquaries. The royal effigy was found in a state of perfect preservation, clad in two robes, one of gold and silver tissue, the other of crimson velvet; each shoulder hand held a sceptre, and a royal crown glittered on the head. The corpse measured six feet two inches. The monument of his queen, Eleanor of Castile, whose conjugal virtues tradition has so pleasantly recorded, is of gray Petworth stone, covered with a table of gilt copper, on which the statue of the queen lies in the usual recumbent position. It is a creditable performance for the age, and the nobility of the original is well expressed in the sweetness of the countenance.

The lofty and somewhat imposing tomb of Henry III., is very similar in materials and style of workmanship to that of Edward the Confessor. The brass statue of the monarch, which lies upon the brazen table of the tomb, is the first specimen of casting executed in this country; both the statue and the table are richly gilded, and the table is engraved with a beautiful inscription. The king is the most interesting specimen of sculpture of the reign of a monarch of inferior merit, and is very creditable to the sculptor, that Cardinal Becket, whose remains are deposited under the effigy, also deserves to be mentioned as having been sculptured by the same hand. Henry VII. is represented in a kneeling posture, in the effigy, the queen is seated on a high throne, and is accompanied by a group of attendants. The effigy of Richard III. was not interred in Westminster, but is deposited in the choir of the abbey, the tomb being a magnificent structure, which is now almost entirely gone. A magnificent monument of Henry VIII. was erected in the same spot, which has long since been almost wholly destroyed.

All these tombs and effigies are much decayed and ornamented executed in a uniform style of stiff formality. Towards the close of the fifteenth century, a better style began to prevail, and though the statues were still laid on their backs, in rigid and ungraceful postures, an improvement is perceptible in the chiselling of the countenances, the folds of the drapery, and the ornamental accessories. The superb tomb of Henry VII., in the chapel called after that monarch, is a specimen of this improved style; it is the work of an Italian, however—Pietro Torrigiano, a fellow-student of Michael Angelo, whose nose he is said to have broken in a dispute respecting their comparative proficiency in the arts. The pedestal is of black marble, but the figures and pilasters are of gilt copper. The statues of Henry and his queen lie upon the tomb, side by side, with their hands raised in the attitude of prayer. Simplicity is the characteristic of the design, and there is an extremely natural expression in the countenances of the royal pair. The screen which surrounds the tomb is the work of English artists, upon four marble pillars, of the Corinthian order. The cost of this sumptuous monument was £965, exclusive of the materials. The design was furnished by John de Critz, who also executed the painting and gilding. The monument of Queen Mary, of Scotland, is in better taste, and the statue of the beautiful, erring, and unfortunate queen, in white marble, has an air of delicacy which creates a far more pleasing impression than the glaring splendour lavished upon the tomb of her enemy.

We cannot more appropriately conclude this notice of the royal tombs, than with the reflections of Washington Irving, in reference to his own survey of them. "What, thought I, is this vast assemblage of sepulchres, but a treasury of humiliation; a huge pile of reiterated homilies on the emptiness of renown and the certainty of oblivion? It is indeed the empire of death; his great shadowy palace, where he sits in state, mocking at the relics of human glory, and spreading dust and forgetfulness on the monuand is a most elaborate specimen of open-work founding in brass and copper in the pointed style of decoration. There is an octagonal tower at each angle, and an arched doorway, surmounted by a shield of arms, on each side. A projecting cornice and a parapet form the upper part, and on the transverse plates at the sides, between the two divisions into which the upright compartments are divided, is a long inscription to the memory of the monarch whose remains repose beneath.

The later royal monuments are not superior to this, and by some are thought scarcely equal to it. That of Queen Elizabeth exhibits a considerable deviation from the designs of the sepulchral monuments of the preceding age; but the custom of representing the deceased lying stilly on the tomb, face upward, is slavishly adhered to. An open arcade, with a richly-ornamented entablature, rises upon a large altar-tomb of marble, upon which lies the statue of the queen, painted and gilded in a style of gaudy and meretricious magnificence. Each side of the arcade is supported by a pair of marble pillars, of the Corinthian order. The cost of this sumptuous monument was £965, exclusive of the materials. The design was furnished by John de Critz, who also executed the painting and gilding. The monument of Queen Mary, of Scotland, is in better taste, and the statue of the beautiful, erring, and unfortunate queen, in white marble, has an air of delicacy which creates a far more pleasing impression than the glaring splendour lavished upon the tomb of her enemy.

We cannot more appropriately conclude this notice of the royal tombs, than with the reflections of Washington Irving, in reference to his own survey of them. "What, thought I, is this vast assemblage of sepulchres, but a treasury of humiliation; a huge pile of reiterated homilies on the emptiness of renown and the certainty of oblivion? It is indeed the empire of death; his great shadowy palace, where he sits in state, mocking at the relics of human glory, and spreading dust and forgetfulness on the monuments of princes. How idle a boast, after all, is the immortality of a name! Time is ever silently turning over his pages; we are too much engrossed by the story of the present to think of the characters and anecdotes that gave interest to the past, and each age is a volume thrown aside to be speedily forgotten. The idol of to-day pushes the hero of yesterday out of our recollection, and will in turn be supplanted by his successor of to-morrow. History fades into fable; fact becomes clouded with doubt and controversy; the inscription moulders from the tablet; the statue falls from the pedestal. Columns, arches, pyramids, what are they but heaps of sand; and their epitaphs but characters written in the dust? What is the security of a tomb or the perpetuity of an embalmment? The remains of Alexander the Great have been scattered to the wind, and his empty sarcophagus is now the mere curiosity of a museum. Thus man passes away; his name perishes from record and recollection; his history becomes as a tale that is told, and his very monument a ruin."

RAFFAELLE AND MICHAEL ANGELO.

In the gallery of the Luxembourg palace, in Paris, is the magnificent picture by Horace Vernet, here engraved, representing one of the most memorable episodes of the quarrel between those master-geniuses of their period - Raffaele and Michael Angelo Buonarrotti. The responsibility of a quarrel so much to be deplored is said to rest with those artists of inferior genius, who, jealous of the reputation of Raffaele, and the favour in which he stood with talent; and the universal esteem which he enjoyed, with the celebrity which he immediately acquired as a painter, excited the envy of the Roman artists - the gifted Buonarrotti being no exception. A rivalry sprang up between the two great painters, which increased with the fame of Raffaele. "Michael Angelo," says Lanzi, "disclaiming any secondary honours, came to the combat, as it were, attended by his shield-bearer; for he made drawings in his grand the pontiffs, Julius II. and Leo X., availed themselves of every opportunity of fanning the flame of rivalry between the two great masters into enmity.

Raffaele had already acquired considerable celebrity at Florence, when he was summoned to Rome by the first-named pope to decorate the walls and ceilings of the Vatican. Arrived in the Eternal City, his attractive person and engaging manners obtained him the favour of the most illustrious men of the day, whether in rank or style, and then gave them to F. Sebastiano, the scholar of Giorgione, to execute; and by these means he hoped that Raffaele would never be able to rival his productions either in design or colour. Raffaele stood alone; but aimed at producing works with a degree of perfection beyond the united efforts of Michael Angelo and Sebastiano del Piombo, combining in himself a fertile imagination, ideal beauty founded on a correct imitation of the Greek style, grace, ease, amenity, and a universality of genius in every department of the art. The noble determination of triumphing in such a powerful contest animated him night and day, and allowed him no respite. It also excited him to surpass both his rivals and himself in every new work. The subjects, too, chosen for these chambers, aided him, as they were in a great measure new, or required to be treated in a novel manner. They did not profess to represent bacchanalian or vulgar scenes, but the exalted symbols of science; the sacred functions of religion; military actions, which contributed to establish the peace of the world; important events of former days, under which were typified the reigns of the pontiffs Julius and Leo X.; the latter the most powerful protector, and one of the most accomplished judges of art. More favourable circumstances could not have transpired to stimulate a noble mind."

The excellence of Michael Angelo, as a painter, is chiefly in vigour of design; in composition and colouring he was far surpassed by his rival. It occurred to him, as Lanzi has stated, that if he supplied the design, and Sebastian del Piombo executed the picture, Raffaello would be unable to compete with them. In this manner was produced, in fresco, a "Transfiguration," in the chapel of St. Peter in Montorio. Raffaello, being subsequently employed to paint a picture for Cardinal Giulio de' Medici, afterwards Clement VII., in his accustomed spirit of emulation, chose the same subject. "This is a picture," says Mengs, "which combines more excellence than any of the previous works of Raffaello. The expression in it is more exalted and more refined, the chiaroscuro more correct, the perspective better understood, the pencilling finer; and there is a greater variety in the drapery, more grace in the heads, and more grandeur in the style." The heads are considered the most perfect he ever painted, and the colouring is extolled as eminently beautiful.

Sebastian del Piombo, being engaged by the cardinal to paint a companion-picture to that of Raffaello at the same time, chose for his subject the "Raising of Lazarus," the design of which was made for him by Michael Angelo. The two pictures, when finished, were exhibited to the public; Sebastian produced a very fine painting,* which has been very much admired, but the palm of superiority was awarded to the magnificent picture of Raffaello. It was during this period of rivalry that the meeting took place between the rival painters, the memory of which has been preserved by Horace Vernet in the picture from which our engraving is taken. Michael Angelo was passing through a court of the Vatican, when he encountered Raffaello in the midst of a group of his pupils. "You have a suite as numerous as a general," he observed, in a tone which betrayed his envy, as he passed on. "And you," responded his rival, "go about alone, like the hangman." Buonarrotti is descending the stairs, carrying before him his portfolio and brushes, and a plaster cast and a sword; he looks back, with a glance of hatred and envy, towards his rival, whose handsome features wear an expression of calm disdain. A little apart from the group of students are several peasants, who come to serve them as models; the young woman in the centre, with a brunette complexion, downcast eyes, bare feet, and a naked child in her lap, is evidently a study for the Madonnas which the painters of Italy have produced in such numbers.

THE MEETING AT BOULOGNE.

LETTER FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

I CAN recollect nothing, since the great Field of the Cloth of Gold, to resemble the very grand affair we have had at Boulogne. My partiality for that old place as an autumn residence is well known; and as I arrived before such royal and imperial honours were decided on, I obtained lodgings at a reasonable rate. Most of those who came to see the pageant will tell a different story. Where they managed to put all the people, I really cannot say, unless they packed them on shelves. I fancied all England was coming; and what with the visits from friends, the awful cannonading and fighting, and the dust and general noise, I do not know when I shall be myself again. I had taken the trouble to go over with a friend, who is very learned in history, to the site of the old camp at

* The "Raising of Lazarus" was formerly in the collection of the Duke of Orleans; it was purchased by the late Mr. Angerstein for two thousand guineas, and is now in the National Gallery.

Boulogne, right away to Heuvault and Wimereux, where so many thousands collected to capture old England, which only three days ago I actually saw shining far away with its white cliffs in the distance. I could say something pretty about the rainbow of liberty stretching from these heights to Dover cliffs; but then, as, according to the Moniteur, the emperor said nothing of the kind, I may as well drop the metaphor.

We learnt, I assure you with some surprise, that Prince Albert was coming. I will own that I was very incredulous on the point, even until the 2nd. I walked down with my boy towards the port to see the steamer come in. The well-informed said the Guards were on board, who were to be Prince Albert's escort. Well, the steamer came in, but no guards were to be seen. This made me smile. My triumph, however, was short-lived; for in a few minutes another steamer arrived, and on board this were a small party of five Life-guardsmen and two Blues, in charge of twenty fine horses belonging to Prince Albert. There were a great many French soldiers in the crowd; and no sooner were our men on shore, saddling their horses as coolly as in the barrack-yard, than the Gauls rushed up and insisted on drinking with them. You see they knew the way to an Englishman's heart. The women of Boulogne were much struck by the English soldiers, who certainly were very fine fellows. They will be lions for the rest of their days, and will talk to thousands with pride of their visit to Boulogne and the reception they met with there.

On Sunday we were surprised by the arrival of the King of the Belgians, who, however, only stayed a few hours, leaving the same evening. Next day came the king of Portugal and his suite, so that we had nothing but saluting and powder-burning all day. Boulogne never had such a harvest. The emperor drove out wearing the grand cordon of Portugal, while the king wore the grand cordon of the Legion of Honour. It is generally believed that these two royal visits would have been much protracted, but for a question of etiquette. The emperor wished to pay almost exclusive attention to Prince Albert; but the two others being crowned heads, they would necessarily have had precedence over a king-consort, which, under the circumstances, the emperor would not allow.

Tuesday, the 5th of September, was really a glorious day. Overhead shone a bright and cloudless sky, illumined by a sun such as has done so much good to the harvest; the sea was not so placid as the waters of Leman's lake, but still was not rough. A fresh breeze braced the nerves of the masses, and all Boulogne was on foot—visitors and sight-seers to see, tradesmen and others to prepare for the golden harvest. A gay and delighted crowd, with a great preponderance of ladies, collected on the pier between seven and nine—some in straw hats, some with parasols, some with umbrellas, and not a few with telescopes. Meanwhile, in the town, busy preparations were making. Right away from the Hotel Brighton, round the railway station, all along the busy quay to the landing-place, there were flags and gaily-ornamented poles in great profusion quite a change from the usual fishy and ill-favoured appearance of Boulogne streets.

It was a little after nine when the paddle-boxes of the "Victoria and Albert" came in sight, and the excitement of the masses began to know no bounds. The English were particularly moved from their usual phlegm and equilibrium. They thought their personal honour at stake that the display should go off well. A pilot was seen to go out in the gig of the captain of the fort, and then the squadron became visible to the naked eye. They approached at a very good speed. The French by this time were down in great numbers; hitherto the pier had been almost wholly tenanted by English. When the joint flags of England and France could be distinguished on the "Black Eagle" and "Vivid," and "Victoria and Albert," the cheering was immense. A burst of cannon at the same moment announced that the emperor had started to meet the representative of the royal family of England. He came in a carriage accompanied by the British ambassador, the foreign minister, and the minister of war.

The fine new body of the "Hundred Guards," which formed the escort, excited much attention. Their uniform is rich, especially with helmet and cuirass, though in undress they look too much in the style of Souleuvre's guards. They have sky-blue frocks, gold lace: red trousers, gold stripe; cocked hat; a waist fit for a girl; and sword. They are truly a pretorian guard, and their personal devotion is secured by their pay being double that of any other troops, while they are better fed, mounted, and cared for. They are the picked men of France. For myself, I prefer the carabinieri. The other military corps who turned out were of the very best regiments.

The emperor, as usual, wore a full suit of uniform, of no particular rank, with a profusion of stars and orders, which he has collected during his eventful life. He was surrounded by a staff very much resembling that of the emperor at Austerlitz, only more brilliant, as far as gold and lace could make them so. There was a body of civilians, too, the mayor and corporation of Boulogne, some of them once warm partisans of another Louis, now no more.

His majesty had resolved to be the first at the rendezvous; and so he was. Seven minutes elapsed between his arrival at the landing and the coming up of Prince Albert—seven minutes spent in apparently very lively conversation; for the staff laughed loudly and often. But now up came the royal yacht, and the prince, with the Duke of Newcastle and Lord Seaton by his side, was recognised by the English, than whom no people are more learned in public men. A lusty English cheer, in which my Henry joined, made my head ache. It was taken up by the French, who are becoming great proficient in howling; and at twenty-three minutes past ten the vessel was moored. The emperor and prince had already raised their hats and bowed. The prince now came ashore in a quick, almost anxious, manner, and advancing, raised his hat again; the emperor did the same, and then they shook hands.

Cannon roared, "God save the Queen!" burst from French lands, the vessels in the port were all manned, the crowd grew denser every minute, ladies in splendid dresses poured down in greater numbers than ever, and England and France seemed one. All felt, as I did, doubtless, that the present war was a fine thing for the emperor. To us the alliance is politically of vast importance, but to the Queen personally it is of no moment. To Louis Napoleon it is a kind of legitimisation. It has buried the past in oblivion, and raised the character of the empire.

The same afternoon began the sight-seeing and military parading for Prince Albert. He started for the camp at Honvault about four, escorted by his seven English soldiers, whose appearance excited immense interest—quite a sensation, in fact. The general reception by the French troops was very enthusiastic. There is no denying it, the French are in their element. They are at war; and the army is, to a man, eager for the fray. If the emperor wanted volunteers, I do believe the whole army would turn out. Nothing is thought of but battles and sieges. Louis Napoleon might, just now, lop off even the semblance of a constitution he has given the people, and not any murmurs would arise. I was never so convinced of the military character of the French nation before.

The camp commences at Honvault on the plateau above Boulogne. It is a kind of mud or clay city—a long line of huts, each containing twelve men. They are pretty comfortable. The kitchens are apart, and built of stone. It presents a very curious panorama to the eye, especially when the soldiers are lounging about in easy dress. High mass is performed every Sunday; and, weather permitting, there is dancing the same evening. The English crowd up to see the fun. A café, billiard tables, and cards afford amusement to the officers, who also walk of an evening over to the town, when their manoeuvres do not require their getting out before daybreak the next morning.

The view from Honvault is striking. Away for six miles along the coast, by Wimereux and Audouville, the white tents of the soldiers can be seen. It is a very remarkable congregation of soldiery, and reminds one of the days when a similar army was collected by another Napoleon, at the same place, for quite another purpose. The change of feeling since 1818 has been immense. From my knowledge of France I must say that it has all taken place since then. Under Louis Philippe the feeling was hostile in the extreme.

A great deal has been said about a banquet, a toast proposed by Louis Napoleon, and a speech made. The words have been given in the most authoritative manner; and one writer says, "I am able to give you some details of the banquet at the Hotel Brighton." Where he got his details from I know not; but the whole is imaginary. No toast was proposed, and no speeches made. It was also said that Louis Napoleon took off his grand cordon of the Legion of Honour, and handed it to Prince Albert. This could not be, as Prince Albert has had the cordon some years already.

Wednesday was spent in military inspections, and on Thursday our beautiful yacht came in for a share of the honours. It was visited in the afternoon by the emperor, who went over it minutely and took refreshment in the splendid cabin. He much admired our tars, and certainly had a very good specimen before him, for they appeared to be about the best men in our navy for appearance. The yacht was visited by many others after the departure of the royal party.

A ball was announced in a large open place with trees, famous for festivals of the kind, called Tintelleries. It is an oblong space, railed in. The English were invited à la carte. The illuminations were good, but an unlucky shower of rain kept a great many away. English and French national airs were played at intervals all the evening, and on each occasion excited immense applause. All this is very theatrical, and a great deal of it mere lip enthusiasm, but still there is much genuine feeling at bottom. The tremendous vows of friendship made between strange Englishmen and stray Frenchmen, lasted, even in their memories, only the evening; but the alliance of the two nations will not soon be forgotten.

I know nothing of military affairs, but Henry went on horse-back to the great review, or battle, on Friday, and brought back a most enthusiastic report. It was like going to the Derby. Carriages, carts, horses, donkeys, and donkey-carts were all to be seen making for Marquise—celebrated for its legs of mutton at an early hour. This was the head-quarters of the imperial army. Louis Napoleon commanded here in person. The sanguinary invaders, who were supposed to have landed at Calais, were led by General Schramm. The affair began on Friday morning. Henry says: "Having bivouacked at Marquise, the enemy showed themselves at early dawn. The emperor's right wing extended to Holiquent; his left to Lequent. At half past seven the armies were en présence, and the roar of artillery commenced on both sides. I now began to understand what a battle was. A battery of heavy field-guns opened on Schramm. The Imperialists made a charge, supported by the whole right wing. A terrible engagement, as far as noise, dust, and confusion, made it so, now ensued, which ended in the retreat of Schramm—comme de just."

"Schramm, however, tried it again. At Inglevent he endeavoured to make up for the misfortune of the morning. A cannonading, beating everything I could have imagined, now ensued. At this moment I saw the emperor and the prince. They were gazing at the scene. The emperor's steed pawed the ground like an old war-horse, and was evidently warmed and delighted. I must say, the emperor himself joined with boyish delight in the scene, just like his uncle in the battle of Brienne. Prince Albert, too, was quite enraptured by the novel spectacle, while I never saw any set of men more excited than our guard-men. They were all in their element, which, when we add, that one had been in the Peninsula and at Waterloo, will be understood.

"Some fine cavalry charges here took place, which appeared to decide the battle, for Schramm again retreated, and retired to Cesar's camp at Wissart."

There was to have been a great deal more of all this, but in my opinion there was quite enough. The military display lasted many days longer, but Prince Albert left the same evening. The sea was now, indeed, as calm as an inland water, with a silvery moon, making night beautiful. The crowd was immense, and cheered the prince lustily. The emperor escorted him to the quay, and saw him on board, when the yacht weighed anchor and departed, sending up a magnificent display of rockets.

The military manoeuvres were to end with the capture of the city of Boulogne, but this idea was abandoned for the present. The army was to have marched up from St. Omer and besieged and captured the city. An inspection of the army took place on the 11th. The review by the Emperor when I mentioned that there was a great deal to be seen by sketching, was the most military spectacle I ever beheld in my life.

TOURING IN IRELAND IN 1854.

IN former volumes we gave numerous illustrations of Irish scenery, chiefly from the pencil, no less accurate than fanciful, of Mr. James Mahony, of Cork, a fellow-townsmen and schoolfellow of Maelise, and one whose native genius, like that of the great painter just named, has been disciplined and matured by study of the best continental masters, in Italy and elsewhere. The appearance of those sketches in our pages was the means, we believe, of attracting to the sister country a considerable number of visitors who might not otherwise have gone thither; and we are happy to think that the majority found the reality of the scenes more attractive than our description, or even Mr. Mahony's delineation, had led them to suppose. During the present year he has opened up a vast extent of new ground, richer, if possible, than what he had before depicted; and with his aid we purpose taking a rapid and cursory view of the more recent beauties he discloses. We shall begin with that delightful region of the south lying between Cork and Killarney; or rather that first and briefer portion of the route which the new line of railway between Cork and Bandon has valley, through which winds the Currabeg road, thus avoiding much of the bleak and uninteresting track of the old mail-coach road in the western environs of the city, and reaches the Waterfall Station, six miles from Cork. From this point a magnificent view of the "beautiful city" and suburbs of Cork is obtained, and the distant mountains of Dumanaway, Kerry, and Kilworth are seen to great advantage. About a mile further on we reach the antiquated ruin of Mourne Abbey, adjoining which is to be seen the ruins of a Danish fort; here the highest point of the railway is reached, and we descend through a tunnel half a mile in length, arriving at the Ballinhassig Station, ten miles from Cork. From this point omnibuses in connexion with the company ply to and from the town of Kinsale, nine miles distant. Winding along the deep valley of the Owenbeg we arrive at the Upton Station, fifteen miles from Cork. Emerging from the deep cutting at Rockfort, where a vein of silver ore was discovered during the progress of the works, we now approach the most beautiful scenic attractions along the railway, namely, the Brinny and Bandon Valleys, at which rendered accessible to travellers, instead of the old route either through Mallow, or by way of Dumanaway, Bantry, and Glengariff. Our opening sketch speaks for itself, and represents a party proceeding down the beautiful river Lee—a subject we introduce here for the purpose of acquainting the intending tourist that he may vary his trip in the district alluded to by a water excursion, which, for the brief time it takes and the small sum it costs, is probably without compare in the United Kingdom, as it presents the opportunity not only of becoming acquainted with one of the most lovely rivers in the world, but also of visiting the most attractive points of interest within Cork harbour, viz., Passage, Monkstown, Haulbowline Island, and Queenstown. The sketch represents one of those excursion parties embarking on board the steamer on arrival of the train at Cork.

Soon after leaving the Cork terminus, the train passes over the Chetwynd Viaduct, nobly raised on arches of 100 feet high, and 120 feet wide, spanning the deep glen that widens into the broad point the rivers bearing those respective names unite, close to the picturesque ruins of Dundaniel Castle. Here, indeed, the lover of the picturesque may enjoy a delightful ramble through this rugged, yet luxuriantly-planted glen, which forms part of the extensive property of the Duke of Devonshire, about one mile distant from the pretty little town of Innoshannon. Diverging from the Brinny Valley, the train enters the Bandon Valley through a tunnel 170 yards in length, and crosses the river of the same name, over a handsome bridge, constructed of timber and iron, to the Innoshannon Station, eighteen miles from Cork, and two from Bandon. The scenery from this station to Bandon is indeed charming; the railway runs parallel with the river, which is sinuous in its course, the hills on each side of the vale being high and steep, and planted to their summit with varied and stately timber, while the numerous villas and gardens with which the whole is interspersed add to the beauty of the picture. Having passed through this "happy valley," we arrive at the terminus, twenty miles distant from Cork, at the "pleasant Bandon, crowned with many a wood," as Spencer called it, one of the largest, best built, and most respectably inhabited district towns in the country. The river before alluded to flows through it, and is spanned by a bridge. It was represented for a short time, previously to the passing of the Reform Bill, by Lord John Russell. The western environs are singularly beautiful, and open to the public (Sundays excepted), and great numbers of the Cork residents avail themselves of this permission, owing to the facility afforded by the opening of the railway.

The town of Bandon possesses several large breweries and distil-hat immediate vicinity derives no small portion of its attractions from the demesne of Castle Bernard, the princely seat of the Earl of Bandon, Lord-Lieutenant of the county, and father of Viscount Bernard, member of Parliament for the borough. The conservatories, gardens, and the demesne grounds are most kindly thrown open to the public (Sundays excepted), and great numbers of the Cork residents avail themselves of this permission, owing to the facility afforded by the opening of the railway. The town of Bandon possesses several large breweries and distilleries, a newly built church, celebrated for its architectural beauty, and an excellent hotel, named after the principal proprietor of the town, his Grace the Duke of Devonshire. There are regular weekly and monthly fairs held, which are becoming very important and extensive. Here also the first movement was made towards the inroduction of the growth of flax into the south of Ireland, and there is little doubt that ere long the produce of this important article in the South will compete in honourable rivalry with the sister North, the trial crops having yielded very handsome profits.

An Act of Parliament has been obtained for extending the railway from Bandon to Bantry, with branches to Clonakilty and Skibbereen, which will materially facilitate the tourist in his movements, and open up an extent of valuable country, the mineral, fishing, and agricultural resources of which it is impossible to estimate; while at the same time little doubt exists of the line being eventually extended to the important harbour of Crookhaven, the nearest south-westerly point to the American continent, and where every probability exists of a transatlantic packet station and a depot for embarking and disembarking passengers, mails, etc. between the Old and New Worlds, in addition to the telegraph communication, being permanently established. Of this we shall give a sketch and some particulars on a future occasion.

A SINGULAR CHARACTER.

In the old cathedral city of Norwich—famed at Christmas for its splendid turkeys and tempting sausages—in those days of glorious extravagance when George III. was king, threading his way along the intricate streets with which it abounds, might be seen a figure whose oddity of appearance would at once attract the eye. Possibly a few roguish school-boys, with the want of true insight into character incident to that age, might be seen following in his wake. From them the stranger might learn that the individual before him was known by the soubriquet of Old Horn-Button Jack. With a countenance much resembling the portraits of Erasmus, with gray hair hanging about his shoulders, with his hat drawn over his eyes, and his hands behind him, as if in deep meditation, he would be sure to excite the attention of the observer; especially when we add that this little bandy-legged individual arrayed his outer man in a short green jacket, a broad hat, large shoes, and short worsted stockings; and well might the observer stare, for in John Fransham he saw no ordinary man.

Norwich has the honour of his birth, which important event took place about the year 1740. At an early age he exhibited marks of genius, and appears to have been destined for the church. Unfortunately the want of funds compelled him to relinquish that idea and betake himself to a far different occupation. At Wyndham he was apprenticed to a cooper; three weeks, however, of this drudgery sickened him of trade. He was, consequently, compelled to do something for a livelihood. Amongst other things he wrote sermons and offered them to clergymen, some of whom, struck with the singularity of the application, with the peculiarity of his appearance, and his extent of knowledge, offered him what he conceived to be the worth of his productions—more than that he would never take.

But our hero found it difficult to procure a living by his pen, and his father having urged him to betake himself to some regular employment, stating that he could not continue to find him clothing, and gently hinting that the shoemaker's bill was more than the parental exchequer could meet, Fransham found himself in a bit of a dilemma. Could he whose soul had been attuned to celestial philosophy descend from his mount of inspiration and spend his life and powers in the dull routine of mechanic trade? Most certainly not. At the same time, honest John was compelled to admit that a want of money, in this depraved world of ours, is a most serious ill. It was evident that, to live and yet gratify his literary taste, he must live more simply than he had yet done. Fransham accordingly recollected that shoes were not absolutely necessary to his existence, much less to his literary progress. After reflection, therefore, he resolved to discard from his dress both shoes and stockings. This resolution, to which he adhered for three years, was, however, productive of some inconveniences. With some other eccentricities he betrayed, it induced his father to suspect that his intellect was affected. That a young man should walk about the streets without stockings, was a phenomenon which could not be accounted for by his parent and neighbours on any other supposition. They could not place themselves in his situation. They could not imagine it possible that, merely to gratify an ardent thirst for knowledge, a youth would deviate so widely from the established attire. To walk without shoes and stockings—though the constant custom on the other side the Irish Channel—was considered insanity, and his father obtained medical advice on so delicate a subject. The doctor's advice was that he should live low and not be contradicted, to neither of which conditions did Fransham junior make any very strong opposition.

Some time after this he became clerk in an attorney's office; but law did not consort well with the pursuit of knowledge, and he gave it up. After this he put himself under the instruction of a weaver named Wright, with whom he remained two years. His instructor was a man after his own heart. Wright, Fransham used to say, was one who "could discourse well on the nature and fitness of things. He possessed a finely philosophical spirit, and a soul well purified from vulgar errors." Fransham placed his loom not only in the same room, but also in such a position that while at work they faced each other, by which means they could talk together, and thus weave a mingled yarn of philosophy and wool. The death of Wright again unsettled Fransham, and he started for Scotland, with a view to study at one or other of the universities there. He embarked for North Shields, with the intention of walking the rest of the way. Meeting, however, at Newcastle, with a regiment known as the Old Buffs, he enlisted for a soldier; but was soon discharged the service, as being too bandy-legged. Finding his pecuniary resources too much diminished to accomplish his proposed object, he walked back to Norwich, which place he at length reached, with only three half-pence and a plaid which he had bought on the way. Upon his return, he contrived to live as a tutor and writer for attorneys and authors. He then formed an intimacy with a veterinary surgeon. Fransham rode home the horses after they were shod; and, whilst the iron was heating, he and his friends used to be employed in Latin exercises and mathematical problems, worked upon a slate hung against the forge. His hatred of all cruelty to animals soon, however, excited the animosity of his companions, who took their revenge by throwing the hot horse-shoes about the shop, by which Fransham's naked feet were several times severely burnt.

About 1771 he lost a kind friend in a Mr. Clute, whose instructor he had been. This rendered his scanty income more scanty still. Finding that it was not equal to his expenditure, and reflecting that it might be less, Fransham resolved, by way of being prepared for the worst, to try with how little he could live. He therefore purchased daily a farthing's-worth of potatoes, and likewise having laid out the same amount in salt—which was then a far more costly luxury than now—he reserved one potato every day from those he purchased, as a compensation for the salt he eat with the remainder; nor would he buy any more salt till he had saved his farthing's-worth of potatoes. He thus contrived to exist for a farthing a day. That he might also be prepared for the most abject poverty, he resolved to try the effect of sleeping in the open air. A severe cold, caught in consequence, effectually prevented his repeating the experiment again. His amusements were singular; one of them was playing with cup and ball, a toy called the bilbo catch, which he learnt to use with such dexterity as to be able to catch the ball upon the small or spiked end two hundred times. As he never could get beyond this number, he was infinitely distressed. "What cause," he would ask, "can be assigned for my not being able to succeed beyond this number of times? It seems, from the almost infinite efforts which I have made, and made in vain, that this number constitutes a fixed and determinate limit, since I never can exceed it. Is there anything in the formation of my muscles which prevents the possibility of my holding the toy sufficiently steady to succeed after a certain number of times? Is there anything in the constitution of my mind that prevents me from continuing the requisite fixed attention to the subject?" These were questions, alas! to which poor honest Fransham never could get a satisfactory reply.

We have called him honest, for such most undoubtedly he was, as the following anecdote will prove. He had purchased at a book-stall of some poor old woman, a small edition of one of the classics for two shillings. On showing this book to a literary friend, he was informed that, from its scarcity, it was fairly worth seven shillings. "Do you think so?" said Fransham, "I am certain of it," said his friend; "for I gave that sum for a similar copy only a few days since." "Well," said Fransham, "I am glad you have mentioned the circumstance, as I will now go and pay the poor old woman the other five shillings." "Why so?" said his friend; "what necessity can there be for doing that? The old woman, no doubt, had a handsome profit at two shillings; why, then, should you give her seven?" "Why," replied Fransham, "if I had purchased the book of an established bookseller, I should not have felt the necessity of returning the other five shillings; because, as a tradesman, he ought to have known the price of the book, and I should then have thought it probable that his valuation of it was correct and yours erroneous. But as it was a poor old woman, there can be no doubt but that she was unacquainted with the value of this particular edition; and I think I should be doing an unjust act if I were to take advantage of her ignorance. I therefore feel it my duty to pay her the other five shillings." He accordingly went immediately to the woman, who received the five shillings with joy, declaring that she had never met with so honest a man before. Another trait in Fransham's character was his hatred to cruelty; it was the only thing that ever raised his anger. He was indignant that the clergy did not preach against those old English barbarities which were so popular in his time.

Although Fransham, in the days of his prosperity, when he was earning nearly a guinea a-week, resumed the use of shoes and stockings, yet his dress had a very singular appearance. In hot weather he would hang his green jacket across his arm, and carry his large broad-brimmed hat in his hand. Whilst walking one sultry day in this manner, he was met by an opulent manufacturer, a member of the Society of Friends, who accosted him with "My, Johnny, thee look cool and comfortable, notwithstanding the heat of the weather." "Most likely," said Fransham, "but thou lookest very hot and very uncomfortable, and verily thou wilt continue to look so, for thou hast not courage enough to follow my example, since thou darest not show thyself at the Friends' Meeting-house with thy coat on thy arm, and thy hat in thy hand, although thou professes to be indifferent to the customs of the world." To this the Friend replied: "No, Johnny, no society forbids it. I like to have some regard to decency." "Well, then," rejoined Fransham, "do, for the sake of decency, continue to wear thy thick cloth coat and great heavy hat on a hot sultry day, and I, for the sake of comfort, will continue to carry my jacket on my arm, and my hat in my hand." The singularity of Fransham's appearance, and the fame of his learning, obtained for Fransham the reputation of a fortune-teller among the ignorant. His reception, however, of two ladies who visited him in that capacity was such as to put a stop to all similar visits for the future. Fortune smiled on Fransham. He became rich. He saved a hundred pounds. Such a large sum he would not trust to a bank, but lent it to a friend. This friend failed. Fortunately, Fransham had withdrawn £75, a few weeks previously, and lost only £25. Fransham, however, stoutly maintained, that instead of losing £25, he had gained £75.

Fransham kept up his simple habits to the last. At the age of threescore years and ten, he would never allow his bed to be made but once a-week. It seemed, in his opinion, the height of effeminacy for a man to have his bed made every day. Such a custom, he maintained, was the nurse of luxury and idleness. Tea and bread and butter constituted the principal part of his fare. Occasionally, however, he would deviate for philosophic reasons. Fransham enjoyed good health. It was his opinion, however, that the value of health could only be estimated by a comparison with sickness. In conformity, therefore, with this opinion, he would sometimes call in his walks at the shop of a confectioner, where he would eat to repletion of tarts, cake, etc., till he produced a violent headache, that he might have the felicity of curing it by copious draughts of strong tea, and that he might be reminded of the inestimable value of that uninterrupted health which he enjoyed till his death, which took place in 1810. To the last he was an early riser, and an abstainer from intoxicating liquors.

In conclusion, we may note of this worthy man that he was remarkable for industry. He left behind him five manuscript volumes in quarto, most neatly written, containing original disquisitions in prose and verse, on theology, ethics, civil policy, mathematics, metaphysics, &c. As a metaphysician he was an ardent admirer of Hume, whom he would call the prince of philosophers, and whose dangerous "Essay on Natural Religion" he considered one of the most masterly productions of the human mind. This was the only metaphysical modern writer he read with satisfaction. Plato and Cicero were the two idols of his bibliography. As a mathematician, he appears to have been eminent for the solidity rather than the extent of his knowledge. In this, as in other matters, he gave the chief place to the ancients. Had he lived during the famous Bentley and Boyle controversy, the latter would have found in Fransham a willing ally and friend. He had a much higher veneration for Euclid than Newton, and preferred the "Elements of Geometry" of the former to the "Principia" of the latter. Indeed, he never could understand the celebrated doctrines of Fluxions. The mathematical authors in whom he most delighted, were Euclid and Apollonius. It must be confessed that he carried his veneration for the ancients to an unreasonable pitch, since he could seldom be induced to look at any modern book on mathematics.

Fransham's religion is best described by negatives. He was not a Christian, though his life was far more Christian than that of many men who glory in the term. With the moral speculations of men who wrote prior to the advent of Christianity he most sympathised. He was neither an Epicurean nor an Academic exclusively. His philosophy was eclectic. Like the Stoics, he placed perfect happiness in virtue; like the Epicureans, he held pleasure, or happiness, to be the chief good of man; like the Academics, he detected some good in every ill.

CHURCH OF ST. PANTALEON, AT TROYES.

THE CHURCH OF ST. PANTALÉON, AT TROYES.

THIS church, which stands in the western part of the town of Troyes, in the department of the Aube, was consecrated to St. Pantaléon, in honour of Pope Urban IV., who was the son of a poor shoemaker in this town, named Jacques Pantaléon. St. Pantaléon, we may remark, suffered martyrdom at Nicomedia, in the reign of the emperor Galerius, about the year 305. The church dedicated to him is an edifice of small dimensions, constructed in the Renaissance style, on the ground occupied in more ancient times by an oratory. A Latin inscription, fitted into one of the pillars, records that it was erected in 1527. The front gateway, however, is of no more ancient date than the middle of the eighteenth century.

St. Pantaléon's is a succursal church—what in England we call a chapel of ease. The walls of the nave and the chapels are ornamented with a great number of sculptures and paintings. The twelve pillars which sustain the arches are ornamented with statues of the saints, twenty-one in number, under richly-carved canopies. The countenances of all the figures have an expression of pleasing naïveté. The cause of there being an odd number of these statues, while that of the pillars, in front of which they are placed in two rows, is even, is, that the place of one of them is filled by the pulpit, as will be seen by the engraving. The execution of these statues is generally attributed to an artist named François Gentil, who also sculptured the group of St. Joachim and St. Anne, which is seen in the chapel on the right of the altar. The first chapel on the right of the nave, called Calvary, contains several groups in the same style, among which may be distinguished: a figure of the Virgin, called the Mother of Pity, which is regarded as the chef-d'œuvre of Gentil; Pilate showing Christ to the Jews, and the Virgin supported by the Magdalen and St. John, sometimes described as the "Three Mariés." The altar-screen of the chapel is decorated with a group of figures, three feet high, representing St. Crispin and St. Crispinian, occupied, the former in cutting a piece of leather, the latter in sewing the sole of a shoe, while two soldiers are about to seize them. Calm resignation is admirably expressed in the countenances of the two saints, and forms a striking contrast to the fierce joy depicted in those of the barbarous soldiers. The costumes are those of the reign of Henry II., an anachronism very frequently committed by the artists of the middle ages. The arcades of the nave and the choir are adorned with six pictures by Carré, the pupil of Le Brun, representing the principal events in the life of St. Pantaléon; and two by Herluisson, which represent the Nativity and the Entombment of Christ.

All the churches of Troyes have painted windows. Those of St. Pantaléon are painted in black and white only, but in a good style of decoration: the subjects of these compositions are taken from the lives of the prophet Daniel and Jesus Christ. They were executed in the sixteenth century by Macadie and Lutereau. The columns of the screen before the principal altar are also worthy of notice.

The other religious edifices of Troyes are: the cathedral, dedicated to St. Peter; the parish churches of St. John and the Magdalen; and four succursal churches—those of St. Nicholas, St. Renny, St. Urbain, and St. Nizier. The cathedral is a fine specimen of Gothic architecture, but the exterior is much less handsome than the interior, the pavement of the choir and the beautifully painted windows being generally admired. The same remark will apply to the other churches of Troyes; that of St. John has a shrine finely sculptured by Girardon, and a good painting of the "Baptism of Christ," by Mignard; and in the church of St. Renny is a bronze figure of Christ by Girardon, which is considered one of that artist's finest works.

A VISIT TO HASLAR HOSPITAL, NEAR PORTSMOUTH.

WE paid a visit the other day to Haslar Hospital. This fine building, which is situated upon the Gosport side of Portsmouth Harbour, near Blockhouse Fort, was first projected in the year 1742, and was sixteen years in completing. It is devoted to the reception of invalid and wounded seamen and marines, and the officers of each service, with a separate space set apart for lunatic patients. The building stands four stories high, and consists of a main body 576 feet long, and two wings 533 feet each. It contains 114 roomy wards, each capable of accommodating twenty patients; and we were informed that, in the time of war, there have been as many as 1,700 patients at one time in the hospital. Enclosed within the walls of the establishment is an airing-ground for convalescent patients, measuring thirty-three acres, pleasantly laid out with walks, grass-plots, flower-beds, &c., and a small chapel, in which divine service is performed by a clergyman, who resides in the hospital.

By the courtesy of a gentleman connected with the establishment we were conducted over some of the lunatic wards. A painful sight—but, withal, interesting and instructive. It was a sight, too, not unaccompanied with a sort of melancholy pleasure, to witness how much care and kindness had done to recompense these poor creatures for their heavy loss—the heaviest, perhaps, of all—the loss of reason. All seemed happy. Groups of old weather-beaten sailors were everywhere to be seen recounting past scenes of perils on the deep, which in all probability had never been encountered, save in the visions of "the heat-oppressed brain" of the narrator. Here was a man who had formerly been a "boat-swain." He was still indulged by being allowed to carry his official whistle, and shrilly did he "pipe all hands a-hoy!" doubtless imagining himself still upon the deck, far out at sea.

One man approached us, in whose calm, pensive face, browned though it was with tropical sunshine, there seemed something so peaceful that we could not think him mad. Laying his hand upon our arm, he looked eagerly into our face, and said in a hurried whisper: "You have seen her?" We knew not what to answer him; but the friend who accompanied us came to the rescue. "Yes," he replied, "we saw her yesterday." "Well," exclaimed the lunatic, his eyes fairly flaming with excitement, "has she not written?" Our friend shook his head. "No, no; she dare not write—she knows they stop all her letters," was the rejoinder, in a sad desponding tone. Then hastily looking up again, and darting his eyes around (we can find no other word to express the lightning-like rapidity of the motion), the poor fellow lowered his voice to a scarcely audible whisper. "But she will come to me!" "Yes." Another change from anxiety to ecstasy. "Yes; she will—I knew it! When?" "To-morrow," said our friend. "To-morrow! to-morrow! to-morrow!" he cried, with increased vehemence at every repetition of the word, until at last he fairly screamed "to-morrow!" and ran exultingly away. When he had gone, our friend informed us, that he fancied some great lady was in love with him, and every one he saw, he thought a messenger from her. And so for years had he been alternating between despair and happiness, when he thought first of her letters being stopped—and then, that she would come—and every day he felt she would come—"to-morrow." Poor fellow! the falsehoods of our friend were blissful truths to him. He knew that "she" was coming, and was happy. How cruel would the cold, stern truth have been, which told him "she" had no existence, and could never come. Truly, in cases such as this, there is a falsehood better far than truth. We went on through another of the wards, where we found a man sitting at a table, drawing pictures of ships—or, rather, of a ship—for every one he drew—and they were many—was the exact counterpart of every other. Whatever the size of the picture, there was exactly the same deep blue waves, with exactly the same quantity of white foam upon each, washing exactly the same pea-green coast, upon exactly the same spot on which stood exactly the same vermilion-coloured cottage. While, in the ship itself, every line of the complicated rigging was identically the same in every picture. And all these lines so strongly was his one ship impressed upon the artist's brain were perfectly correct. Not a rope in the whole ship was wrongly placed, nor was there one omitted; but all were carried out to such minute detail, that were it required to give a diagram illustrative of the uses of the various ropes on board a ship, perhaps no better one could possibly be had than this poor madman's drawing. At the same time, all the rest of the picture was as unlike anything on earth as it is possible to conceive. The bright red flag-stead at an angle of about forty five degrees out from the sea-green shore, while this shore in its turn stood up perpendicular to the horizon, and the waves which washed the beach were rushing tumultuously up an amazingly steep hill. These drawings the artist sold to any visitors that happened to notice him; and there were few who passed him without laying out sixpence or a shilling in his strange productions. But what struck us most was that he had, in his odd wandering ideas, conceived the notion of printing! Whether he had ever seen the art practised, or whether it was a passing thought, which, flitting with other madman's fancies through his brain, had been arrested there by his one dailing thought of painting ships, we know not. We are inclined to think, by the way in which he spoke of it, that the latter was the case; and that, in the retirement of Haslar Hospital, this poor old lunatic had (as far as any previous knowledge of his own was concerned) absolutely invented printing! We had stopped to watch him painting, and had purchased one of his very largest productions for the sum of one-and-sixpence. He had fixed prices for his pictures, and he seemed to estimate their value entirely by the number of square inches contained in them—much in the same way, by-the-by, as exhibitors of certain panoramas advertise them as covering so many thousand square yards of canvas. While we were standing watching him, he suddenly looked up from his work, exclaiming, "Do you live outside?" We did not understand the question, and he saw it; so he explained: "I mean," he said, "they don't keep you in here—do they?" We assured him they did not. "Then," said he, "I will tell you how you can make a deal of money. I would do it myself if I were outside, but I can't in here. Look now," he continued, taking in each hand a copy of the ship, the coast, and the cottage. I got sixpence for this size, and a shilling for this. It takes me a long while to do them. But if I were outside, I could make a stamp the same as the picture, and then put the paint on the stamp, and squeeze it on the paper so." And he pressed down an imaginary stamp upon the paper lying before him, with all his force. "I could do them very quick then, sir—couldn't I? Now, if I was outside like you, sir, I would do it." We thanked the poor fellow for the hint, and promised we would make a stamp at once and set about it; and then walked on, leaving the inventor of this great art still compelled to resort to the old process of hand-labour, simply because he was not outside.

We left the lunatic wards, after engaging in conversation with several other patients—some of whom assured us they were kings and princes; others were sorry to say they had no grog to offer us; and no end of them sent messages by us to be delivered in towns and villages of which we had never even heard the names. Promising everything, acquiescing in everything, and purchasing everything—for there were other producers besides our friend with the ships; one man spending his whole time in making stuffed balls, another in making black dolls (&c.), which were made and dressed in a style that would be the envy of any nursery in England—passing amongst all the varied songs, whistles, orations, dances, and other sounds and sights around us, the doors of the lunatic wards at last closed behind us.

We then proceeded to the Museum. This is a well-arranged and tolerably extensive collection of skeletons of human beings, mammals, birds, fishes, reptiles, serpents, and other species; stuffed and preserved fishes; some stuffed animals, and a very good collection of birds; some strange-looking weapons—axes, knives, &c.—from various savage tribes; a Chinese shield, made of wicker-work—a curious material to ward off a blow, but bearing upon it a painting of a hideous face, to frighten the foe away; a few bells; Captain Cook's speaking-trumpet, and some other relics; and various articles which our space will not allow us to print out. Altogether the Museum is an interesting collection; it has been formed principally by donations from naval officers and others, who "went down into the sea in ships," and bring from foreign climes their varied curiosities.

However, it is time we left Haslar, and proceeded back to the town of Portsmouth. To do this, we go to Gosport, which is close by, and then over the harbour by means of a mode of conveyance which we doubt not is new to many of our readers. This is the Floating Bridge. Though called a bridge, it might with equal propriety be termed a galley, for all the steam-boats, for though without either paddle or screw to work it, it is still a floating vessel, and propelled by steam. It consists of a large vessel made of wrought iron, about one hundred feet in length, by sixty in breadth. It plies between Portsmouth and Gosport four times in the hour, and is capable, if necessary, of accommodating from twenty to thirty carriages, and about five hundred passengers at each journey. The manner in which it works is somewhat singular. Two very large chains are stretched right across the harbour from one beach to the other, the chains sinking to the bottom when not in use, so as not to interfere with the passage of vessels over them. Within the body of the Floating Bridge are two steam-engines of sixteen-horse power each; these engines give motion to two large wheels, the circumferences of which are grooved so as to receive the large chains of which we have spoken. These chains passing over the wheels, it follows that, as the wheels revolve (the ends of the chains being fixed), the bridge itself must be drawn towards this fixed point, in the same manner as a man standing in a boat and pulling a rope, the other end of which is fixed to the shore, causes his boat to approach the shore. The chain is thus lifted out of the water as the bridge goes on, and after passing over the wheel, is allowed to sink again behind the bridge.

Arrived at Portsmouth, we disembark at "The Point," close by the Quebec Hotel—an excellent house, by the way, for the visitor to Portsmouth to take up his abode in—and then proceeding up through the town, we turn up on to Southsea Common for half-an-hour's walk before dinner. Southsea Common is a large, a very large open tract of land, one side of it being washed by the sea, the other bounded by handsome terraces and buildings forming the town of Southsea, the fashionable suburb of Portsmouth. The bathing at Southsea is said to be equal, if not superior, to any in England. A handsome carriage-drive and promenade, close by the water's edge, along the whole length of the common, and affording a beautiful view of Spithhead and the opposite shores of the Isle of Wight, has recently been constructed by public subscription, aided by a grant from the Treasury of £387,108. It is called the Clarence Esplanade; it consists of a fine carriage-road forty feet wide, and a foot-path of twelve feet, and is upwards of a mile in length.

At the end of the Esplanade nearest to the town have been erected two statues. Inscriptions affixed to these inform us that they are placed there "in honour of Horatio, Viscount Nelson, K.B., hero of the Nile and Trafalgar," and "in honour of Arthur, Duke of Wellington, K.G., statesman, hero, conqueror." In honour! Heaven save the mark! What is the fatal destiny which hangs over every British hero? How is it that so few escape having their effigies stuck up in such form, that once a year at least, upon the 5th of November, my little boy in the kingdom would be completely justified in seizing them, and burning them for "Guys?" Poor Nelson! his celebrated exclamation, "England expects every man to do his duty," strikes reproachfully upon the heart when we behold his sculptured caricature. So long has England been "expecting," and yet no man has as yet done his duty by removing this. However, Wellington, poor man! is, perhaps, even worse. His statue battles description, as does Nelson's also. Suffice it to say, the "statesman, hero, conqueror" has legs whose gigantic proportions, compared with the rest of his body, might well be supposed to typify the firm stand he always took against the enemies of his country; though why these tremendous limbs should be encased in Jack-in-the-water boots, which by no means fit him, or why he should be made to stand there all day upon some cannon-balls, which must be a very uncomfortable, not to say an idle footing, we can't discover. As to Nelson, he leans upon an anchor of most a drossy-diminutive size, especially when compared with the immense coil of cable to which it is attached. The intention of this strange want of proportion, we must say, puzzled us likewise; the only thing we can think of is, that the artist, conscious of the beauties of his work, was anxious to give the statue "rope enough," in hopes that the old proverb would be carried out. However, there he still stands, in an attitude which strongly suggests the idea of the hero of the Nile being about to do a little juggling with a telescope which he is holding in his hand. These two statues, we are informed by the inscriptions, were present to the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Portsmouth by Lord Frederick Fitz-Larence, in 1750.

From Southsea Common the fleet at Spithead forms a very pretty object in the landscape. A new regulation has recently been introduced with regard to ships coming into port. Formerly the ships were "paid off," and the crews sent ashore, their pockets full of money and their heads full of anticipated "spree" on shore; and then, after having squandered all their wages and ruined their health by a continued course of debauchery, they were left helpless, friendless, to seek another ship or starve. Now, however, instead of being paid off and discharged, a fortnight's leave is given them to go ashore, and six months' wages kept back, both as a security for their returning to the ship, and as a fund for them to fall back upon when all the rest is gone. Some of the sailors object to this alteration; but we fear the majority—reckless fellows as they nearly all are—have a very different idea. One man we spoke to seemed to think it a great hardship to be compelled to go back to the same ship again. He said: "You see, sir, after a three year's cruise or so with the same shipmate, we know too much of one another." A true sailor's longing for change! Another improvement—a far greater one, perhaps, than this—is the establishment of a Sailors' Home at Portsmouth, where they can live while on shore at a most reasonable rate, and have all their money and clothes taken care of for them, instead of their being driven to the frightful dens of infamy where so many of them, until now, passed all their time as long as a single shilling remained in their possession. This Home was established a few years back by charitable donations, and has been found to work admirably.

But to return to Southsea Common. One of the most general sights to be seen here is the exercising of the different regiments stationed in the town, who go through the various military manoeuvres of the common, and are inspired by their full bands, some of which play very beautifully. Another sight, of a very different kind, but one not without its interest to the thinking mind, is also frequently to be seen here. We allude to the gangs of convicts who are employed in improving, levelling, and draining the common. We never see these wretched outcasts of society, led out in gangs by horses or oxen, no longer free agents, but taken to work whether they will or not—labouring, not to obtain a future good, but to extortone a by-gone wrong committed; we say we never see a gang of convicts, with out an irresistible desire, prizing up within us to try to fathm the mind that lies below the fixed, sullen look that every face wears, to think what each man's feelings are. One pair of eyes meets ours, and is instantly cast down; we think we see almost a blush rise to the convict's face. He is a young man, and we feel that man may yet perhaps be reclaimed. He passes, and a second comes, whose fierce frowning low peaks plainly of a flame—every man's hand against his neighbour's hand shall be against every man. He has society; for he has wronged it, and society has punished him. Another we fancy a more animal; he does not care. He gets his food and lodging—he got no more to be stolen; what matter where he is? He doesn't care for people staring; let 'em stare—they don't hurt him. These, and a score more varieties we are sure you have detected. But enough. Portsmouth is a great or public for convicts, several hulks being situated in the harbour. These, however, are now nearly empty, a new convict pen being in course of construction in the town, a pen of stone and iron, instead of of the hulk. A large number of them are employed in the Dockyard, the Gun-wharf, and other public places, (trenches, where, on their daily march, with loaded muskets and fixed bayonets, thus rendering escape impossible.)

But we will leave these convicts to their labour, and pay a visit to one of the establishments we have just mentioned—the Gun-wharf. The Dockyard would require no article to itself. The Gun-wharf, as its name implies, is a store-house for artillery. From this place the guns are shipped off to all the world, as they require them; and here, when ships are laid up in ordinary, their guns are brought and stored away until again in need. Wherever the visit is turned, his head, long rows of cannon, of all conceivable shapes and sizes, are ranged side by side, presenting a singular appearance as they gradually diminish in perspective. Immense pyramids of cannon-balls, shells, &c., piled upon each other, are to be seen ranged around, some of the piles containing upwards of 2,000 balls. The shot used in the naval service, to be seen at this establishment, are of all sizes, varying from 3lb., which is the smallest, to 70lb., the largest. Then there are Turkish cannon balls, taken in battle, made of solid iron; Chinese shot of different kinds, French, Spanish, and Portuguese cannon; and various descriptions of guns and shot from other countries. But, perhaps, the most interesting object (not a pleasing one, for the whole atmosphere of the place seems redolent of slaughter) is the Small Armoury. Here are shown all the varied instruments employed by civilised humanity to knock each other's brains out, cut each other's throats, or blow each other into atoms by means of "villainous saltpetre." It is a distressing thought how much ingenuity has been displayed in the invention of instruments of destruction. Well, well, standing here, surrounded on every side by muskets, swords, and bayonets, it is not for us just now to moralise on war. An evil we know it to be—a hideous, unmitigated evil, whether a necessary one or not—that is the question. We will leave it unanswered for the present, and only say that if it ever should come near our shores, here is ample preparation for it.

MOZART.

This eminent composer, one of the greatest musical geniuses of the last century, was born at Salzburg, in the kingdom of Bavaria, on the 17th of January, 1756. His father was sub-director of the chapel of the Archbishop of Salzburg, who in those days was also a temporal prince of the empire. In the intervals of leisure afforded him by the duties of his office, he gave lessons on the violin, and taught the rules of musical composition to a select number of pupils. He was also the author of a work on the violin, which was held in much esteem in his day, and may still be referred to with advantage by students of the divine art. The musical taste and talent of the father were transmitted to the son, who, before he had attained his third year, evinced his aptitude for music by the delight which he took in the lessons on the harpsichord, which his sister, four years his senior, received from their father. His great pleasure was to find tricks on this instrument; and, when he succeeded, he expressed his joy in the most exuberant glow.

The sensitiveness which is the almost invariable accompaniment of genius, and which was very acute in the case of Mozart, was manifested at a very early age. "Do you love me?" was a question he frequently put to those about him, as soon as he began to talk; and, when ironically answered in the negative, tears filled his eyes immediately. The ardour with which he applied himself to the acquisition of the elements of knowledge, and the interest which he took in his studies, were extraordinary for his age. "While learning the elements of arithmetic," says one of his biographers, "the tables, the chair, even the walls, bore in chalk the marks of his calculations." And it may not be irrelevant to state, what we believe has never yet appeared in print, that his talent for the science of numbers was only inferior to that for music; had he not been distinguished by genius of a higher order, it is probable that his calculating power would have been sufficiently remarkable to bring him into general notice.

The powers of application and memory were possessed by the child in a remarkable degree. The exercises and simple lessons which his father taught him at four years old, more to amuse him than with belief in his ability to master them, were each learnt in about half an hour. Soon after he had attained his sixth year, he acted with his father by composing a concert for the harpsichord, mostly original, and correctly written; this was shown to several professors of the art, who pronounced the most favourable opinions, their only objection being that it contained too many difficult passages. He afterwards composed some short pieces of music, which his father noted down; and it is to be regretted that none of these early productions have been preserved. The encomiums which these compositions elicited determined the elder Mozart to cultivate the musical talent of his son, and also to introduce him as a prodigy at the courts of the German princes. He first took him to Munich, and the favourable reception he met with there from the elector of Bavaria encouraged him to proceed from thence to Vienna, where the wonderful child performed before to describe the progressive improvements of his son during the first stages of infancy. However, at eight years of age, I was frequently convinced of his great knowledge in composition by his writings; and that his invention, taste, modulation, and execution, in extemporary playing, were such as few professors are possessed of at forty years of age."

On taking their leave of the British public, the family returned to the continent; and while staying shortly afterwards at the Hague, six more sonatas were published. From the court of the Stadt-the emperor Francis I., who was as much delighted with his vivacity as amazed by his proficiency in music.

In the year 1763, the family made an extensive European tour, and passed several months in Paris, where the child-musician performed on the organ in the chapel-royal, before the king of France and all the court, and gave several public concerts, which were well attended. From Paris the Mozarts proceeded, in the following year, to London, where they remained until the summer of 1765. Here also he exhibited his talent before the royal family, "and holder the party proceeded to Paris, where the patronage young Mozart's talents received induced them to make a long stay. In 1768 they returned to Salzburg, where Mozart, by desire of the emperor Joseph II., composed his first entire opera, "La Finta Semplice," which was highly commended by Metastasio, and also by Hasse, who was then in the zenith of his reputation. It was never publicly performed, however, and is now unknown; the modern standard of criticism cannot, therefore, be applied to it, but, in all probability, whatever merit it possessed was only of a relative underwent," says the biographer quoted before, "more severe trials than any to which he had been before exposed, through which he passed in a most triumphant manner." During this residence in the British metropolis, he composed and published six sonatas, which he received permission to dedicate to Queen Charlotte. "Of Mozart's infant attempts at music," says Dr. Burney, "I was unable to discover the traces from the conversation of his father, who, though an intelligent man, whose education and knowledge of the world did not seem confined to music, confessed himself unable character. He was only thirteen years of age at the time, and nearly twelve years elapsed before he produced an opera which has survived his period.

In the following year the Archbishop of Salzburg appointed him director of his concerts; but shortly afterwards he accompanied his father to Italy, where he added largely to the laurels he had already won. The pope was so much pleased with him that he conferred on him the order of the Golden Spur; and while in Rome he gave a remarkable proof of his large concentrativeness and powers of memory, by noting down the whole of the famous "Miserere" of Allegri, after hearing it performed in the pontifical chapel. At Bologna he was introduced to the celebrated Martini, who expressed the warmest admiration of his talents; and he was elected a member of the Accademia Filarmonica. His second opera, "Mitridate," 1773. In 1775 he composed the cantata, "Il Re Pastore" for the archduke Maximilian of Austria, and in the course of the four succeeding years he produced several other works, none of which, however, though highly admired at the time, obtained the celebrity so deservedly acquired by his subsequent productions.

was written at Milan in 1770, and performed twenty nights consecutively in the opera-house of that city. "Lucio Silla," produced three years later, had twenty successive representations; but neither of these operas has been reproduced in more recent times. Two masses for the chapel of the elector of Bavaria, an opera buffa, "La Finta Giardiniera," and some other works, were also produced in

In 1779 Mozart rested from his wanderings, and settled in Vienna. He had now attained his twenty-fourth year, and contrary to what has been usually observed of juvenile prodigies, his genius shone the brighter as it became more mature. The society of Vienna was very agreeable to him, and he had not resided there long when he became attached to Mademoiselle Constanze Weber, a young actress of talent and celebrity, who combined personal attractions of the highest order with the most enchanting amiability of disposition. Finding his attentions received in a manner flattering to his hopes, he made her a proposal of marriage, which was courteously declined by the young lady's parents, on the ground that his reputation was not then sufficiently established. Animated by the hope of obtaining the hand of the fascinating actress, Mozart directed all his powers to the production of a work which should surpass all his former efforts. He composed the opera of "Flora," a work which he always regarded as his best, and the first in which he displayed those masterly powers that distinguish his later productions. There are parts of great originality and grandeur, but some of the airs are too much in the style of that period, which has since become obsolete; and on the whole, it is inferior to those masterpieces of operatic composition which he produced a few years later. His own estimation of it may have been considerably influenced by the circumstances under which it was composed.

When this opera was produced, the principal character was personated by Mademoiselle Weber, who was as much interested in its success as the author, and may be supposed to have exerted her talents to the utmost. The success of this work added so much to Mozart's reputation, that the parents of the young lady made no more objections, and his genius was rewarded by receiving her hand in marriage. The union was a most happy one, the young actress proving an affectionate and warm-hearted wife, and a zealous and useful counsellor.

Mozart's next operatic production was "Die Entführung aus dem Serail" (L'Enlèvement au Sérail). It was at a rehearsal of this opera that Joseph II. said to the composer, "My dear Mozart, this is too fine for our ears; it has too many notes." "I beg your majesty's pardon," returned Mozart, whose consciousness of genius had imbued with considerable independence of mind; "there are precisely as many notes as are necessary, and no more." The emperor made no rejoinder, but was evidently disconcerted by the reply; however, on the first public performance of the opera he applauded it in the most rapturous manner. "Le Nozze di Figaro," the libretto of which was abridged from the comedy of Beaumarchais, and which, at the present day, is one of the most popular of Mozart's productions, was brought out, by desire of the emperor, in 1786; and in the same year he produced a short opera called "Schauspiel Direktor," a work very inferior, and now scarcely known.

In the following year the chef-d'œuvre of this eminent composer, his celebrated opera of "Don Giovanni," the libretto of which was admirably made up from several dramas on the same subject, was produced at the Italian opera-house at Prague. "I have written this opera to please myself and my friends," said Mozart, who was conscious of its being a production of no ordinary merit, and above the comprehension of the bulk of the public. Indeed, though it created a great sensation at Prague, it was not appreciated when produced in Vienna, nor even in Paris, thirty years later. The honour of according it the reception it merited among the capitals of Europe, was reserved for London, where it was not produced till 1817, when it was put on the stage of the Italian opera in the most spirited and liberal manner. The enterprise of the lessee was rewarded by a degree of success which had attended no previous speculation; the profits amounted to no less than ten thousand pounds, and its production was regarded as constituting an epoch in our musical history. The comic opera, "Così fan tutte," was produced in 1790; "Die Zauberflöte," a still popular opera, in the following year, the strange libretto being furnished by M. Schikaneder, the proprietor of a theatre in one of the suburbs of Vienna, where it was first performed. "La Clemenza di Tito" was brought out the same year, on the occasion of the coronation of Leopold II.

Of the symphonies, quintets, quartets, sonatas, masses, and numerous smaller vocal pieces of Mozart, we have not space for even an enumeration. His additions to Handel's "Messiah" would alone suffice to earn him a niche in the temple of fame, so refined and correct is the taste which dictated them, and so complete is the manner in which he has identified himself with the genius of the great composer. They were made for the Baron von Swieten, and the oratorio has since seldom, if ever, been performed without them.

Men of exalted genius are seldom blessed with that robustness of constitution which marks men of inferior powers. The man of learning may attain a vigorous old age, but the man of genius does so very seldom indeed. It is a remarkable fact, that many of these delicate and sensitive natures have dropped off at thirty-six: Burns, Byron, Shelley, Keats, are cases in point. Mozart was strikingly handsome, but he was small and slight in form, and fragile in constitution. His health began to decline a few years after his marriage, and the tender devotion of Madame Mozart was then shown in the patient and unwearied manner in which she nursed and watched over him. Though his imaginative powers remained in full vigour to the last, his health continued to decline; but his end was undoubtedly accelerated by an attack of a fever which prevailed in Vienna in the latter part of 1792, under which he sank on the 5th of December, in the thirty-sixth year of his age.

The last and most sublime composition of Mozart was his "Requiem," which he may be said to have composed on his death-bed. Concerning the origin of this famous mass, a strange story was told at the time of his death, and has been often repeated. It is said that, some years before that event, a stranger presented himself to Mozart, and, refusing to reveal his name, commissioned him to compose a funeral mass. Mozart undertook the commission; but as time passed on, and he saw no more of the mysterious stranger, he did not execute it, and at length ceased to think of it. A short time before his death, it is said that the unknown appeared to him again as he was setting out for Prague, and reminded him of the undertaking. Mozart again promised to execute the work, and on his return to Vienna he applied himself to the task. The rapid decline of his health warning him of his approaching death, he became impressed with the conviction that the stranger was a visitant from the world of spirits, and that he was composing the "Requiem" for his own funeral. The manner in which this idea wrought upon his imagination contributed to the sublimity of the work, which was scarcely finished when he died, some minor details being subsequently filled up by his pupil, Süssmayr. Such is the story, for which we cannot vouch; probably there is some truth in it, embellished from the imaginations of those by whom it has been related.

Had Mozart lived a year longer, he would have made a second visit to England, having made an agreement with the enterprising Salomon to write symphonies for his concerts, and superintend their performance in person. He left two sons, one of whom adopted his father's profession, but without having inherited his genius; the other was many years in the civil service of Austria.

The statue of Mozart, represented in our engraving, was cast in bronze at Munich by the inspector-royal Stieglmayer, from the model made by the sculptor Schwanthaler, and inaugurated at Salzburg, the birthplace of the composer, on the 5th of September, 1842. The homage to his genius was tardy; but we have shown that his finest productions were not fully appreciated until some years after his death. Moreover, for nearly a quarter of a century after his death, the whole of Germany was the scene of desolating warfare, in the turmoil of which music was only cultivated so far as it could be made subservient to patriotism, and the claims of its departed masters were forgotten. The fête of the inauguration was a splendid and imposing one, worthy of the man thus honoured. The occasion had drawn to Salzburg a great number of foreigners—princes and princesses, counts and countesses, composers, authors, and musicians—admirers of the genius of Mozart; and the musical academies of Naples, Rome, Florence, Milan, Venice, Vienna, Prague, Berlin, Munich, Hamburg, Copenhagen, Stockholm, St. Petersburg, and Warsaw, were each represented by some of their professors. More than fifty thousand persons were present. When the statue was uncovered, a salvo of twenty pieces of artillery was fired, all the bells in the city rang out a joyous peal, and an orchestra of six hundred performers filled the air with sweet sounds. At night, two thousand persons, professors and amateurs, assembled at the foot of the monument, which was illuminated by Bengal fires, and sang a hymn written for the occasion by Count Ladislaus de Serker, and set to music by the Chevalier Neukomm. On the following day, at noon, two thousand eight hundred amateurs executed the "Requiem" of Mozart on the same spot.

ORIGIN AND INAUGURATION OF THE FRENCH LEGION OF HONOUR.

NAPOLEON I. was as yet only First Consul, and was residing at the chateau of Malmaison with Josephine, while his victories were preparing for him the imperial crown, and his architects were restoring the palace at St. Cloud. One Monday evening in the month of February, 1802, the conqueror of Marengo reached Malmaison at about six o'clock. Dinner was soon on the table, and after dinner the company separated into two circles. Madame Bonaparte retired to the drawing-room with the ladies and several gentlemen, among whom was M. De Ségur, a veteran colonel of the dragoons of Noailles, at that time a senator, and afterwards master of the ceremonies, one of the most agreeable men of his day. The First Consul withdrew to the council hall, as it was called, with Monge, the Inspector of the Ecole Polytechnique, General Duroc, Dablot, Councillor of State, D'Anon, Director of the Museum, and Arnault, the tragic poet. They all stood before Bonaparte, and he conversed with them standing, as was his custom. In the course of the conversation, he said to Monge—"I did not see you at the Tuileries yesterday, at the grand reception of the ambassadors."

The inspector excused himself, on the score of his numerous engagements.

"I know your industry," replied the consul; "but you lost a magnificent spectacle. All the representatives of the Powers were there, a horde with ribbands and crosses of the different orders of the world. How did you like it, Denon?"

"It was a glorious sight. Nothing sets off a man so much as those brilliant colours and enamelled crosses."

"That is only an artist's prejudice," said the republican Monge; "these decorations are mere playthings."

"Playthings, if you choose to call them so," said Bonaparte; "but mankind admire and like them. They are in their eyes real proofs of greatness. Let us fairly consider the point. Distinctions please all men; such has always been their character. Do you know by what means Louis XIV. managed to make head against all Europe? It was the cross of St. Louis."

The First Consul went on to develop and illustrate this thought with that ability and perfection of detail, which his exalted genius and thorough knowledge of history rendered easy to him.

"Well, we must re-establish the cross of St. Louis," said Monge ironically, he having been a member of the commission which had abolished it in 1793.

Bonaparte said nothing in reply, but gave him a very significant look, at the same time no doubt saying to himself—"Instead of re-establishing an old one, I will establish a new one, and you shall be the first to be admitted to it." He then proposed that they should join the ladies, which they did.

Having now mooted the point, he waited two months without saying anything more about it. At the end of that time, in a council at which, besides the three consuls, several distinguished politicians were present, he again insisted on the importance of decorations, and announced his intention to create an order like those which existed in Europe. Cambacérés and Regnaud strongly supported him, the latter refuting the objections of the republicans by saying that the most democratic states had recognised such institutions. On the 4th of May, Roederer read to the Council of State the proposal for instituting the Legion of Honour. Bonaparte explained the reasons and objects of the proposal in an extemporaneous address which ended with these words:—"The Legion of Honour will be the commencement of the reorganisation of France." This amounted to a declaration that the work of reorganisation was as yet unaccomplished, and that the Legion of Honour would be the keystone of the arch that was wanted to give it stability. General Matthew Dumas desired that the decoration might be exclusively military; but the conqueror of Marengo replied by insisting upon the importance of political, intellectual, and moral excellence with a degree of impressive force that silenced all objections. At the next meeting of the council he was still more eloquent and decisive. Yet the proposition narrowly escaped being adjourned. It was, however, adopted by the Tribunal and Legislative Body in due course. Two years were to elapse before the complete organisation of the order, at the expiration of which period it was hoped the firmness of the state would be in a position to carry it with an unalloyed success. During those two years the opponents of the plan had free scope for their objection and remarks. "Wait a little," said Bonaparte; "those who sneer at it to-day, will eagerly solicit it to-morrow. It will become the object of ambition to all Europe." Moreau, Madame De Staël, and others, were liberal of their sarcasms, and some had to undergo the penalty of exile for their freedom of speech.

At length the day arrived. Bonaparte was now no longer First Consul, but emperor and the master of the world. On the 14th of July, 1804, at the very hour when the old constitution had fallen with the walls of the Bastille, fifteen years before, the new one rose with the Legion of Honour. As the 14th fell on a Sunday, the ceremony was put off to the next day. It took place in the Chapel of the Invalides, where the ashes of the emperor now rest. After a grand review, the emperor arrived on horseback at the Invalides, coming through an immense crowd of eager observers. He ascended the throne in the choir. In a gallery opposite were the Empress Josephine and her daughter Hortense, who was afterwards married to Louis Bonaparte. Besides these, there were eighteen marshals of the empire, only four being away on the field of battle. After mass had been performed by Cardinal Caprara, and the gospel read, M. de Laëpèle, of the Institute, the Grand Chancellor of the Order, rose from his seat. Napoleon had resolved to honour intellect by placing him at the head of the Legion of Honour. Laëpèle pronounced the inaugural discourse, and called over the names of the grand officers, who took the oath required by the statutes before the throne. Then the emperor delivered a speech such as a man but he could deliver, and, reading the oath to the legionaries, asked them in a loud voice whether they would take it. All, with one voice, answered in the affirmative. Two large basins were brought, one of gold, containing the gold crosses for the officers, and the other of silver, containing the silver crosses for the simple members. The symbols and the device were the same for both classes, a number of standards collected together, the ensign of Napoleon, and the words "Honour and Country," borrowed from the old monarchy. M. de Ségur, Grand Master of the Ceremonies, took a cross of each metal, and gave them to M. de Talleyrand Perigord, Grand Chamberlain; he passed them to Louis Bonaparte, Constable of the Empire, who placed them on the breast of Napoleon. At this moment, three rounds of applause resounded through the building. Then the distribution commenced. First came the members of the Institute, comprising all the most distinguished philosophers, literary men, and artists of the day, and headed by Monge, the very man who had previously ridiculed honorary distinctions as mere playthings. After these, the military officers of high rank, received the new decorations at the hands of the emperor. A Te Deum, by Lesneux, followed the distribution of the crosses; and in the evening there was a concert at the Tuileries, a general illumination of the city, and a grand display of fireworks on the Pont Neuf.

But the army not having been able to be present at the Invalides, Napoleon went to them at Boulogne, where a second Te Deum, equal in splendour to the first, was celebrated. On the 16th of August, at 10 o'clock in the morning, the emperor, in the simple uniform of the light horse, appeared in the camp on horseback, and took his seat in the bronze chair by Dagobert, which is still to be seen at the Museum of Sovereigns. From this elevated position he commanded a view of the harbour, the two camps, the batteries, the harbour of Wimereux, and the coasts of England. Salvoes of artillery thundered forth, and the crosses were placed in helmets and cuirasses. At the sound of eighteen hundred drums, sixty thousand men began to march, and the legionaries, leaving their ranks, came one after the other to receive the cross from the hand of the emperor.

Such was the origin, and such the inauguration, of the Legion of Honour, an institution which need doubt contribute to the restoration of order, and is still attended with important advantages. The want of some such honorary distinction suitable for political, literary, scientific, and artistic eminence, as well as military and naval exploits, has long been felt in this country, and was fully evident at the close of the Great Exhibition, when the Royal Commissioners found it impossible to mark the sense of the value of services rendered by certain parties, in a way at once appropriate and acceptable.

THE ROBIN ACACIA

Among the arboreal antiquities of the Jardin des Plantes, in Paris, is a venerable acacia, the first that was ever brought to Europe. This acacia, known to botanists by the name of Robinia pseudo-acacia, was planted where it now grows by Vespasian Robin, son of

THE WILD BOAR.

FROM the testimony of Fitz-Stephen, a monk of the time of Henry the Second, it appears that the wild boar was an inhabitant of the forest which in his day covered the whole northern part of the county of Middlesex, approaching within a few miles of the gates of London. But the forest has disappeared long since (the tract of

"stags, bucks, boars, and wild bulls," the two last are not now to be met with in any part of the British Islands, if we except the few so-called wild bulls carefully preserved in Chillingham Park. The wild boar, like his enemy the wolf, has long been totally extinct in this country: for we are informed by Pennant, that though wooded country known as Enfield Chase is supposed to be the only vestige now remaining of it), and with it the game which no doubt afforded the nobles of those days many an opportunity of indulging in their favourite amusement of the chase. Of the wild animals enumerated by Fitz-Stephen as denizens of the forest of Middlesex,

Charles the First endeavoured to introduce the breed by turning some into the New Forest in Hampshire, they were destroyed during the civil wars. The occurrence of the wild boar in different parts of England is, however, proved by the laws made for his protection. Thus the laws of Howell the Good, Prince of Wales in the tenth century, permitted his grand huntsman to chase this animal from the middle of November to the beginning of December; and William the Conqueror, whose memory should be held in the highest reverence by all preserving squires, took the wild boar, with the stag and the roebuck, under his especial protection, enacting that any one found guilty of destroying one of these animals should be punished with the loss of his eyes. Barbarous as this certainly is, the modern penalty for killing a pheasant or a hare is scarcely less hurtful to the individual, and decidedly more prejudicial to society.

On the continent of Europe, however, the case is very different: the wild boar still finds a home in the forests even of France and Germany, and his pursuit is still one of the most exciting sports of these countries. His formidable weapons render the chase of the wild boar rather a dangerous occupation both for the huntsman and his dogs; and the former is not unfrequently compelled by the boldness of his charge, which has obtained for him in Germany the appellation of "knight of the forest," to take refuge in the branches of the nearest tree.

The canine teeth of the boar, which grow to a considerable length in old animals, must be reckoned amongst the most dangerous weapons to be met with in the animal world. The upper canines spring from a singular projection of the sides of the upper jaw, and, instead of taking a downward direction, as in most animals, grow upwards on each side of the snout. The lower canines follow the same direction, and are applied to the sides of the upper pair; so that, by the constant friction of their surfaces, both pairs of teeth are worn to a sharp edge, and kept constantly in the best possible condition for inflicting a severe wound. This apparatus is applied with great force by a slight upward movement of the powerful head and neck of the animal when within reach of his foe; and when the boar is at bay, he will often, by taking a single step forwards, lay the foremost of the dogs dead at his feet. These weapons arrive at their full perfection when the animal is about three years old, and, before this period, they are said always to remain in the company of the old ones for protection. As the boar increases in age, his teeth gradually become more curved in their form, so that the points are no longer available, and the weapons become far less formidable; and a boar of five or six years old is said to be by no means so dangerous as one of from three to five years.

In their native forests, these animals collect into flocks, and, when danger threatens, the well-armed boars press forward to face the enemy, often forming a circle, in the centre of which the females and young are placed, and in this position they defy the attacks of their foe. The domestic hog is observed to retain the same habit; and a curious instance of the exercise of this instinct, by some of the half-wild hogs of Jamaica, is given by Mr. Gosse, in his interesting book upon the natural history of that island. The account is from the pen of Mr. Hill, of Spanish Town. He says: "The best display of woodland instinct that I have witnessed was recently exhibited in some young pigs of the blue breed, brought from the commons and forest-runs of a mountain-farm, and domiciled in town. Three of these country pigs, a boar and two sows, had taken up with a black pig and some four young followers, evidently town-born and bred. In tramping home, after feeding out, for the night, some of the town dogs, of a good enough quality of the hound and terrier breed, set upon them. Instantly the country hogs turned round, and coolly taking up their position in the angle of a wall, put the black pig and four young ones within the corner in their rear, and threw themselves before them. . . . The dogs that came upon them, being reinforced by a troop from the several yards round about, became a pack of twelve or fourteen in an instant. Among these were some five small curs. The three blue pigs were undaunted. They stood their ground with their faces to their enemies, and though the dogs beset them with a determination to fight in earnest, they successfully kept off their assailants. The curs barked, and grabbed at them between the legs of the larger dogs; the larger dogs rushed at them six in a line together. The young boar, with well-developed tusks, stood in the centre, and stepping every now and then one pace forward, made his upward rips at the dogs, and effectively struck them without receiving a single touch himself."

By means of his strong cartilaginous snout, the boar can readily turn up the ground in search of roots, and he also uses it in forming a hollow for his sleeping place. This he lines with grass and dead leaves; and this habitation, if we may credit every statement we hear, sometimes presents a picture of conjugal comfort such as can hardly be credited in swinish life. It is said that when the boar has lain himself down for his night's repose, his partner covers him over carefully with litter, and then creeping in under the same shelter, the happy pair sleep cozily until morning. In some cases, several of them form a common sleeping-place, in which they lie with their heads all directed towards the centre.

The wild boar is of a black or blackish-gray colour, and is thickly covered with stiff bristles. In the pine forests of Germany these, by continual rubbing against the stems of the trees, become so completely agglutinated together with resinous matter as to form a sort of shield, which is said to be hard enough to resist a bullet. In his form, the wild boar generally differs from his domesticated relatives only in being more gaunt and meagre, but his strength and ferocity are much greater. His flesh is in the best condition from October to the end of the year; and it is during this period that he is hunted. He is usually pursued with dogs; and as a well-tusked boar seldom exhibits any great fear of his enemies, but flies slowly, often turning round to threaten his assailants, the dogs employed in hunting him require more strength and courage than fitness of scent; in fact, independently of the danger to which they would be exposed, good hounds would soon be entirely spoilt for any other description of hunting if employed in this sport.

Wild swine occur in all parts of the earth; but the species appear to be different in different localities. The Indian wild boar appears to be a distinct species from the European, although very similar in habits and appearance; and the African species are distinguished by a singular bony protuberance on each cheek, which may be seen very distinctly in the fine boar of the Cameroons Warthog (Potamochoerus penicillatus), now in the Gardens of the Zoological Society in the Regent's Park.

The wild hogs of America, like the wild horses and cattle of that continent, owe their origin to individuals of the domesticated European breeds, which have escaped from servitude, and resumed, with the independent forest life, most of the habits of their European ancestors. They are plentiful in the larger islands of the West Indian Archipelago, and an interesting account of their habits will be found in Mr. Gosse's "Naturalist's Sojourn in Jamaica," from which we have already quoted.

THE EDDA.

ABOUT the year 1100, a native of Iceland, named Sæmund Sigfuson, animated by a zealous desire to preserve the mythological, heroic, and didactic poems which had been thus far handed down by oral tradition, made that collection of them which is known as the Edda. Most of these Runic poems are believed to have originated in the period between the commencement of the sixth and the close of the eighth century; and the original language and rhyme were scrupulously preserved by the collector. The verses are short, in lines of six and eight syllables, and the style of all of them is rude and concise. The predominant subjects are the amours and rivalries of the gods; but the exploits of the heroes of ancient Germany and Scandinavia are also recounted, and held up to admiration. There exist two ancient manuscripts of this work, one of which is preserved at Copenhagen, and the other at Upsal.

About a century later, the Icelandic chronicler, Snorro Sturleson, composed a prose Edda, in which the Runic myths were accompanied by a commentary relating the historical facts connected with them, explained the allegories, and developed the dogmas. To this work, so valuable to the elucidation of the Scandinavian mythology and traditions, are appended the Sagas, or biographies of celebrated warriors, composed at different epochs, and full of curious details of the adventurous adventures of the hardy and daring pirates of the North.

The subject of the first poem in the Edda of Sigfuson is "The Vision of Vala," an inspired priestess, who relates, in vigorous and stirring rhymes, the creation of the universe, and the causes and manner of its destruction and renewal. It is interesting to trace, the resemblance which exists between this Runic cosmogony and those of Hesiod and Zoroaster, as set forth in the Theogonia and the Zendavesta, and between all these and the Genesis of Moses. In the beginning, we are informed, there existed only chaos, typified by the giant Ymer: the gods created the earth, and seeing that it was sterile and desolate, spread over it the starry firmament, placing the sun in the centre, to shine above the mountains and warm the earth into verdure. Then they made Ask and Embla, the parents of the human race, and assembled in the plain of Ida to forge the metals, and fabricate therefrom implements for their use. We have also the allegory of the tree of life, above whose spreading branches a luminous cloud continually hung; and the appearance of the Nornes, three august virgins, the Fates of the Runic mythology, whose names are Urd, Verdandi, and Skulda.

A race of dwarfs appear on the scene, whose chiefs are Mod-sognir and Durin, the representatives of the active and passive principles in nature. These pigmies are the geni of the winds, the torrents, the cascades, the clouds, and the glaciers; they are also the forces which give verdure to the foliage of the forest and the herbage of the plain, and to the flowers their colour and perfume. The Greek imagination did not more completely people the earth and ocean with supernatural forms.

The peace of the infant world is broken by the murder of Balder, son of Odin, by his brother Hoder, whose sad fate causes the earth to mourn, and Freya (the moon) to withdraw her light. Vali avenges the death of Balder; and Lok, the evil genius of the world, the tempter to the crime, is bound upon a bed of fire. There, in the realms of torment, a dark flood rolls its fetid waters, to which are consigned perjurers, murderers, and adulterers. There the dog Garm howls frightful discord, and the untamed wolf Freki rattles his chain. But in the gardens of the blessed, the sound of the harp is heard, the woods are melodious with the song of birds, and the heroes are awakened by Pialar, the cock of the shining plumage, to their daily banquet and mimic fight.

The earth becomes filled with corruption and bloodshed; the brother falls by the hand of a brother; hostile armies erasion with blood the green of earth's carpet; cruelty and impurity are universally practise. Signs are seen which portend the end of the world: the branches of the tree of life are strangely agitated, and the luminous cloud disappears. The Fates, the enemies of the gods, take courage; Lok is on their side, and with them comes the wolf Freki and the black dragon Nidhogir. Swords of fire are their weapons. The mountains tremble, and the geni of the earth retire into the recesses of their sacred caverns. After a terrific battle, the gods are overcome by the giants; and then comes the triumph of evil and the destruction of the world. The lights of the firmament are extinguished, the earth sinks beneath the waves of the stormy ocean, and darkness and silence reign supreme over all. This state of things does not, however, continue always: a new earth rises from the sea, the heavenly bodies again shine forth from the darkness, the gods return to life, and the reign of peace and virtue commences, under the laws of Forsete, the god of justice, and son of Balder.

The religious system of the Scandinavian nations of an antiquity is abundantly displayed in the various ballads of the poetic Edda which follow the remarkable Vision of Vala. In the song, or poem of Vathrudner we have a trial of knowledge between Odin and a giant, each striving to give the best explanation of the mystery of creation. The song of Grimner is a description of the twelve rebellious abodes. In that of Alvis a wise dwarf enumerates to Thor the various orders of beings, in the language of the gods and the Fates, the dwarfs and mankind; the enumeration is supposed to typify the different nations that succeeded each other on the Scandinavian soil. These are followed by three poems on the exploits of Thor, two on the death of Balder, one on the amours of Freya, and two on the genealogy of the kings. The series is closed by the remarkable poem called the Banquet of Egir, the deity who presides over the ocean, in which Lok, who is the impersonation of irony and malice, rallies the assembled gods, and holds up to ridicule the sacred mysteries.

From these ancient Runic poems has been gathered all that is known of the Scandinavian mythology, which may be thus summed up. An invisible and eternal spirit, called Allfader, the universal parent, ruled from the beginning the principles which, in combination, produced the world. A pestilential vapour, first condensed by the cold of Nefthelm (the North Pole) into an enormous mass of ice, was afterwards thawed by the heat of Muspellheim (the South Pole), and became the giant Ymer, who, during a profound sleep, gave birth to Hymur, the demon of frost and progenitor of the Fates, and Surtur, the demon of fire. One of the gigantic race of the Fates, named Bor, by his marriage with the goddess Felta, became the father of Odin, Hoder, Heir, and Loder, and, who attacked Ymer and destroyed him. His divided body produced the elements: his flesh became the earth, his blood the water, his bones the mountains, his hair the plants, his brains the clouds, and his eyes the celestial luminaries. In the centre of the earth rose Ygdrasil, the tree of life, whose topmost boughs reached the heavens.

TOURING IN IRELAND IN 1851.

RESTING our rambles at the point from which we took leave of the reader in our last article, namely, at Crookhaven, we now present him with a sketch of that most picturesquely situated little town, the fens, or at least the future fens, of what promises to be the scene of vast mining industrial enterprise in this part of Ireland, as it would have been long before this, but for untoward circumstances, now happily fast passing away, which have hitherto retarded the prosperity of the interesting portion of the empire we are at present speaking of.

Reverting again to the main road, on the way to Killarney, and between Crookstown and Gougane Barra, we come to the spot indicated in the first of the annexed smaller illustrations.

Inchigeela is about twenty-four miles distant from Bandon, possessing a church, parsonage, chapel, police-barrack, an inn, and several neat whitewashed houses. Here we again obtain a view of the river Lee, which runs close by the village. After quitting Inchigeela, a short and pretty drive brings us in sight of the Lakes, about three miles in length. Here the Lee expands itself into a broad sheet of water, and three continuous lakes present in their entire course a diversified series of the most animated scenery, dotted with little islands. The road along the side of the lakes is very beautiful, and winds round the northern margin of the shore, from which point the best view is Gougane.

Quitting the northern shore of the lake, we follow the course of the Lee, and enter a lonely valley, encompassed with mountains, and after a few miles' ride arrive at the village of Ballingearry, or "the Place of the Wilderness," thirty miles distant from Bandon, and within four miles of the source of the river Lee. A small us chapel, a national school-house, a road-side inn, and some few houses, constitute the village, from the bridge of which is seen a wild moory glen through which flows the Ballingearry stream, winding down the valley, and emptying itself noiselessly into the Lee. A rude and ancient church stands upon an eminence, about a mile up the glen, and several antiquated buildings are observable in the vicinity. A few miles further on we approach Gougane, presenting the appearance of a craggy wilderness, and arrive at the head of Keimaleigh Pass, within a short mile of the Holy Lake of Gougane Barra, situated at the bottom of a circular chain of mountains, wild in the aspect of its surrounding scenery; but the tourist can form no conception of the scene of lovely loneliness till he contemplates it within its perfect amphitheatre of rugged hills. A short curve in the pathway at once displays the whole scene to view; and a more complete picture of wild desolation or majestic mountain grandeur it is impossible to conceive. haven mountains are also seen to great advantage; while underneath, the Pass of Keimaneigh, and the surrounding scenery of Gougane, form a glorious landscape. Returning from this lonely scene, we re-enter the main road; and a hearty luncheon having been disposed of at the refreshment-room provided there, and a change of horses effected, we start again, and soon arrive at the celebrated Pass of Keimaneigh, thirty-four miles from Bandon. It is of this ravishing spot that the cynic, Mr. Michael Angelo Titmarsh, throwing aside for once his captiousness, exclaims— "Were such a bay lying upon English shores, it would be a world's wonder; perhaps if it were on the Mediterranean or the Baltic, offered to the Lee. A romantic or creative imagination would here find a grand and extensive field for the exercise of its powers; every turn of the road brings us to some new appearance of the abrupt and shattered walls, which at either side rise up darkling to a great height, and the mind is continually occupied with the quick succession and change of objects so interesting, resplending and com-

English travellers would flock to it in hundreds. Why not come and see it in Ireland? It is less than a day's journey from London, and lies in a country far more strange to most travellers than France or Germany can be. The best view of this exquisite scene—the charm of a soft climate enhancing every other—is obtained from the height of the hilly road leading to Killarney, and at the foot of which is a pretty cottage, preferred as a residence for many years by Lord Bantry to the stately mansion at Bantry. The summit of this hill, which is in fact within a private demesne, may be attained if the tourist will make up his mind for a fatiguing walk; but the result will amply reward him."

Not long since there existed at Glengarriff only a single hotel, and even that was an indifferent one. But now that her most gracious Majesty's visit has made an Irish tour the fashion, visitors will find in the very centre of the fairy solitudes of this "rugged glen" (for such is the literal translation of "Glengarriff"), not an ill-furnished and uninviting wayside posada, but a splendid caravan-sary on the most comprehensive and elaborate metropolitan scale, charges excepted; for in this respect, Mr. Roche, the landlord, is fortunately not ambitious of rivaling the Babylonian Bonifaces; and the same may with truth be said of his diligent and well-catering neighbour, the proprietor of Eedes' most admirable hotel. By boat Glengarriff is seen to the fullest advantage. Having taken a general view of the delightful amphitheatre surrounding Roche's Hotel, we proceed to Cronwell's Bridge, passing Garnish and Brandy Islands, and enter the limpid waters of the Glengarriff river.

SELF-DENIAL;
OR,
PASSAGES OF A LIFE.
BY A WAYFARER.
II.

THE place was a regular London lodging-house, and not of a very high character. There were several bell-handles outside, and inside there was no carpet on the stairs, while all had a dingy appearance that spoke of poor owners and poor lodgers. I was surprised. I had expected to find Charles almost in affluence, and had been half-ashamed to present myself before him. I feared to excite his pity, and my pride revolted at the very thought. Now I knew not what to think.

I knocked. A quiet, almost timid voice bade me enter. I opened the door and found myself in a garret. It was very scantily furnished. There was a bed of very unpromising appearance, a rickety chest of drawers, a small table covered with books near the window, at which sat a tall, pale, almost cadaverous-looking youth.

"Ogilvy," said I hurriedly, "can this be you?"

"Ted," he replied, rising, and a faint blush crossing his handsome face, "I may ask you the same question—jolly Edward Markham, dust-worn and weary, why?"

"Charles," I cried, shaking his hand heartily "I have run away from home. Let me sit down."

"Run away from home!" he cried, almost with a shriek. "Edward, my dear boy, you must be mad!"

"Hush," I replied; "hear my story first. But I am hungry and thirsty."

A burning blush suffused his features, and he covered his face with his hands. I heard him sob. I was alarmed, though the true reason did not strike me.

"Charles, what is the matter?" I cried, seizing his hand; "speak to me. Are you ill?"

"Edward," he replied, in a faint and choking voice, "I am a wretch. You come to me hungry and thirsty, and I cannot even offer you a crust of bread. I have not taken food for two days."

I thrust my hand into my pocket and pulled out a sovereign, with which I was about frantically to leave the room.

"Stop," said Charles, firmly; "I cannot be exposed here. Listen to me quietly. I have been out to dinner both to-day and yesterday, at least so they think. I would die rather than they should suspect, especially Edith. Let me arrange. I will order tea, and request that cold meat may be provided, as you have come off a long journey. Don't be alarmed. An hour more or less will do me no harm."

In his quiet, gentle way, he took the sovereign from me and rang his bell. I thought it was answered with an alacrity which was scarcely to be expected under the circumstances. The young person who had opened the door appeared, as if by magic, and asked if we wanted anything.

"My dear Miss Ellis," said Charles, gently rising with a respect and tenderness of manner which struck me more afterwards than at the moment. "This is a schoolfellow and friend; he has just come off a long journey, and is very hungry. If you will be kind enough to let him have some tea and ham and eggs, or something, I should feel very much obliged."

As he finished, he held the sovereign out to the young person, who looked extremely surprised and then blushed violently.

"Tea, ham and eggs for two, I suppose," she said in a half-timid, half-cheerful tone.

"Edith," said a shrill voice from below, "what are you doing all this time up stairs, there? Johnny has fallen down, and first floor want their tea."

"Johnny must pick himself up, and first floor must wait for their tea," replied the young lady, rather pertly. I speak of the impressions of the moment. Charles meanwhile stammered out something about having just dined, to which Miss Edith paid no attention.

"Is she not an angel?" he said, when she left the room.

"Very charming person, but slovenly in her dress," I said, but unfortunately before she had quite shut the door. Poor Edith! I had no intention to hurt her feelings.

"My dear Edward," exclaimed Charles, "that girl's a perfect slave. Her father and mother have no pity on her. They presume on her good nature, and though she is far above them, yet has to do half the work of the house. They are not bad people, but they are poor and unhappy. The husband drinks, and the wife sobs. But now, Edward, for your story." I told it in a few brief words, and then asked for his.

"You are in a very false and difficult position, my dear Edward," he said; "but mine is worse at present. You know that my mother has been left a widow, with two girls and one son. To give that son an education, my mother has gone to Wales to live. Out of £200 a-year she allows me £80; it is enough for a student. I have been six months in London. I had the £80 in a lump. I spent it madly, wickedly, in the first four months; since then I have starved. I owe two months' rent, and six weeks' breakfasts and teas—on these meals I lived for that time. That is refused me now; and but for Edith I should be expelled. She has stood my friend, and when the father—a gentleman when he likes—wished to turn me out, indignantly remonstrated. They have now agreed, after inquiry, to wait six months for their rent—three shillings a-week. But living is another question: for six months I shall not have a penny."

I listened with perfect awe; I could not restrain a shudder. I saw before me a dark and gloomy vista. For some minutes I was silent.

"Could you not get five pounds of your mother?" I said timidly.

"No; it would tell the truth. I would rather die than expose my weakness. I must work; I am promised some copying. Half the day I must study—half the day slave for a law stationer."

"But, Charles, I have another sovereign," I said, producing it. "I could sleep capitally close against the wall. Take it."

"Edward," exclaimed my old schoolfellow, taking my hand, "for the present I accept your offer; it will enable me to do a heavy job of copying; that finished, I can pay you. But let me decide the fate of this coin. We had better pay Mrs. Ellis four weeks' rent; otherwise she may object to your sleeping here."

"Just as you like," said I; "and now, Charles, I am installed here, and must work for my living. You know my hand; you continue your studies—I will do the copying."

After some hesitation, he consented. It was lucky he did; his hand was totally unfit for the work, while mine was admirably suited. I was so delighted at this arrangement that I became quite jovial. Suddenly I rose.

"Bravo!" I said, opening the door—I had while talking brushed my clothes and hair, and otherwise adorned my person—"here comes the tea."

Miss Ellis entered, preceeing the Irish girl, who carried the tray. I almost started as I noticed how neat, almost elegant, was her appearance. I had caught her hard at work. She smiled, I thought, maliciously, and I then guessed that my observation had been overheard. I had no time, however, to think much of the matter, so eager was I to attack the smoking viands.

The cloth was laid, the tea was placed on the table, the tempting food was merely a couple of plates and knives and forks were on each side, ready for appetites as ravenous as those of any of Homer's heroes; and yet Miss Ellis did not go. She allowed the girl to retire before she said a word.

"Here is your change, Mr. Ogilvy," she began. "Shall I make tea for you—you men are so very helpless!" she continued, with a smile of such exceeding sweetness I was quite angry with myself.

Charles stammered and blushed, and handed a chair, which Miss Ellis took, and began quietly to pour out the tea. Luckily for Ogilvy, it was necessary for him to eat slowly, so that the nature of his appetite was not apparent. I kept assisting him to eat, however, and could see a change come visibly over his face. There crept a faint red over his pallid countenance, his eyes looked less wildly bright, and when the warm and genial tea followed, he seemed an altered being. His voice became more natural, his spirits rose buoyant and glad, and he talked with extreme animation.

I noticed the difference between us before half an hour. He was poetical in his conversation; his sentences flowed from the heart, as from a well-digested book. There was a brilliant doud of eloquence about him, but at times he was a little mystical. I was more ordinary in my talk, told a good story, made Miss Ellis laugh, and was always plain and comprehensible. Miss Edith said little, but listened attentively. She gave her undivided attention to the one speaking. At last we spoke of business. Then the young lady was indeed eloquent. She accepted me as a lodger without hesitation, and undertook, with the twelve shillings in her hand, to secure the consent of her parents.

And thus it was I became an inmate of the house in — street, Strand. The work came in the next day, and I sat down to it with energy and courage. I was delighted to be able to do something useful. We lived, after the famous tea, which was a well-remembered day, most economically. We bought a few necessaries, and nothing more. All our meals were taken at home, and, as no one but Miss Edith ever came to our room, the secret of our poverty was pretty well concealed.

For a month I contrived, through Ogilvy, to earn ten shillings a week, and then the supply of writing stopped, and in a few days we were reduced to our last shilling. We spent it in oatmeal and made porridge. I was now at work on a tale intended for a popular periodical. Charles approved of it. I read it him page by page as it was written, and he believed it certain of acceptance. I sent it with the usual polite note, and intimated my intention of calling for a reply. I did so at the end of a week. The editor was out of town.

I wandered slowly along the Strand after my visit to — street, and scarcely durst go home. I knew not what to do. Charles had gone out, I believe having bent his proud spirit to ask a favour of an acquaintance. If he failed, our position was desperate. At last, however, becoming faint and exhausted, I went home. The door was opened by Mrs. Ellis, once a pretty woman, sadly altered by care and trouble. She left the door half open and went away muttering something. I closed the door behind me and walked up stairs. Charles was at home, and I saw by his face that something extraordinary had happened.

"Edward," he exclaimed, "I have a letter from your mother."

"My mother," I faltered,

"She writes to me, begging for news. She is sure I must have heard of you. Your father is very angry, but she sends you five pounds!"

I sat on a chair. She would never have done that without my father's consent. I almost felt angry, but soon recovered myself. I then bade Charles write and say he had seen me, that I was at work, he paid all were well, and promised to see them when my position was more defined and settled. Charles shook his head and agreed.

"I hoped you would relent and go home," he said; "I kept some other news back. I called on S —, but had not the courage to ask him for money; so I spoke of you. S — edits a paper of no great circulation or influence. They pay me a guinea for them for review. But they must have criticisms. If you like to get a new book or two from the library, S — will give you ten shillings a-week for a couple of columns."

I accepted readily, and raised the bed. Miss Ellis appeared as usual. I begged her to let us have dinner at home for once, and to give her mother one pound. The kind-hearted girl smiled, and at that moment Charles stammered out something about a ticket for Drury-lane, if we liked to go. I am sure he would have given the five pounds that constituted our worldly wealth, to have gone himself with her. At least I knew so since, but he was so diffident, and at the same time so generous, he could not say so. We accordingly accepted, and Edith having gained her mother's consent, the more readily that the one pound was an unexpected pleasure, we started. My costume was not very brilliant, but my young friend appeared not to know the facts. Still, it was his charming and innocent youth, and beauty could make her. I have not the slightest recollection of what we saw. I only know that we talked much and pleasantly, that Edith was delightful, full of spirit and animation, and showed a singular good sense, which quite won me into admiration.

I felt it, I was certain of it; that night, as I lay down upon my pillow, I knew that I was in love with Edith Ellis, and that I would sacrifice everything to win her for my wife. And yet, though the discovery came upon me like an electric shock, I kept it to myself. I did not say a word about it to Charles. I was naturally timid over this my first love-advice. But, dear Charles, my friend and benefactor, was there not a suspicion of the truth, to keep my lips so still?

Next day I began my new editorial duties. I was not very well "up" in my subject, but I borrowed a weekly review of high character, and studied its columns with assiduity. I had received too good an education not to write correctly, and thus began my career as an author. I gave satisfaction, and supplying myself, my article had my salary raised to fifteen shillings a-week. This continued for about two months, when an event occurred of some importance to me. I was in the habit, the first week in every month, of going to a coffee-house, and there perusing the magazine; after which I served up to the readers of the "Weekly Spectator" a couple of columns of emanent. I imagine my surprise and delight when, turning over the pages of the " — Magazine," I found my own tale in print.

A young mother gazing on her first child, a penniless orphan coming into a rich estate, a relieved criminal, have all their own peculiar sensations; but the young author who sees himself in print for the first time, is etel beyond all power of description. Pride, surprise, a long and brilliant future, fame, a joy doing no rapture, fill his heart. He would fain rush upon a stranger, show him the awful page, and cry, in tones of exultation, "That is mine, my article, my tale!" I thought everybody was looking at me in the coffee-house, and I could not remain there. I rushed out, bought a magazine, and flew home. I was in a state of mind bordering on madness.

Charles was not at home, but Edith was setting the room in order. I know not what possessed me. I kissed that noble face. Miss Ellis pushed me away, half angry, half laughing. She saw that something had happened. I showed her the tale; it had my name to it. "Have I not said, 'What mighty errors spring from trifles!'"

"Miss Edith," said I boldly, "I am certain to succeed now. I have an opening; the thin end of the wedge is in. I may now speak frankly. I love you with all my heart and soul. I have only, by-the-by, the honor of a peer and a son. I beg nothing of you. But nothing can stop me. If you do not, Edith, will show my path with your bright smile, I shall think me a noble man, an amount of work. I must prosper. Sign the necessary conditions."

She made no reply. I fell on my knees, and begged her to talk to me sensibly; I was old. I was well educated. I was an independent.

"Edward," said she, smiling, "you are an excellent young man, industrious, and full of self-denial. When you can give me a home, and Charles is satisfied, I will be your wife."

Before I had time to reply, I caught sight of Charles Ogilvy. He was looking at me with the deep respect his bow was doubly redoubled upon my fall. We started like two guilty creatures.

"And have I not said a serpent in my system?" he said, "and that if any and reproach I never shall forget."

PAPIER MACHE CHAIR.

OUR French neighbours claim the honour of being the original inventors of the papier maché. In Paris the manufacture of the article is carried on very extensively; but far beyond the articles produced at Paris—articles both of utility and ornament stand those of our own Birmingham manufacturers.

The old method of manufacturing papier maché is as follows—The paper for use is gray in colour, but similar in texture to formed article is taken from the mould, the several parts are planed, filed, and trimmed, so as to be quite correct and level. The process of stoving then follows; after which the varnish is laid on, and brought to a smooth, hard, brilliant surface. The article is then coated with several layers of shell-lac varnish, coloured, which, after being hardened, are scraped quite level. The different varnishings and smoothings are carried on for a period varying from twelve to eighteen ordinary blotting paper. Prior to using it, the paper is well saturated with flour and glue mixed with water, in about equal proportions, and is then laid on the mould of the article intended to be produced. These moulds are of iron, brass, or copper. The mould, coated with the first layer of paper, is then dried for twelve hours. A careful smoothing by a file follows, after which another deposit of paper is made. The processes of drying and smoothing are successively repeated with each additional layer of paper, until the article assumes the required strength and thickness. When the newly-days, according to the purpose for which the article is required. The exquisite surface is produced by manual polishing with rotten stone and oil; but the finish is obtained by the process of handling alone.

Various alterations and improvements have been made from time to time in the manufacture of papier maché; and sometimes the paper is reduced to pulp, cast into the form required, and then rendered compact and solid.

The specimen which we present is of a chair in papier maché; the grace and elegance of the design deserve especial attention.

BENVENUTO CELLINI.

In the last year of the fifteenth century, in the city of Florence, was born one of the most talented and skilful artists in metal which that or any subsequent age has produced. We allude to Benvenuto Cellini, the son of a citizen of the Florentine republic, who was himself an admirable carver in ivory, a maker of musical instruments, and a good musician. So much was he attached to music, that he both to leave Florence. Benvenuto repaired to Sienna, where he worked for some months with a goldsmith named Castoro; and afterwards went to Bologna, where he got employment from a Jew, and earned a great deal of money, as he tells us himself in his autobiography. Six months afterwards he obtained permission to return to Florence, but having an altercation with his father, he once neglected his avocation, and would have made Benvenuto a flute-player, but the youth manifested an early taste for the art of design, and at the age of fifteen placed himself, contrary to his father's wish, with a goldsmith named Sandro.

He had already become a skilful workman, when an affray in which he and his brother, a youth of fourteen, who was in the military school of Giovanni de Medici, were engaged, compelled them more left home, and proceeded to Pisa. There he made great progress in the goldsmith's art, and remained nearly a year, at the expiration of which he returned to Florence, and was laid up two months with fever. Having recovered his health, he worked under Sandro again, and made the acquaintance of Tommaso, the designer of Henry VIII.'s chapel in Westminster Abbey, who offered him employment, but he was unwilling to leave Italy. "At this time,"

As he, "I produced a piece of bejewelled work in silver, about as big as the hand of a little child; it served for the clasp of a man's belt, clasp of that size being then in use. Upon it was carved a group of foliage, made in the antique taste, with several figures of youths and other beautiful grotesques. This piece of work I made in the shop of a person named Francesco Salimbeni; and, upon its coming under the inspection of the Goldsmith's Company, I acquired the reputation of the most expert young man in the trade."

In his nineteenth year he again left home privately, accompanied by a youth of his own age, and proceeded to Rome, where he obtained employment under a goldsmith named Pienza, immediately after his arrival in the city. At the expiration of two years, he returned to Florence, at the request of his father, and again worked under Salimbeni, with whom he gained a gentle subsistence, taking great pains to become perfect in his art. It is evident from his actions and his own admissions, that Cellini was a man of a very hot temper, vain of his acquirements, and of a restless disposition. In doing honour to the skill of the artist, we must not conceal the failings of the man. He had at this time a quarrel with a young man named Gnaseotti, whom he stunned with a blow of his fist, and was sentenced by the Council of Eight to give four bushels of meal to a community of poor monks. Irritated more than ever, he made a furious attack on Gnaseotti and his relations, slightly wounded the former with a dagger, and with difficulty made his escape from the city, in the disguise of a friar.

He proceeded to Rome, where he at first worked for a goldsmith named Senti, but having gained a high reputation for talent and skill by setting some valuable diamonds for a lady, and making a large silver vase for the Bishop of Salamanca, he established himself in business, and was patronised by Pope Clement and several of the cardinals. He passed his leisure in making drawings after Raphael and Michael Angelo, and also of the antiquities of the city; and during the prevalence of the plague in Rome, he passed much of his time in shooting wild pigeons among the ruins of the Coliseum and the Forum, and sometimes made excursions into the country.

After the disappearance of the plague, he seems to have lived a rather gay and dissolute kind of life, and the candour with which he records his irregularities shows how his were the morals and manners of the age.

When Rome was menaced by the Imperialists in 1527, Cellini raised a band of fifty men for the defence of the city, and went with three of them to the Campo Santo, where the Duke of Bourbon was leading the enemy to the assault. He thus relates the incident which has made his name famous in history:—"Levelling my arquebuse where I saw the thickest crowd of the enemy, I discharged it with a deliberate aim at a person who seemed to be lifted above the rest; but the mist prevented me from distinguishing whether he was on horseback or on foot. Then, turning suddenly about to Alessandro and Cecchino, I bade them fire off their pieces, and showed them how to escape every shot of the besiegers. Having accordingly fired twice for the enemy's once, I cautiously approached the walls, and perceived that there was an extraordinary confusion among the assailants, occasioned by our having shot the Duke of Bourbon; he was, as I understood afterwards, that chief personage whom I saw raised above the rest." Cellini and his brave companions regained the walls with some difficulty; and the former, having reached the ramparts of St. Angelo, found the garrison deserting their posts; "which vexed me to such a degree," he says, "that I took one of the matches, and getting some people to assist me, I directed the fire of the artillery where I saw occasion, and killed a considerable number of the enemy." The Imperialists were now entering the city, through which they spread terror and desolation. Cellini defended the castle by his own exertions until the evening, when Santa Croce was appointed to the command by Pope Clement, and posted him with five guns on the highest part of the fortress.

The castle was besieged from the 6th of May to the 5th of June, during which time slaughter and desolation, with every frightful accompaniment, devastated the city. During all this time, Cellini kept up a harassing fire on the Imperialists, and contributed much to the prolongation of the siege. When submission became inevitable, the pope, before flying to Orvieto, employed Cellini to remove his jewels from their settings, and melt down the gold. A few days afterwards the castle was surrendered, and the artist returned to Florence. Though he succeeded in compromising with the magistrates the affair which had caused him to fly from his native city, he remained there only a short time, and then set out for Mantua. There he only remained four months, during which time he made a silver ornament for the duke and a signet ring for Cardinal Gonzaga. His restlessness led him to return to Florence, where his father had died of the plague during his absence; and in that city he now resided some time, and was much employed by the Florentine aristocracy in setting jewels. At this time he made the acquaintance of Michael Angelo, of whom he speaks in terms of the highest praise.

Being informed that Pope Clement was desirous of employing him, Cellini again repaired to Rome, where he received a commission for a button for the pontifical cope; and executed it so much to the pope's satisfaction, that, besides being liberally remunerated, he was appointed to the lucrative post of stamp-master to the mint. His brother Francesco was killed about this time in an abbey near Rome; and the incident affords a picture of the lawlessness of the times, and the ease with which crimes were compromised by those who had money or influence to protect them. Cellini ascertained the name of the soldier by whom his brother had been shot, and attacking him in the street, wounded him in two places, and left him for dead. Yet no judicial inquiry was made, and Cellini, after concealing himself for a few days, showed himself at the Vatican again without being rebuked, and went about his accustomed avocations.

In 1531 Cellini was appointed one of the papal mace-bearers, an office which he held four years, and which added above two hundred crowns to his annual income. His holiness had promised him more lucrative preferment, but was often displeased by Cellini's proud and independent bearing; and when the seal-office was vacant, he conferred it on Sebastian del Piombo, the eminent painter. Partly through annoyance at this preference, it seems, and partly on account of some rough treatment he experienced from Cardinal Salviati, whom the pope had appointed his legate during a visit he made in 1532 to Bologna, Cellini delayed finishing a gold chalice, for which he had made a beautiful design. The warmth with which the pope reprimanded him on his return still further irritated the artist, and the chalice remained unfinished, Cellini declaring that he could not proceed without more gold, and his holiness refusing to supply him with it. At this time a goldsmith named Tobbia, who had been condemned to death for coining, was reprieved by Cardinal Salviati, and recommended by him to the pope, who gave him a commission which Cellini had expected himself. Shortly afterwards, in consequence of the calumnies of a rival artist, Cellini was deprived of his office of stamp-master to the mint, and ordered to send the unfinished chalice to the papal palace. This, however, he firmly refused to do, alleging that it was his own property, and all that his holiness could demand of him was five hundred crowns which he had received on account. The pope endeavoured to frighten him, by first ordering his arrest, and afterwards requiring him to pay the five hundred crowns immediately; but, finding that threats had no effect upon the artist's unbending nature, and that the money was forthcoming, he was obliged to be content with ordering him to finish the chalice as soon as he could.

The impetuosity of Cellini's temper led him into an act, soon afterwards, which compelled him to seek safety in flight, as on a former occasion. In the course of an altercation between an ingenious workman whom he had taken into partnership, and a notary named Benedeto, the latter applied an abusive epithet to Cellini, who threw a stone at him, which, striking him on the head, caused such an effusion of blood that the bystanders thought him killed. Pompeo, the jeweller who had before calumniated Cellini, happening to pass, saw what had taken place, and, hurrying to the palace, informed the pope that Cellini had slain Tobbia, the goldsmith. His holiness, in a great rage, ordered him to be arrested and hanged on the spot; but while the papal guards were looking for him, he was already on his way to Naples.

Pope Clement no sooner discovered that he had been misinformed, than he recalled Cellini to Rome, took him into favour again, and employed him to execute two medals, for which the artist had scouted by Madame d'Etampes and his rivals, Cellini at length made up his mind to quit France, and returned to Florence, where he was graciously received by Cosmo de' Medici, the grand duke. After some delay, a house to live in and a salary of 200 crowns per year were assigned him, and he immediately made the model for his admirable statue of Perseus (p. 345), which he afterwards cast in bronze. He relates that he met with great difficulty in carrying on the work, through the jealousy of the sculptor Bandinello; and at one time a conspiracy was formed to charge him with a horrible crime, which induced him to leave Florence for a time, and take Perseus first. In this he at length succeeded; and, in order to prove that he could work in marble as well as in metal, he commenced statues of Apollo, Hyacinthus, and Narcissus, which, however, he does not appear to have ever finished. He also executed a bronze bust of Altoviti, a merchant of Rome; and, while on a visit to that city to obtain payment, in which he was unsuccessful, he renewed his acquaintance with the celebrated Michael Angelo.

On his return to Florence from this visit, he experienced a cold reception from the duke, who had been prejudiced against him by his steward; and scarcely had he recovered the duke's favour when up his residence in Venice, where he passed most of his time in the society of the painter Titian and the sculptor and architect Sansovino.

After a short stay he returned to Florence. The Perseus proceeded slowly, owing to various difficulties which were thrown in his way; and he complained to the duke, which for a time had the desired effect. He made some small silver vases, and set some jewels for the duchess, who wished to occupy him entirely in that kind of work; but he was so desirous to prove himself the equal of Bandinello in sculpture, that he chose to complete the statue of he lost that of the duchess, for whom, with a lamentable want of principle, he represented an inferior string of pearls to the duke as being of great value, the duchess having set her mind on the ornament, and promised him two hundred crowns for the service. The duke possessed sufficient knowledge of pearls to know that Cellini was endeavouring to deceive him; and on being accused he confessed the whole affair, and thus rendered the duchess his implacable enemy. The breach was widened by his refusing to gratify her by placing the bronze figures intended to ornament the base of the statue of Perseus in her own apartment, and the artist often regretted having left France. The Perseus was at length set up in the great square, and elicited universal admiration. The pleasure which this afforded him was embittered by disputes with the duke about the remuneration he was to receive for the statue and his ornaments; and though his demand of ten thousand ducats was reduced by arbitration to three thousand five hundred gold crowns, the sum was paid him by small instalments, and a balance of five hundred was never liquidated.

The next great work of Cellini was a figure of Christ in white marble, upon a crucifix of black marble, which was greatly admired, and which he originally intended to have placed above his own tomb; but receiving an offer of fifteen hundred crowns for it from the duchess, he was induced to part with it, and it was placed

On the 16th of March, 1563, Cellini had the melancholy honour of being deputed to attend the obsequies of his friend, the illustrious Michael Angelo Buonarroti. The sculptor Ammanati was associated with him in this honour, while the printers of Florence were represented on the solemn occasion by Giorgio Vasari and Agnolo di Cosimo, called Bronzino.

Previously to his marriage, Cellini had adopted one Antonio Sptasenni, the son of a man of prodigate character, whose wife had served the artist as a model for his Medusa, and other female figures. The father being sentenced to imprisonment, his wife, with her infant, applied for assistance to Cellini, who not only maintained Sptasenni during his incarceration, but supported his family likewise; and at length adopted the child, intending, as he in the Palazzo Pitti. It is now in the church of the Escorial, at Madrid, having been presented to Philip II. by the grand duke Francesco I.

About the year 1560, Cellini married a female who was in his service at the time of casting the Perseus, and whom he mentions as the kindest and most prudent of women. She had nursed him with great care during a long and dangerous illness, which he attributes to poison given him by the wife of a farmer, of whom he had purchased a life-interest in a farm, and he had made a vow to marry her if he recovered. By her he had six children, two of whom died in their infancy. His autobiography terminates in 1562, when he was sixty-two years of age, and he does not appear to have been engaged in any work of much importance afterwards.

had then no son of his own, to make him a skillful artist. But the boy turned out so idle, intractable, and stupid, that Cellini could do nothing with him, and he became a friar.

After Cellini's marriage, Sptasenni, who had long resided at Pisa, came to Florence, and, contrary to the artist's desire, took the youth away with him. Cellini, upon this, having then a son of his own, renounced all further connexion with the Sptasenni family, and considered himself discharged from all further responsibility with regard to the son. But, in 1570, Sptasenni commenced an action against Cellini, to compel him to provide for the young man, and to secure for him a share of Cellini's property after his decease. It seems that Cellini allowed judgment to issue by default: for a sentence was given against him, which was annulled, however, upon petition to the duke, setting forth the real circumstances of the case.

The autobiography of the artist may be regarded as his latest production. He began to write them towards the end of the year 1758, and the greater part of them seems to have been submitted to the inspection of his friend Varchi, one of the Florentine literati, in less than six months afterwards. The manuscript, now in the Laurentian library at Florence, consists of 519 folio pages, unnumbered only in part, with a rough cover of parchment, and tied with bands of the same material. On the cover is written, "The book of Andrea de' Lorenzo Cavalcanti;" and on the first page, "This most precious book was ever held in the highest esteem by the good and, to me, always dear, Signor Andrea Cavalcanti, my father, who would permit no one to copy it; resisting even the repeated solicitations made to him by his most serene and reverend highness the Prince Cardinal Leopold of Tuscany, etc., because Lone in its happy realms one Phoenix dwells, Lives to itself, parent and offspring both,—

So by the world is prized: rare worth is both
To court applause; what's each one's rankly smells."

On the back of this is written, in Cellini's own hand, a memorandum respecting the manuscript, and a sketch of his life. The autobiography commences on the second folio, and appears by the memorandum to have been written by the son of Signor de Gara Vestri, as dictated by Cellini, as far as page 490. Then come three pages and a half in an unknown hand; the remainder being in the writing of Cellini himself. At the end are five blank pages, except the first, on which are the words, "I afterwards went to Pisa."

That this is the original manuscript which Cellini sent to Varchi for his revision, there seems no reason to doubt; for his handwriting appears in several places. Cavalcanti made a gift of the work to his friend Redi; and at the commencement of the present century it was found in a bookseller's shop in Florence, and subsequently bequeathed, with other MSS., to the Laurentian library.

Honore Walpole regarded the autobiography of Cellini as "more amusing than any novel;" and the Italian literati have carried their admiration of it to the highest pitch, describing it as "the most entertaining book in the whole compass of their national literature. His intimacy with the great Italian painters and sculptors, and his intercourse with the king of France and the emperor, with the popes and the Medici, military commanders and dignified ecclesiastics, afforded him opportunities of making the most interesting observation; and, as a picture of society at the period in which he lived, the work is invaluable.

He died on the 15th of February, 1570, and was buried, by his own direction, in the chapter house of the Nunziata, with a grand funeral ceremony, which was attended by all the members of the Academy of Drawing. Besides his life, he wrote a treatise on goldsmiths' work, and several poems, which, however, are not above mediocrity.

SELF-DENIAL;

OR,

PASSAGES OF A LIFE.

BY A WAYFARER.

III.

For a moment I felt all the shame and mortification of one detected in some disgraceful crime. I stood, wishing myself annihilated, while Edith sank into a chair. There was a moment of dead silence; of silence quite painful. I felt it could not last, and I was anxious to break it myself. Charles prevented me.

"Ever since I have been in this house, six months before you came here, Edward, I loved this girl. For her it is I have had courage, for her it is I have driven; and now that I come the herald of somewhat better news, I find my hopes dashed to the ground."

"Mr. Ogilvy," said Edith, rising, and though suffused with blushes, speaking in a firm and resolute tone, "I never had the least suspicion of this."

"Then why were you my friend, why did you defend me against your mother, and keep me here though I was a pauper?"

'Twas pity—pity for the poor starving student. Hail! hail! 'Tis mighty pleasant and consoling!"

"Mr. Ogilvy," again said the dear girl—her face showing all the pain she felt—"I always respected you as a friend. If I induced my mother to let your rent run on, it was because I knew you would honourably pay her. There was no occasion for pity."

"Edith," said Charles, taking her hand, and bursting into tears, "you are an angel. The past cannot be recalled. I should not have been the timid fool I have."

"I assure you, Mr. Ogilvy—I never thought—I never suspected."

"And why should you?" resumed he, with one of his old laughs. "Dumb courtships, I see, my dear Edward, will not do. But come, let us sit down and talk the matter over. You have scolded the matter in a rapid way I never should have dreamt of. No excuses, no apologies. It is I who beg your pardon for my violence. But you see, Edward, for the dream of a whole year to vanish in one moment was, to say the least, trying. It is over now. You are a brave, good couple; may you be happy!"

"Generous and good always!" I cried.

"A truce to compliments. What I want to know is, how this came about. I suppose you have had some good news to elate you, eh?"

I told him the exact truth.

"I am very glad to hear it," he said, when I had finished—"very glad. Now for my news. My mother has had a legacy left her, quite unexpectedly. She has sent me fifty pounds of it. Now, young people, I am for marrying at once. Mr. Edward here, has about a pound a-week, he is clever, he has an opening, he will make his way. I suppose all you will want will be a couple of rooms. I will furnish them, and the author must pay me when he can."

I would not hear of such a sacrifice. But Charles insisted so gravely and so earnestly, that we gave way; and then came the great question of the parents. I felt sick at heart as I reflected that I could not communicate with my father and mother. To this marriage I felt they would never give their consent. I was not sorry, therefore, to be spared the pain of being refused.

"I will undertake Mrs. Ellis," said Charles, smiling. "I am going to pay her in advance until Christmas. That will give me weight, I can tell you. Are you engaged this afternoon, Edith?"

"No," said the young girl, blushing.

"Here is a ticket to see the Panorama of London," he continued. "Go and get ready, and ask Mrs. Ellis to have her receipt ready up to Christmas."

Edith, glad to find herself free, escaped with the utmost rapidity. We were alone.

"Edward," said my earnest friend, "I love you more than ever. It was a bitter discovery to make; but she is a noble girl, and she has chosen well. Now, Edward, take my advice. Begin very humbly. The career of a literary man is one of the most difficult. It is a rough and tortuous one; and yet it has its pleasures and advantages. You will succeed, if you are not in a hurry."

"But already am I falling into debt, my dear Charles," I replied.

"There is no such thing as debt between real friends. You will do for me what I have done for you, when you can. Recollect that I shall be always to be found; and as you love me, Edward, never borrow half-a-crown of an acquaintance. Most men will lend; but a half-crown borrowed inconsiderately has cost many a man months of idleness. You cannot deny yourself to a man to whom you owe money. There is much truth in what Shakspeare makes old Polonius say to his son, Laertes:—

'Neither a borrower nor a lender be;

For loan oft loseth both it-self and friend,

And borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry.'

"You speak warmly, Charles," I said.

"I speak from experience. Debt is the curse of the idle and improvident—a mill-stone about the neck of many a struggling sufferer, who has to pay all his life long the penalty of his youthful folly and extravagance."

"You don't think of your self, Charles," I said; "your whole thoughts are on us. You will remain here?"

"Certainly. I shall continue to reside with your mother and father, who is a very excellent woman at heart, Edith told me. She is a child born and bred; but letting bad habits go, I don't, have a poor even the best of us. Nobody should start in it but those who have had experience in childhood. To be continually on the watch for money, suspicious and exacting, often to be deceived, is a terrible work."

"And Ellis himself?" I asked.

"He has been an officer and, I believe, a gentleman. He was shelved on half-pay, I fear from too great liking for the bottle. He was in a drinking regiment, and learnt the habit. He's not, mind you, a regular drunkard, but he wastes a small income at the tavern. He fancies himself at the mess-table. Besides, the house is all let but the kitchen, and the poor man is half driven out."

I looked very grave at this description. It was too many of the loose habits unfortunately contracted by too many on entering the army at an early age that my father had objected to. He had painted the fatal weakness of young men in giving way in a manner that I thought exaggerated.

"Edward," he had said in conclusion, "my ambition is to see my son a good man and a Christian; therefore it is that I prefer a profession where there is less temptation."

All this made little or no impression on me at the time, for as the words rose in judgment against me, I had a more practical proof of the possibility of what my father said. I knew that it was wrong to be indolent, a whole body of the faults of a few; still I could not deny that my father was right to keep me out of temptation.

Edith returned shortly, dressed in a plain white frock that became her much. She was rosy with blushes, and, as I thought, never had looked so beautiful. It was little then to be wounded at, that all regrets vanished as I descended the stairs with my dear little affianced wife.

It is hard to say which is the happiest day of our lives, when there are really so very many that are happy. But I believe we are generally right when we select that on which we first know of the gentle affection of a woman, as at all events one of the happiest. It is one of those days we never forget, and look back upon it is always pleasant in the most arid and gloomy hour of existence.

I do not believe either of us saw much of the sight we went to see. For my part I recollected nothing about it the same evening. We wandered about, her arm leaning on mine, sometimes talking of the future, but oftener silent, unless when we joined to sing the praises of our friend and benefactor. At last we remembered that it was time to return.

Edith turned a little pale, and I could tell that her heart was beating violently as we came up to the door of No. 13. I showed her up as well as I could, though, to say the truth, I did feel a little like a soldier going into his first engagement. But it was my duty to support and cheer her. I therefore assumed the virtue which of all others I had not at that moment.

"Courage, dearest," said I, with a very poor attempt at a satisfied smile. "All will be well. Charles is a good friend. I fear nothing."

He himself opened the door.

"All goes well," he exclaimed, as his eyes beamed with delight.

I pressed his hand, but could not find a word. He hid none of himself, but opened the door of the front parlour, at that moment unlet, and we were ushered into the presence of the parents. The father was a handsome man of about forty-seven, with a countenance which I appeared to have seen before. He was a little shabby, and a little flurried, but he was quite sober, though there was a bottle of brandy before him.

Mrs. Ellis was a little round, and temperate woman, and, however, a look of care on her countenance, which was in part explained by her battle with the world. The poor woman had seven children, of whom Edith was the eldest. It was in order to keep them, and provide them with schooling, that Mrs. Ellis let lodgings.

"I am proud, sir, to make your acquaintance," said the ex-captain, in a voice that would have been hoarse, had he not been husky from drink. "Mr. Ozbly has apprised us of the honour you desire to confer upon us."

"Rather abrupt," thought I. But I supposed the captain had not considered his acceptance in the parlour of the "Fountain."

"Ozbly," said Mr. Ellis, gravely, "this gentleman has been a very good friend to us in these."

"Not at all," I said, "I have only let Mr. Ellis accept of my case. It is with a view to reap the inestimable favour of becoming a member of your family, that I have claimed the honour—the honour."

"Sit down," said Charles, with a sigh, "it's all settled. I have told Mr. and Mrs. Ellis over, and all they require is, that you should make them child happy. I have given you a numerous character—you have got to keep up to it."

"You are both very young," put in Mrs. Ellis, "and, so tenderly, I could not believe it was the same person who peeped shyly on the stairs, to noisy lodger, and crying children; and yet, if you have industry and economy, it is perhaps to be so. Mr. Ozbly talks of a month's house. You are very soon then to leave me, Edith."

"I never said I would marry in a month," began Edith, looking quite frightened.

"But," said Charles, rather gravely, "it is a fact on time."

Edith bowed her head, rosy with blushes, half anger, half tears, and made no reply.

"I think it necessary," I began, in a sudden thought struck me, "to explain, that, having come away from home, for private reasons, I have come to London under a fictitious name. My real appellation is Edward Milham."

The husband and wife gazed at each other with a strange look, which, however, did not prevent my continuing.

"And I am the eldest son of the Reverend Edward Milham. At my mother's death, I am entitled to three hundred a year."

There was a profound silence for a moment, and then Mr. and Mrs. Ellis left the room, taking Charles with them. Edith and I were left alone. The abruptness of her parents certainly surprised the dear girl, but I left her little time to think. My tongue was loosened at last, and I gave it full swing. I repeated a dozen times the same thing. I painted our happy little home. I built a thousand castles in the air, and I drew her attention by my words that she forgot all else.

Presently, after quite an hour's absence, they came back.

"Edward," said Charles, gravely, "Mr. and Mrs. Ellis consider it necessary to reciprocate your confidence. If Edith becomes your wife, it must be as Miss Furtham's family reasons, principally paid about lodging, letting, having induced them to take an assumed name. But Edith must, like yourself, be married in her real name."

I listened with considerable surprise, a faint glimmering of some strange fancy coming over me, as I heard the words; but as Charles gave no further explanation, I did not give utterance to my thoughts, but sat down at the invitation of my new friends to tea. Edith made it, and blushed a good deal, too, at her father's odd looks. He joked her in the most quiet way possible about her naturally look at the tea-table; wondered what the world would come to, when children of sixteen thought of marriage, and I kept the poor girl in a state of half pleasure, half vexation.

Charles, in one of his rambles, had found a quiet little inn, a cottage at the foot of Bungstead Hill. I was quite sure he had looked at it with a view to taking it for himself, and the same dear girl, who now was to be mine. But I never even hinted at anything of the kind. The poor fellow had so miserably believed the old saying, one idea of his soul was well kept, that he had taken Edith's many kindnesses as a sign of love.

I saw a deep blush suffuse Mrs. Brown's face, when the wedding was over. I was glad to hear his reply, but I knew, however, that he had broken his promise, and next time we went to see it was to be the rough ploughman's.

I received a letter from Mrs. and Edith, both in my paper, so I could not get any of it. With this I paid the expenses of the wedding, and I made a bargain with them, to not paid for a quarter before, and I was to be paid for the future, and I was to be paid for the future.

I was to be paid for the future, and I was to be paid for the future.

ENAMEL PAINTING.

The engraving which we now present to our readers, is taken from a beautiful specimen of enamel preserved in the Museum of the Louvre. It is a large rectangular plate, containing an oval medallion about twenty inches in length and sixteen in breadth. It is the work of the celebrated Bernard Palissy, and represents the destruction of the Israelites by fiery flying serpents. The flesh of the various figures introduced is of white enamel; the vestments are coloured either brown or green. The figure that lies upon the a third with a lute, and a fourth with a pipe or flute. The figures in the lower corners of the piece are separated by a long medallion of an oval form. The variety of colours introduced presents a very pleasing appearance to the eye. The ground-work of the plate is blue. The reverse is not in enamel. The frame is of carved oak.

The style of the composition, and the general beauty both of the colouring and execution, render this work of the great Palissy particularly interesting; but, apart from the merit of the work itself, earth in the very front of the design, and whose form is half covered by a robe, is particularly well executed, the garment, which is yellow, contrasting well with the other tones of the colouring. The vestments of the female figure near the tree is blue. The whole composition is contained within an ornamental border; it is decorated with a variety of devices in yellow, here and there enriched with a fantastic head in yellow blue. At the corners of the enamel are represented full-length figures, playing on various musical instruments—one with a species of bass-viol, another with a guitar, the fact of its being the production of the potter would be enough to render it valuable. The story of the life of "poor Master Bernard of the Tuileries" is full of interest and instruction. The struggle of the good man to perfect his art, the troubles he endured to complete his experiments, and the sorrows which came upon Master Bernard for conscience sake, that sent him to the Bastille, and were nigh dragging him from thence to meet the flames;—all these things have made Master Palissy a hero—a hero of the right kind.

THE TOWN OF HUY.

Huy, a town of Belgium, in the province of Liege, stands on the shores of the little river Hoyoux, from which it derives its name. The position of the town is remarkably picturesque, and the hills around are clothed with luxuriant vines. The quaint old houses, picture not easily surpassed for beauty, and not readily forgotten when once seen.

The chroniclers of the middle ages, and writers of modern times as well, claim for the town of Huy a good old age; it was founded, the heavy roof, the casement windows, the small bridge with its light railing, the little stream, so clear and still, the trees and creeping plants that have overgrown the rustic wall, and, towering above everything else, the church of Notre-Dame—a noble building that has stood there for more than seven centuries—present a so they say, in the first century of the Christian era, and for this assertion they appear to have a very conclusive authority. We say, that it was known in the seventh century, that is, on a point at all. It was a great place in the days of Charles the Great, and the most important town in the Belgic provinces of the empire.

its glory has departed. Before the year 1795 it contained fourteen parishes, one collegiate church, two abbys, and seventeen convents; now the number of parishes is reduced to five, and the population is estimated at eight thousand.

In the Church of the Crusaders is the tomb of Peter the Hermit, but the Church of Notre Dame is the principal ecclesiastical edifice. The castle, built upon a rock, commands the city and the river Meuse, which divides the town into two parts and is spanned by a stone bridge of seven arches. This castle is of very ancient origin, but a great part of the first building was destroyed by Henry II. of France.

SIGNS AND OMENS.

Along with our Saxon ancestors there came into England some of the strangest notions and oddest fancies that we can well conceive. Albion had, without doubt, plenty of wild, unearthly stories when her sons razed the forest, before those forests echoed to the tramp of the Roman legions. And no doubt from the City of the Seven Hills there came new superstitions, more wild and terrible than the wood-coloured savages had ever heard of before. Paganical serpent-eggs, and the rest of the mistletoe mysteries, were followed by the nymphs of the mountains, at the very sight of whom sane men were driven mad. But with the Saxons came an entirely new class of superstitions, some of them full of horror, some light and cheerful, some terrible as was ever giant-goblin story to a child's fancy; others beautiful and gay as the fables that slept in the bell-flowers and floated on the zephyr. The chief part of the fancies, however, being those we are about to mention here, were connected with the most ordinary affairs of life, and invested every little circumstance with a peculiar and awful meaning. They beset the daily life of every man, woman and child in the country; and many of them are still preserved amongst us. Of course these things are now slighted, and, except he be a very unlettered peasant indeed, a man does not turn back in dismay at the sight of three magpies; but once these things were received as positively true, and were regarded with as much certainty as we might count on a tide or a change of the moon.

Imagine a man believing that all these little circumstances—the falling of a stone, the ticking of a death-watch, a tingling in the ear, a shivering sensation in the back, or any other similar trivial occurrence—really betokened some good or evil fortune, what a strange sort of a life he must lead!

A stork settles on a gable of his house. Welcome. To kill the bird would be open sacrilege, for the stork is a harbinger of happiness. He receives the visit with a feeling of delight, and hails it as a promise of good luck. When he goes out, a strange dog follows him: here again is another sign of prosperous fortune. A strange dog never follows any person without good luck speedily coming on the favoured one. Welcome to the dog. When night sets in, the man looks up on the shining points in the heavens, the jewels of the night, and notices a shooting star. Good luck again. He forms a wish before the star has disappeared, and the wish is certain to be gratified. Moreover, our friend is lucky altogether: he was born with a caul, and this is certain to render him remarkably fortunate, besides having the extraordinary effect of preserving anybody who buys it from a watery grave. People now-a-days are short of faith, and prefer life-preservers of another sort—such, for instance, as cork jackets. But our lucky friend, besides being born with a caul, having a stork on his house, a strange dog at his heels, and wishing himself good fortune as a shooting star flits over the face of the heavens, has found, unawares, some four-leaved clover, and on this account, as well as all the rest, is entitled to the best of luck all his life along. Fortunately, too, he has been seated, involuntarily, between a married couple at a dinner table, and this ensures a and at no distant date—within the twelvemonth, as sure as the zodiac.

"Hone, and in the cup of life That honey drop, a pleasing wife."

But our friend suffers from rheumatism. What is he to do?

Go to the doctor!—nothing of the sort. Let him steal a potato, or, if he objects to steal one, let him beg, but on no account buy, one. If he prefers a chestnut to a potato, a chestnut will answer just as well. As long as he retains either in his possession, he is a safe man. Still accidents may happen, and sitting next his dearest friend, our lucky man lets fall some grains of salt upon the table. Spilling salt betokens a strife between the person who spills it and the person next to whom he sits. What is our friend to do in order to avert the omen? He must lift up carefully, very carefully, not leaving a single grain, the salt that is spilt, with his knife, and throw it over his shoulder. Nothing else will avert disaster. But what if he upsets the salt-cellar altogether? This signifies a shipwreck, and our friend may look out for squalls; there is fine weather now, but a storm is brewing, and the gallant little "Triton," with a gooily cargo, will meet with accident—no doubt of that.

While our friend is thinking of these things, and trembling for his "Triton," bound to the bottom as sure as ever scuttled ship was doomed, he feels a tingling in his ear. This satisfies him that some are talking about him. But what can they be saying? Are they telling up his good deeds, numbering his excellent qualities, writing up his virtues—like tombstone grief; or are they pointing out his weakness, condemning his vices, ridiculing his absurdities, and writing him down an ass? Which ear is it tingles? The right; then are his excellencies exalted. A tingling in the right ear is always a good omen. But, unfortunately, it is in the left—there is no mistake about it; the most subtle casuist cannot make left right, and right left. The talker talks with no respect of persons: he condemns our friend as a scoundrel, whispers all the idle gossip of the town, tells all the prattle—such prattle as people love to hear, though it be foul and dirty, and black as ink. All the stories that our friend would have kept secret are blazing forth, and he knows very well that the circle of listeners,

"Whatever they hear are sure to spread
East and west and north and south,
Like the ball which, according to Captain Z.,
Went in at his ear and came out at his mouth."

When the left ear tingles, people talk ill of us; if it be so, some people's left ears must never leave off tingling. But what is to be done? Charm for charm. Our friend must bite his little finger; the evil speaker's tongue will be in the same predicament. Don't spare the little finger.

Our friend has been relating a remarkable story, the visitors have been all listening anxiously. "Is it true, is he quite satisfied of its authenticity?" Quite. Up stands our friend, when his chair falls backward, and falls on the ground with a crash. There is an audible titter. Our friend colours "rubbier than the cherry." What does it mean? The falling of a chair is a sure sign that the person who sat in it has been guilty of untruth. Our friend is about to present a very choice knife to a fair acquaintance, but he knows very well that it may sever their friendship for ever. To give cold steel, scissors or knives, separates friendship between even the dearest friends. Therefore, some money, no matter how small a piece, must be paid—holy paid—and the affair be regarded as a purchase. Salt, also, must not be given; it must be bought, else unthought-of calamity is sure to follow. Our friend has plucked a water lily, that spread its broad leaves and white and yellow cups upon the water. No harm is done by this; but he has unfortunately slipped and fallen while he had it in his hand. What will be the result? Perhaps a bruise or two; nothing of the sort—but he will now be subject to fits. Moreover, he happens to have cut his finger rather deeply, and the manner which he takes to cure the wound is as simple as it is remarkable. He anoints the knife with oil, puts it into a drawer, and allows it to remain there for some days. Sympathetically the cut is cured. Our friend, likewise, entertains the notion that if he goes under a ladder he stands the chance of being hanged; that the consequence of such an imprudent act will in all probability be a long cord and a short shirt. Then, being once or twice detected talking to himself—like a modern Prince of Denmark—he is confirmed in the idea, for to soliloquise is the sure precursor of a violent death. And as our friend occasionally feels a cold shivering sensation in his back, he begins to understand that his time is near, and that somebody is walking over his grave.

Such are a few of the odd fancies which our Sages of the other left us as an heir to me. Signs and omens, such as ancient Romans might have gathered from the flight of birds, and other omens from the writhings of a snake in a victim, our Sages and Sages scattered in every trifling circumstance of daily life. Such fancies are still retained in Holland, and in Germany, and here, in the East, are not forgotten. It seems, therefore, probable, that about the middle of the Twentieth Century."

Should have entered the mind of man, but that they have been swept by all all-dipity, and have only been found in an occasional chapter of the delusions of the olden time.

EGYPTIAN ANTIQUITIES.

More controversy has taken place among men of science as to the physical character of the ancient Egyptians. It may be thought that of a people so ancient abundant testimony would be found in the works of the Greek travellers and historians, but the difficulty has been created by the conflicting statements of those writers, rather than by their silence on the subject. Volney maintains that they were negroes, and found his opinion on passages in the works of Herodotus, Æschylus, and Lucian. Ammianus Marcellinus says they were, for the most part, of a brownish colour; and in an old Egyptian document in the Berlin Museum, in which the several parties are described by their external appearance, one is called black or dark brown (the word may be rendered either way), and the other yellow or honey-coloured. Dr. Prichard infers from these accounts, that the ancient Egyptians were a dark-skinned people, and that, at the same time, great varieties of colour existed among them, as is the case with the modern Hindus and Abyssinians.

Bacon gives the following description, founded upon a general examination of Egyptian statues, busts, and bas-reliefs:—"They had delicate and voluptuous forms; countenances soft and pliant; round and soft features; with eyes long, almond-shaped, half shut, and languishing, and turned up at the outer angles, as if habitually fatigued by the light and heat of the sun; cheeks round; thick lips, full and prominent; mouths large, but closed and smiling; complexion dark, ruddy, and coppery; and the whole aspect displaying, as one of the most graphic delineations among modern travellers has observed, the genuine African character, of which the negro is the exaggerated and extreme representation."

The figures which illustrate this article afford some specimens of the characters exhibited by Egyptian sculptures. The originals are in the Egyptian Gallery in the Louvre. Fig. 1 represents two unknown persons, probably husband and wife, as may be indicated by the figure of a child between them. There is nothing to indicate that these figures represent deities, royal persons, or indeed any persons of distinction; probably the man held some civil employment under the Pharaohs.

Fig. 2 is a statue in black granite, without a head, of which it has been deprived by accident. It was found on the site of the ancient Sais, and is considered a fine specimen of ancient Egyptian art. The attitude and the execution are superior to the majority of Egyptian statues; and we may here remark that the sculptors of ancient Egypt represented upright figures less often than those which are seated. There is an inscription on this statue, from which we learn that it represents Horus, the son of Psammetichus, and a military chief.

The ancient Egyptian artists sometimes represented men kneeling before a kind of altar on which their deities were represented in relief. We give two examples of this kind of sculpture. Fig. 3 is a statuette in stone, of heavy workmanship, representing a high functionary, called in the inscription, "Babilus Grammatas, chief of the cavalry of the lord of two worlds, and guardian of the royal legs," kneeling before an altar, in a niche of which is a figure in relief of the god Osiris. Fig. 4 is a kneeling figure in black granite, supporting before him a serpent (Beneb), in which three divinities are seated. The inscription on the upright slab at the back of the kneeling figure intimates that it is that of Eusanr, the son of Anuwer, who, among other titles, is called, "Chief of the cities of the meridional country."

Fig. 5 represents an individual kneeling in the New Kingdom's inscription, Seneferu, prophet and priest of the white goddess. The prophets were not in the first rank of the sacerdotal class, and were ranked after the arch-prophets, and the grammateus attended to the worship of deified kings. This statue, which is regarded as one of the most precious specimens of the Egyptian art, is made of black stone, and appears to have been executed in the earliest period of the Egyptian art. The position is simple, and the style is of antique rude. The head is round, the shoulders rather like the back, presents an appearance of strength, the articulation of the face is robust. The somewhat remarkable head-dress is spotted black, and a green band is drawn under the eye.

Fig. 6 is a representation of a bas-relief in calcareous stone, from the tomb of Seti I., a member of the nineteenth dynasty, and a fourteenth century before the Christian era. The name, on these of Seti, the goddess Hathor, supposed by Champollion to have been the Egyptian Venus, but more probably another name for Isis. Though both figures are in profile, the eyes, as was usual with the ancient artists, are represented full. The king has a youthful appearance; he wears a kind of seat, the fibres of which are arranged with regularity, and somewhat terminated in spirals. His forehead is adorned in front with a serpent, and he wears bracelets on his wrists, and a collar of four rows of cow-horns. His right hand holds the left hand of the goddess, and his left hand rests on a lotus which she holds out to him. The head-dress of the goddess is of great richness, and is surmounted by a collar of a between cow-horns, from which a serpent hangs. She wears a collar of cow-horns from the knees. Her arms are round and adorned with bracelets and amulet; her feet are also bare, and ornamented with girdles. Her robe fits very closely to her form, and is curiously ornamented with figures and symbols. Her ears in ancient times were; the latter very large, thus translated; "I shall be of justice, I will not of the many years, and I will be like that of the sun." Offspring of the sun, friend of the gods, Seti, the lord of Eternity, live for ever! Lord of two worlds, establisher of justice, we give thee many years, and thousands of generations. Thy wife, offspring of the sun, lady of diadem, Hathor, the friend of Ptah, regarded as the sun, lord of two worlds, lady of Hathor, in that she always the land of peace and truth."

It has been commonly when Egypt is mentioned, and was used by the ancient Egyptians to designate the power or principle by which the universe was originated and provided over. Sometimes it was called Oneph, denoting a good genius; and it was represented symbolically by the figure of a serpent with its tail in its mouth, an emblem of eternity.

Figure 7 is a fragment of a bas-relief in calcareous stone, representing a funeral scene. The mother of the deceased has her hand to her head, with grief expressed in her countenance, perhaps to cover her hair with dust, according to ancient usage. A priest clings the funeral urn, and beholds him three persons utter exclamations of grief or repeat the chorus of the hymn. In another compartment aquatic birds and plants are represented, an offering, but conveys the oblation across the lake water to the lake of death. In a representation of a funeral on a similar bas-relief, the king, the Pharaoh of the dead, and his family are seated round the table, below a table covered with offerings and plants, in a compartment, the only example of the representation of a banquet or repast, of the Egyptian art.

If we may form an idea of the workmanship of the modern Egyptians from the paintings found in their tombs, and from the bas-reliefs of the monuments, we shall be surprised to find that they have a most successful and judicious use of the light and shade. The colouring is not so brilliant as that of the ancient Egyptian art. The reds are not so bright as those of the olden time, and the greens are not so rich. The figures are not so full and rounded, and the lines are not so bold and expressive. The figures are not so full and rounded, and the lines are not so bold and expressive. The figures are not so full and rounded, and the lines are not so bold and expressive.

brown. "This red colour," says Dr. Prichard, "is evidently intended to represent the complexion of the people, and is not put on in the want of a lighter paint, or flesh colour; for when the limbs or bodies are represented as seen through a thin veil, the tint used resembles the complexion of Europeans. The same shade might have been generally adopted if a darker one had not been preferred, as more truly representing the national complexion of the Egyptian race."

The Copts, who are well known to be the descendants of the ancient Egyptians, have yellowish-brown complexions, and features which bear considerable resemblance to those of mulattoes; and Denon says he was struck with the resemblance of the Copts to the old Egyptian sculptures. Mr. Ledyard, whose testimony is the more valuable as he had no theory to support, says: "I suspect the Copts to have been the origin of the negro race; the nose and lips correspond with those of the negro. The hair, wherever I can see it among the people here, is curled, not like that of the negroes, but like the mulattoes." This description agrees with those of Volney, Lotry, and Pagnet; and the preservation of their language shows that the Coptic race has undergone very little change since the days of the Pharaohs.

CELEBRATED SPRINGS.

SPRINGS are interesting objects, whether we regard them as entering into the composition of picturesque scenery, in which character they appeal to the eye of the artist and the lover of the beautiful in nature, or as associated with classical and modern poetry, or with the bygone events chronicled by the historians of the olden time. Whether gushing forth from the rock, and sparkling in the sunlight as their waters fall into their natural basin—or murmuring in the seclusion of some deep glen, half concealed by feathery ferns—or rising in the arid desert, to slake the thirst of the camel and his tawny rider, to whom the palm which invariably grows beside it affords a welcome shade—a spring is one of the most beautiful objects in nature. No wonder, then, that the active and poetic imagination of the old Greeks placed the springs of their country under the guardianship of the Nymphs, and that their feeling of the beautiful led them to believe that the nymphs were grieved and displeased by the pollution of the sparkling waters which the gods had placed under their protection. What reader of classical literature has not heard of the fountain to which Ulysses was directed to go, to find his herdsman, when he returned to his native country? This fountain, is about six miles in the interior of the island, the road leading to it ascending all the way. The water is continually percolating through the superincumbent rock at the top of a ravine, and falls into a small basin. The sides of the ravine are covered with evergreens and odoriferous shrubs, and before the spring stands a broken and crumbling arch, through which may be seen the blue waters of the Ægean sea. The summit of the rock, above the spring, commands an extensive and beautiful view of the islands and distant mountains of Greece. The goat-herds of the islands quench their thirst at this spring, which flows as brightly now as in the days of Homer, three thousand years ago.

Dobwell, who visited this spot, describes its waters as clear and good, trickling gently from a small cave in the rock, which is covered with a smooth and downy moss. It has formed a pool four feet deep, against which a modern wall is built, to check its overflowing. After oozing through an orifice in the wall, it falls into a wooden trough, placed there for cattle. In the winter it overflows, and finds its way, in a thin stream, through the glen to the sea. The French had possession of Ithaca in 1798, and the rocks of the Arcthusian fountains are covered with republican inscriptions.

Who also has not heard of the Castalian spring on Mount Parnassus, in which the priestess of Delphos laved her limbs, and from which she was supposed to derive her inspiration? Of the former magnificence of the city and temple which in ancient times occupied this site not a vestige can now be discovered; but Parnassus still rears its rocky summit to the sky, and the Castalian spring still pours forth its sparkling waters.

"The shrine hath shrunk! but thou—unchanged art thou!"

Mount of the voice and vision, robed with dreams!

Unchanged, and rushing through the radiant air,

With thy dark waving pines, and flashing streams.

And all thy founts of song! Their bright course seems

With inspiration yet; and each dim haze,

Or golden cloud, which floats around thee, seems

As with its mantle veiling from our gaze

The mysteries of the past, the gods of elder days!"

A small shallow basin on the margin of the rill is pointed out as the bath of the Pythoness, which is fed by the cascade descending through a cleft of Parnassus, as the snow on its summit is dissolved. This probably accounts for the extreme coldness of the water. The poetic expression, "Castalian dew," refers to the spray of the cascade. In accordance with the common practice of erecting edifices for Christian worship on the spots consecrated by the traditions and myths of the older creed, a chapel, dedicated to St. John, now rises by the side of the Castalian spring, the picturesqueness of which is further increased by a large fig-tree, which produces an agreeable shade, and a profusion of flowering shrubs and trailing or pendulous ivy.

In the desert of Northern Arabia may still be observed some of the springs at which the Israelites halted in their long and toilsome journey from Egypt to Palestine, still shaded by a few palms, and objects of contention to the wild tribes who wander from oasis to oasis with their flocks and herds. Sometimes the water is bitter and brackish; and we read in the Mosaic narrative, that "when they came to Marah, they could not drink of the waters, for they were bitter." The juice of a plant, however, rendered them palatable. There is reason for supposing the spot mentioned to be the spring Hawarah, a small basin of brackish and rather bitter water, near which Dr. Robinson found several bushes of a low-growing, thorny plant, producing red berries of an acid flavour, which are found a corrective to the unpleasant qualities of the water. "And they came to Elish, where were twelve wells of water, and threescore and ten palm-trees." This spot has been identified with Wady Gharamel, a slight depression in the wide desert, with a copious spring in the bottom, producing a small rivulet, and surrounded by date-palms, tamarisks, and acacias. Though twelve wells cannot be traced at present, the circumstance does not militate against the identification of Elish with Wady Gharamel, as wells are frequently filled up by the drifting of the sand.

In the upper part of the Valley of Jehoshaphat is a spring dedicated to the Virgin, the waters of which flow through a subterranean channel cut in the solid rock into the Pool of Silwan, an artificial reservoir, fifty-three feet long by eighteen broad. From thence the water is led off to irrigate the gardens and orchards in the valley. The waters of this spring exhibit the remarkable phenomenon of flowing at intervals, in a manner analogous to the flux and reflux of the tides of the ocean. Jerome first called attention to the circumstance, towards the close of the fourth century; but most modern travellers have discredited the story. Among the inhabitants of Jerusalem, however, the belief in the ebb and flow of the water is universal; and Dr. Robinson was enabled, a few years ago, to verify it by his own observations.

"As we were preparing to measure the basin of the upper fountain," says he, "and explore the passage leading from it, my companion was standing on the lower step, with one foot on it, and the other on a loose stone lying in the basin. All at once he perceived the water running into his shoe; and, supposing the stone had rolled, he withdrew his foot to the step, which, however, was also covered with water. This instantly excited our curiosity; and we now perceived the water rapidly bubbling up from under the lower step. In less than five minutes it had risen in the basin nearly or quite a foot, and we could hear it gurgling off through the interior passage. In ten minutes more it had ceased to flow, and the water in the basin was again reduced to its former level. Thrusting my staff in under the lower step, whence the water appeared to come, I found that there was here a large hollow space; but no further examination could be made without removing the steps. Meanwhile, a woman of Kefti-Selwan came to wash at the fountain. She was accustomed to frequent the place every day; and from her we learnt that the flowing of the water occurs at irregular intervals—sometimes two or three times a day, and sometimes, in summer, once in two or three days. She said, she had seen the fountain dry, and men and flocks, dependent upon it, gathered around and suffering from thirst; when all at once the water would begin to boil up from under the steps, and on the side from the bottom in the interior part, and flow off in a copious stream."

The British Museum hereafter becomes distinguished among other flowing wells, of which some examples are found in England, though the phenomenon does not appear to have any regular periodicity.

THE MALAYAN SUN-BEAR.

COLLETTES MALAYANES.

Nor many years have elapsed since the appearance of a dancing bear, with the indispensable accompaniment of a monkey, was by no means an uncommon occurrence in the streets of London. But the march of progress has introduced new police-mets, and before these many of the sights and sounds familiar to our childhood have either wholly disappeared, or become very unimportant. None appear to have succeeded more completely to the strong hand of the law than our shaggy friend, Bruin. Punch occasionally gets an audience together at the corner of some side street, where the old jokes appear to have lost none of their piquancy; the Fantoccini, with its wonderful dancing skeleton that falls to pieces, and throws its head up to the top of the stage in such a surprising manner, is still to be seen now and then in our thoroughfares; the monkey, even have held their ground to a certain extent, but the bear and the camel, the most wonderful of our early street reminiscences, appear to have departed forever.

Our children can only make the acquaintance of these animals in menageries and zoological gardens; but here we have abundance of evidence that the ursine race has not lost one particle of its popularity. The bear-pit is always surrounded by a delighted troop of youngsters, watching with the greatest interest the ineffectual movement of the shaggy brutes, which often look like a burlesque upon human action, and enticing them up to their uncomfortable position at the foot of the pole by the irresistible temptation of half a bun. But if the rising generation have some just cause for regret that their street opportunities of picking up a knowledge of natural history are somewhat curtailed, this disadvantage is certainly more than compensated for by the facilities afforded by the zoological gardens of the present day. Here, instead of the wandering showman with his scanty troop of animals, they may visit a magnificent collection of the rarest and most interesting creatures from all quarters of the globe; and for a guide in their inspection, instead of the "History of Three Hundred Animals," which was almost the only attainable zoological reading of our younger days, there are innumerable handbooks, of various degrees of excellence, which furnish the reader with the most recent information on the natural history of the animal creation.

The common bear of Europe (Ursus arctos), like all his relatives in the northern region of the earth, is clothed, as is well known, with a thick coat of long, shaggy hair, which serves to protect him from the severe cold to which he is so frequently exposed. But the bears inhabiting the countries lying between the tropics are usually destitute of this shaggy covering, and present a sleek and comfortable appearance, which contrasts remarkably with the rough exterior of our northern species. This is, however, by no means universally the case, for some of the bears from hot climates are as shaggy as their northern brethren, but these appear generally to inhabit mountainous districts, where they are exposed to considerable cold.

Of the short-haired bears of the Eastern Archipelago, for which Dr. Horsfield has proposed the formation of a genus, two species are known. One of these, the Malayan sun-bear (H. larctus Malayaensis), was first described by Sir Stamford Raffles, in the year 1821; and a specimen of it appears to have been brought to England about two years previously. This bear is found in the peninsula of Malacca, in the kingdom of Pegu, and in the islands of Java and Sumatra. It is called beruang by the Malays, a name which has a singular resemblance to our English beaver. The second species, the Bornean sun-bear (H. larctus borneensis), considered by some zoologists as a mere variety of the Malayan bear, is found in the great island of Borneo, and was described by Dr. Horsfield in 1825, from a specimen then living in the Royal Menagerie in the Tower of London, of the habits of which he gives a most interesting account. Both these species present a very striking similarity in form and colouring; both are of a deep glossy black, with the muzzle yellowish brown, and both have a large pale mark on the chest; but this in the Malayan bear is of a white colour, and usually takes the form of an irregular crescent, while in the Bornean species it is also a square and of deep orange colour.

From the northern bear, and especially from the great white bear of the arctic region (Thobas arcticus maritimus), which appears in its structure as in its habitation to present the greatest contrast with these tropical species, the Malayan and Bornean bears are especially distinguished by the great breadth of the skull, the portion occupied by the brain being almost globular, whilst in the northern species it is more oblong. In their manners and disposition, also, these animals contrast most favourably with their polar relative, and in a less degree with the intervening species. Dr. Horsfield has drawn a pleasing parallel between the two extremes. "The polar bear," he says, "lives in the most distant regions of the north, near the ocean, among ice and tempests. Its food is exclusively of an animal nature, and is supplied by fishes, seals, and the carcasses of whales. It passes more than half the year in a torpid state, and when it awakes exhibits an insuperable ferocity of disposition. Although repeatedly taken in a young state, no individual has ever been even partially domesticated. The voyagers to the northern regions abound with accounts of its courage and fierceness. It has often been found a dangerous and destructive enemy to man. The H. larctus, on the contrary, inhabits the most delightful and fertile regions of the globe. The range both of the Malayan and Bornean species appears to be limited to within a few degrees of the equator, and it is therefore with propriety designated as the equinoctial bear. Its food is almost exclusively vegetable, and it is often attracted to the society of man, by its fondness for the young protruding summits of the coconut trees. It appears therefore, not infrequently at the villages, and has in many instances been taken and made to submit to the confinements of a domestic life." It is to be observed, however, that the bear, although belonging to the order of carnivorous animals, generally subsist to a great extent upon vegetables, and that the polar bear is perhaps the only species confined exclusively to a flesh diet. The fondness of these animals for honey is proverbial, and the tropical species are not only endowed with the same taste, but appear to have many opportunities for indulging it. Several species of wild bees inhabit these favoured regions, and the bears will climb the highest trees with great agility in search of the sweet stores hid up by those industrious creatures, in devouring which their tongues, which are long, slender and flexible, appear to be of great service to them.

One remarkable peculiarity of these bears consists in the loose fleshy structure of the upper lip, which is equalled being protruded in the form of a short proboscis. When any article of food is held a little way beyond his reach, the animal will frequently extend this, as if to seize it, expanding his nostrils and moving his nose at the same time, in a manner which, as Dr. Horsfield observes, is very ludicrous. In this respect, however, the Malayan and Bornean bears are greatly surpassed by the species from the continent of India, called the Juggler's bear (Prachin's habitus), from its being carried about for exhibition by the Indian jugglers. In its general structure this species very closely resembles its insular relatives, but still presents several differences to have caused the formation of a separate genus for it, proposed to which, from the great extensibility of its lip, the name of Prachin has been given. Unlike the sun bears, the animal is covered with long shaggy hair, so that he bears a considerable resemblance, in external appearance, to the common European bear. This animal, on its first arrival in Europe, was the subject of a most absurd blunder. A specimen was exhibited in England, in the year 1790, when it was examined by Pennant, and the other authorities in zoological matters in those days. The specimen had lost its front teeth, probably, as Baron Cuvier supposes, from age, and these gentlemen, struck with the circumstance, chose to overrule all its other characters, and immediately pronounced the animal to be a new species of sloth (in which the incisors are naturally deficient), which they described as the Ursine or Five-toed sloth (Bradypus ursinus pentadactylus). Shaw even goes so far as to tell his readers that "it is not otherwise related to the bear, than by its size and habit, or mere exterior outline!" and in accordance with the dictum of that distinguished compiler, the do so; but it violently resents abuse and ill-treatment, and, having been irritated, refuses to be courted while the offending person remains in sight." A bear does not seem likely to prove a very amiable domestic pet; but Sir Stamford Raffles' account of the behaviour of a tame specimen of the Malayan species which lived—or about two years in his possession, may go a long way towards removing our objections to such an inmate. "He was brought up in the nursery with the children; and when admitted to my table, as was frequently the case, gave proof of his taste by refusing to eat any fruit but mangosteens, or to drink any wine but champagne. The only time I ever knew him to be out of humour was when no champagne was forthcoming. He was naturally of a playful disposition, and it was never found necessary to chain or chastise him. It was usual for this bear, the cat, the dog, and a small blue mountain-bird, or Lory of New Holland, to mess together and eat out of animal appeared for some years as a sloth in all works on natural history; and in that delectable compilation, "The History of Three Hundred Animals," it figures under the more mysterious appellation of the "Anonymus Animal." Subsequent researches, however, showed that the absence of the front teeth in the first specimen was entirely an accidental circumstance, and that the creature was a genuine bear.

In captivity, all these tropical bears appear to be of a mild and often playful disposition. The Bornean bear in the Tower exhibited, according to Dr. Horsfield, a great consciousness of the kind treatment it received from its keeper. "On seeing him," says the Doctor, "it often places itself in a variety of attitudes, to court his attention and caresses, extending its nose and anterior feet, or suddenly turning round, exposing the back, and waiting for several minutes in this attitude, with the head placed on the ground. It delights in being patted and rubbed, and even allows strangers to the same dish. His favourite playfellow was the dog, whose teasing and worrying was always borne and returned with the utmost good humour and playfulness. As he grew up he became a very powerful animal, and in his rambles in the garden, he would lay hold of the largest plantains, the stems of which he could scarcely embrace, and tear them up by the roots." With these qualities—omitting, perhaps, the last-mentioned—we might almost expect the sun-bears to become fashionable pets; but their size, unfortunately, is rather against them. They measure some three or four feet in length; and when standing upon the hind legs, which they can do with ease, reach to a height of five or six feet. The natives of the countries which they inhabit apply them to a more useful purpose, employing their skins in the formation of articles of dress. Their claws, also, which are very long, are frequently strung together into necklaces by these people, or attached to their clothes and weapons by way of ornament.

THE GREEK PRIME MINISTER.

ALEXANDRE MAVROCORDATO, whom political exigencies have again placed at the head of the Greek administration, was born at Constantinople, on the 15th of February, 1791, and is consequently in his sixty-fourth year. He is descended, in a direct line, from the Alexandre Mavrocordato who acquired some renown both in politics and the sciences towards the close of the seventeenth century, and received the title of count from the emperor Leopold II. for his co-operation in the deliverance of Vienna, when it was besieged by the grand vizier, Kara Mustapha, in 1683. Nicholas, son of Count Mavrocordato, was made hospodar of Moldavia in 1709, in the place of the native prince, Rakovitz, and of Wallachia in 1716.

The education of Alexandre Mavrocordato was carefully attended to by his father, who was grand interpreter to the Ottoman Porte, and intended him for the diplomatic service. He pursued his association formed with that view. When, at the close of 1818, Caradja abruptly quitted the principality, and was replaced by Alexandre Soutzo, Mavrocordato also left Bucharest, and after travelling over a considerable portion of Europe, fixed his residence at Pisa. There he was joined by Argyropoulos, the Archbishop Ignatius, and several other Greeks of distinction, all actuated by the same desire of liberating their country from the Ottoman yoke.

During his residence at Pisa, he received from the Emperor Alexander, whom he had met in Bessarabia in 1818, an advantageous offer of employment in the Russian service, which his ardour in the cause of his country's independence led him to decline. Alexandre Ipsilanti, the chief of the Hetairists, proposed an invasion of Moldavia, encouraged probably by hopes of support from Russia; but Mavrocordato conceived an unfavourable opinion studies partly under the paternal roof, and partly in the school of Kourou-Tchesna, founded by Demetrius Morousi, in the little village of Bosphorus, which at that time enjoyed a considerable reputation. Young Mavrocordato soon displayed a great aptitude for languages, and at ten years of age, emulating his father, was able to speak and write, with equal facility, Greek, Turkish, Persian, French, and Italian. Subsequently he acquired a knowledge of English and German.

In 1817 he took up his abode at Bucharest, in the quality of secretary to his maternal uncle, John Caradja, hospodar of Wallachia; and attained in a few years to the highest offices of the administration. It was at this time that projects were first initiated for the regeneration of Greece, and the name of Mavrocordato was inscribed on the list of members forming the council of the secret of the enterprise, and refused to take any part in it. In his opinion, an insurrection would have no chance of success, either on the banks of the Danube or at Constantinople, and he recommended a descent on the coast of the Morea. His advice was followed. On the 10th of July, 1821, a Greek vessel, under Russian colours, entered the port of Marseilles, having on board Mavrocordato and his companions, and a quantity of arms and ammunition, destined for the cause of Greek independence. There they were joined by a number of their compatriots from the universities of France and Germany, and fifty French and Piedmontese sympathisers, mostly in the military services of their respective countries.

Eight days afterwards the vessel sailed for the Morea, and on leaving the port the national flag was substituted for that of Russia, amid the roar of a salute and enthusiastic cries of "Liberty for ever!" On the 3rd of August the patriots disembarked at Missolonghi, about six weeks after the arrival of Demetrius Ipsilanti in the Peloponnesus. It is needless to enter here into the particulars of the war. The patriots were successful in expelling the Turks from the Morea; and on the 1st of January, 1822, Mavrocordato, who had been elected president of the executive council of the Greek nation, signed the famous proclamation of the National Assembly of Epidaurus. The constitution which provisionally regulated the organisation of Greece had just been promulgated. But differences of opinion were beginning at this time to distract the councils of the great chiefs, and Mavrocordato shortly afterwards resigned his authority, rather than divide the insurgent forces, which Colocotroni would certainly have done, but for this patriotic self-denial.

In July of the same year Mavrocordato met Lord Byron, for the first time, at Missolonghi. The political ability of Mavrocordato was not unknown to the noble poet, who generously offered a large sum of money for the equipment of the Greek fleet, on the condition that he should resume the direction of affairs. The friendship which thus sprang up between these two distinguished men was terminated shortly afterwards by the death of the poet, for whom the National Assembly decreed a general mourning. After the heroic defence of Sphacteria in 1825, Mavrocordato retired into private life, but he continued to correspond with the Philhellenic committees, and to keep up relations with the government.

Under the arbitrary government of Count Capo d'Istria he for some time kept aloof from public affairs; but when he thought he could serve his country by doing so, he accepted an important mission to the island of Candia, and organised, in concert with Tombazis, the increasing fleet of the infant state. During the minority of King Otho, and under the Bavarian regency, he held for short periods the ministry of finance and the presidency of the council, and afterwards received, under the colour of a voluntary retreat from office, the appointment of minister of legation to the court of Munich. He was subsequently accredited in the same capacity to the court of London; and when Otho, in July, 1840, found the difficulties of government thickening around him, he was sent for to form an administration. He took this opportunity to represent to his majesty the necessity of removing the Germans who filled all the offices of state, establishing the political institutions of the country on a sound basis, introducing certain desirable reforms into the administration, and giving the people some guarantee that their rights would be respected. Finding that his views did not agree with those of the king, he tendered his resignation. His immense popularity followed him in his retirement. This abnegation of office, when he could not hold it without a sacrifice of principle, commands our admiration, more especially as he was without fortune, having consecrated all his patrimony to the liberation of his country. The government offered him a pension of 7,200 drachmas, as a mark of their appreciation of the services he had rendered the nation; and his refusal, based on the scruples he felt at becoming a burden upon the people, increased the esteem in which his disinterested patriotism caused him to be held by all classes of his countrymen.

Two years afterwards, the revolution of the 15th of September, 1843, broke out, and compelled the king to convoke a National Assembly, for the purpose of framing a constitution. Mavrocordato was at that time Chargé d'Affaires at Constantinople. Recalled to Athens by the revolution, and elected representative of Missolonghi, he presided for six months, with remarkable talent and dignity, over the most stormy assembly that had ever been convened in Greece. After the promulgation of the constitution, he was induced to accept office; but he did so with some reluctance, well knowing how precarious his tenure of power would be. In fact, the minorities, vanquished in the Assembly, soon coalesced against his administration, and offered a furious opposition to all his measures. In consequence of this factious opposition, he resigned his functions as president of the council, and resumed his place in the chamber, to which he was called by five electoral colleges. He now became the leader of the opposition, and resisted the arbitrary measures of Colletti to the utmost of his power; but in 1848, fearing an anarchical reaction, as a consequence of the political excitement of the period, he abandoned his opposition to the government, though without giving it his support. At the close of 1850, however, he accepted the appointment of minister of legation at Paris, but without any sacrifice of his opinions on the internal policy of the kingdom. The events of which Greece has lately been the scene, and particularly the temporary occupation of the Piræus by an Anglo-French division, have awakened King Otho to a more just appreciation than hitherto of the conditions on which he holds his throne; and the fact of his again placing Mavrocordato at the head of the government seems to indicate an intention to make his future policy more in accordance with the wants and wishes of the people.

THE YOUTH OF GOETHE.

THE great German poet and thinker, whose name appears at the head of our present article, makes in his autobiography the remark which must have occurred to very many persons before him—that "when we desire to recall what befel us in the earliest period of youth, it often happens that we confound what we have heard from others with that which we really possess from our own direct experience." There is great truth in this. Few men can look back and tell when they began to remember, what they know themselves of their own knowledge, and what has been told to them.

We fancy that Goethe is himself in the category of those who record much from the narratives of others, which they fancy they recollect from their own experience. He gives us a minute description of his house—the house in which he was born—and tells gravely, in the style of Rousseau, of little peccadilloes, which are almost too trivial to be worthy of record. But the world had made Goethe unconsciously vain; and he really felt that it was important to the world to know how, when scarcely more than a baby, he amused certain grave old men by smashing a basket full of crockery just bought; and how he was curious about the name of his street—"The Stag-ditch;" and didn't like to go to bed in the dark, and so on. The apology for all this certainly is, the naïve style in which the childish adventures are told.

The event which, probably of all others, had an influence on the tone of the boy's mind, was his old grandmother's having a puppet-show exhibited to the children. We can fancy the impression made by the mimic drama on a boy who was naturally of a romantic disposition. The little stage was given over to him, and became his constant amusement and occupation, until a great change in the family induced other impressions. They lived in a queer old house, with every story projecting over the other; and when the grandmother died, their father determined to rebuild it. He tried to do this while the children were in it, until the water came into their very bed-rooms, and then he reluctantly allowed them to go to school.

The hero of this narrative now began to make acquaintance with his native town, to wander on the bridge over the Maine—it was in Frankfort-on-the-Maine—to get ferried over the river, and to watch the market-boats arriving. He used to avoid the market itself, and "always flew away from the meat-stalls, narrow and disgusting as they were, in perfect horror."

Frankfort is a quaint old town, with historic memories—its Hasengasse, its fortresses within the walls, its Nuremberg court, its Comportella, Brauzels, and other strongholds, turned to the peaceful purposes of trade. There were gates, and towers, and walls, and bridges, and ramparts, and moats—remains of a past long since dead, but which affected the boy's mind with reverence for the antique, which he further studied closely in the cuts of Grave on the "Siege of Frankfort." Then he would lose himself in the lower vault-like halls of the old council-house.

"We obtained an entrance, too, into the large, very simple session-room of the council," says the old man writing his Boy-memories. "The walls, as well as the arched ceiling, were white, though wainscoted to a certain height, and the whole was without a trace of painting, or any carved work; only high up on the middle wall might be read this brief description:—

'One man's word is no man's word, Justice needs that both be heard.'

"After the most ancient fashion, benches were ranged around the wainscoting, and raised one step above the floor, for the accommodation of the members of the assembly. This readily suggested to us why the order of rank in our senate was distributed by benches. To the left of the door, in the opposite corner, sat the Schoffen; in the corner itself, the Schultheiss, who alone had a small table before him; those of the second bench sat in the space to the left, as far as the wall to where the windows were; while along the windows ran the third bench, occupied by the craftsmen. In the midst of the hall stood a table for the registrar."

Here he listened to the audiences and legends of Charlemagne, and heard that Maximilian would be the last German emperor; and then he wandered round the cathedral, and there heard stories of coronations, and all the long train of splendours connected with them. After this came the fairs (twice a year, with all the old customs—customs that dated from the middle ages, to which the Germans, with their quaint love of antiquity, cling tenaciously, and still cling. One may be cited as a specimen of all the rest. The city of Worms brought an old felt hat to signify some tenure or other, which hat being always redeemed, again figured in the ceremonies of centuries. The boy used to be very proud when to the old Schultheiss, his grandfather, the traders did homage of pepper. Then came festivities and rejoicings outside the city. On the right shore of the Main, going down, about half an hour's walk from the gate, there rises a sulphur-spring, neatly enclosed, and surrounded by aged lindens. Not far from it stands the Good People's Court, formerly a hospital. On the commons around, the herds of cattle from the neighbourhood were collected on a certain day of the year; and the herdsmen, together with their sweethearts, celebrated a rural festival, with dancing and singing, and all sorts of pleasure and clownishness. On the other side of the city lay a similar but larger common, likewise graced with a spring, and still finer lindens.

But the new house was finished at last, despite delays, and was light and roomy and bright; and then began the delight of arranging it. The first thing which Goethe notices is the books, Dutch editions of the Latin classics, all in quarto, and the Italian poets, and travels; but, doubtless, the pictures that hung on the walls were much more noticed by him at the time. His father followed the principle that it was best to employ living artists. He said he was sure that pictures could be produced in any coming year, of just as excellent quality as in years passed. He would remark that many old pictures owed their excellence to their being dark and brown, in the eyes of amateurs; but he protested, says Goethe, in quite a Sterne-like sentence, that he had no fear that the new pictures would not also turn black in time; though whether they were likely to gain anything by this, he was not so positive.

Doubtless the gradual filling of the house with pictures influenced the youthful mind of the future poet. Early associations are all but irresistible, when they are pleasant; and all that awakens art love must be so.

There came, on the first of November, 1755, a fearful rumour over the earth. Lisbon had been destroyed by an earthquake, one of the most terrible in the history of the world. Sixty thousand people were killed. Alarm spread to the uttermost confines of civilisation. The end of the world was said to be at hand. Goethe was alarmed for the first time, and his religious ideas were puzzled between the alarmists and the hopeful. A fearful storm immediately after, which broke all the glass in the house, made a serious impression, which did not depart for some time.

Meanwhile the boy studied very hard, and learnt Latin, followed the usual course of instruction, and began to rhyme. There were, he complains, no children's books in those days. Boys had no resource but to pore over the "Orbis Pictus" of Amos Comenius, and the "Averva Philologia." At last he got "Robinson Crusoe," and "The Island of Felsenberg," and Anson's "Voyage Round the World." A little later he fell upon fairy tales, which the future poet devoured with avidity. Illness intervened, and the father, unfortunately, in times of convalescence, tried to make him fetch up lost time, which over-strained his mind.

After one of his illnesses, Goethe made an acquaintance which was to him important. He first became acquainted with Homer in a prose translation, which may be found in the seventh part of Herr von Leen's new collection of the most remarkable travels, under the title of "Homer's Description of the Conquest of the Kingdom of Troy," ornamented with copper-plates in the theatrical French style.

His religious education was peculiar, or rather, was no education at all. He picked up stray notions on all sides, and thought himself a regular high priest, building himself an altar, of which, however, he afterwards no doubt made more than really was due to the circumstance.

Then the war broke out which had so much influence on his life. He was seven years old. His family was divided. His father leaned towards Prussia. Other relatives took the other side. Quarrels, discord, and discontent, entered the quiet homes of the pacific citizens. The old Sunday-evening meetings were broken up. The nearest relatives could not meet in the street without quarrelling. The boy sided with the king of Prussia, and was horrified, when he dined with his grandmother and grandfather, to hear his hero slandered. These events acted on his mind with very great force, and awoke sentiments and feelings which never died. One was a general distrust of public opinion on every point. Goethe was in many things essentially a doubter.

About this time he began his career as a fictionist, by the children's tale of "The New Paris," which, with all its affected simplicity, owes much to the polish of after-days. He dwells at great length on his youthful struggles.

The society of men of talent and learning, which was brought together by his father, doubtless had its influence on the dawning mind of the young German. He dwells with pleasure on John Michael von Leen, curiously on the Senkerbergs; but an author who came to him in his books, Klipstock, made most impression. His "Messiah" was almost burnt by heart.

But now came the French and billeted themselves in the town, and one Count Thorane was sent to their house. What a misfortune for a Prussian thus to entertain one of the opposite party! The father was miserable. The Frenchman was polite, artistic, a man of taste; but he was a Frenchman. This outweighed every consideration. He employed all the same artists as the old man; but it was in vain. The boy, however, was happy. He watched the artists at work for the count, he learnt French, he went to the French plays, and fell in love by way of a change.

Now came Good Friday, 1759, and a terrible battle at the gates of the city, in which, to the great delight of the mother, the French were victorious. The father was miserable; he insulted the French officer, who ordered him under arrest, and then let him go. A right good honest fellow was this Count Thorane. A thick-headed citizen, having a complaint to make one day, called him "Excellency," with a bow. The count returned the "excellency" and the bow. The astonished citizen, thinking he had not been humble enough, said "Your highness." "Sir," said the count gravely, "we will go no further, or we shall come to 'majesty.'"

The father allowed his son to frequent the theatre, because he advanced so rapidly in French. At last the count went away, and Goethe learnt music and English and Hebrew, and began to study theology and biblical history with great earnestness. Physical education was not neglected. Goethe learnt to fence and ride on horseback. The mode of teaching riding disgusted him, though he at last became a daring and fearless rider.

He tells, with great earnestness, how at this time he was present at the burning of a book, a French comic novel. "The packages exploded in the fire, and were raked asunder by an oven fork, to be brought in closer contact with the flames. It was not long before the kindled sheets were wafted about in the air, and the crowd caught at them with eagerness. Nor could we rest until we had hunted upon every shelf and a few marvellous libraries to procure the forbidden pleasure. Nay, if it had been done to give the author publicity, he could not himself have made a more effectual provision."

Goethe shows his knowledge of human nature, for, the novel being against religion and morals, he does not give its name; as, if he had, it would have been continually in council, because it had been paid for by the. Here properly ends the early childhood of Goethe, whose life, it will be seen, begins very much as that of a literary man should, amidst learning and art, and surrounded by historical associations.

THE COLONISATION OF PENNSYLVANIA.

It has been observed that truth is a plant which thrives best in the soil of persecution. Imprison the preacher of a new creed, and his followers increase tenfold. Burn a book, and you make a fortune for its publisher and a reputation for its author. Opposition excites a man's combativeness into action, and often causes him to go further than he intended. The quiet thinker is converted into the propagandist by the necessity of defending himself and vindicating his opinions.

The inefficacy of force in matters of conscience was well exemplified in the case of the celebrated William Penn, whose name is better known in connexion with the propagation of Quakerism, than even that of its founder, George Fox. Imbibing the doctrines of the new sect while a youth of sixteen, at the university of Oxford, he was fined for non-conformity, and afterwards expelled the college. His father, Admiral Penn, who was high in the favour of Charles II. and the Duke of York, and anxious for his advancement at court, was deeply offended with him; and finding remonstrances and arguments ineffectual to wean his son from his superintend the family estates, remaining there about twelve months. He returned to London just as the Conventicle Act had been passed, and the Friends expelled from their meeting-house. He had not been long in the metropolis when he was arrested on the charge of preaching to "a riotous and seditious assembly"—that is, an open-air gathering of the Friends—and committed to Newgate. He defended himself on his trial with great ability, and though the judge directed the jury to convict him, they had the honesty and courage to return a verdict of acquittal. The bench fined the jury, and ordered them to be imprisoned until the fines were paid; but the Court of Common Pleas pronounced the proceeding illegal and quashed it.

Admiral Penn died shortly afterwards, perfectly reconciled to his son, to whom he left a considerable estate; but he had scarcely succeeded to it, when he was again committed to Newgate for six months for preaching. On his liberation, he married the daughter of Sir William Springett, and the next five years were spent in the calm and felicity of rural retirement. In 1677, Penn made a sort new opinions, he inflicted personal chastisement upon him, and turned him out of the house. Awakening, however, to a sense of either the impolicy or the injustice of this treatment, he provided him shortly afterwards with the means of passing two years in France and Italy; and on his return sent him to Ireland to manage his property there—a step which proves that he had confidence in his judgment and steadiness, for the future founder of Pennsylvania was then only in his twenty-second year. While at Cork, he attended a meeting of the Society of Friends, when the preacher, Thomas Lee, with whom he had become acquainted at Oxford, delivered so impressive a discourse on faith and spiritual-mindedness, that he became still more imbued with their doctrines.

Admiral Penn immediately sent for him to London, and again remonstrated and threatened, but without effect; ending, as before, with turning him out of doors. He now began to preach and write in support of his religious opinions, and his zeal in a short time caused him to be imprisoned in the Tower, where he remained nearly seven months. On his liberation, his father once more received him into favour, and he again repaired to Ireland to or religious tour through Holland and Germany, accompanied by the other two chiefs of the new sect, Fox and Barclay; and on his return to England exerted himself, though vainly, to procure the repeal of the acts under which his brethren were persecuted and oppressed, and the admission of their affirmation in the place of an oath.

He now began to look for a land in which he and his co-religionists might live in peace and security, unvexed by Exchequer prosecutions and the scoffs of the worldly-minded. America was then the haven in which all who were persecuted for conscience-sake sought refuge and rest. A sum of £16,000 was due to him from the crown, on account of money advanced by his father for the use of the navy; and Penn petitioned for a grant of a tract of land on the west bank of the Delaware, to him and his heirs for ever, in consideration of his claim. Charles gave a ready assent to this arrangement, and the Duke of York ceded an adjoining tract, lower down the Delaware, in addition. The royal patent was dated March the 4th, 1681, constituting Penn absolute proprietor and governor of the province, which received from Charles, in honour of the founder and his father, the name of Pennsylvania. Liberal terms of settlement were offered to those who wished to emigrate, and a friendly intercourse was opened with the Indian chiefs by letters and presents; for Penn's clear perception of the requirements of justice showed him that Charles Stuart had no right to dispose of the lands in the possession of the natives, and he resolved to purchase them.

A settlement had been made by the Swedes on the shores of Chesapeake Bay, in 1627, which, after being some time in the possession of the Dutch, had been ceded in 1664 to England. Several other small settlements were scattered along both sides of the bay. Three vessels sailed with emigrants, chiefly Quakers, as soon as the preliminary arrangements could be effected; and Penn followed in the autumn of 1682, leaving his wife and children in England. The voyage across the wide Atlantic was made in safety; and his first act was to assemble the colonists and the Indians under an immense elm near the spot where Philadelphia was afterwards founded, and arrange the treaty according to which he became proprietor of the territory, by what he rightly considered a better title than could be conferred by King Charles. The date of this and on the undulating plains which stretch towards the Blue Mountains, leaving the country between the mountains and the valley of the Ohio in the possession of the Indians. The Swedes had already built a church at the confluence of the Schuylkill with the Delaware; and Penn thought the situation such a pleasant one, that it was determined to build there Philadelphia—the City of Brotherly Love. Eighty houses were built in the course of 1683, and in two years the population amounted to 2,500. In three years it had made greater progress than New York in half a century.

In the summer of 1684, Penn returned to England, leaving the great seal in the hands of his friend Lloyd, one of the principal Quakers of the colony, and the executive power in those of a committee of the council. On board the vessel in which he sailed he wrote a farewell address to his brethren. "My love and my life are to you and with you," he said, "and no water can quench it, nor distance bring it to an end. I have been with you, cared over you, and served you with unfeigned love; and you are beloved of me and dear to me beyond utterance. I bless you in the name and power of the Lord; and may God bless you with his righteoustreaty has not been preserved; but the event is one of which the Quakers should be proud, and the memory of which should be treasured. Voltaire observes that it was the only treaty unratified by an oath, and the only one the provisions of which were not violated. For seventy years, or as long as the Quakers retained the administration of the affairs of the province, the friendship thus cemented between the colonists and the Indians remained uninterrupted.

The constitution which Penn had drawn up before leaving England was submitted to a general assembly of the colonists at Chester, in December, 1682, and received their approval and confirmation. So largely did it breathe the spirit of civil and religious liberty, and so humane and equitable were the laws founded upon it, that thousands were attracted to the new colony from most parts of Europe, but chiefly from Germany, descendants from natives of which country now constitute a fourth of the whole population of Pennsylvania. There were also many from Holland. No less than fifty vessels arrived with emigrants during the two years following Penn's arrival in the country. All of them settled in the south-eastern part of the province, along the banks of the Delaware, ness, peace, and plenty, all the land over. You are come to a quiet land, and liberty and authority are in your hands. Rule for Him under whom the princes of this world will one day esteem it their honour to govern. And thou, Philadelphia, the virgin settlement of this province, my soul prays to God for thee, that thou mayst stand in the day of trial, and that thy children may be blessed."

A dispute which had arisen between himself and Lord Baltimore, the founder of Maryland, on the boundaries of their respective provinces, was referred to the Committee of Trade and Plantations on his arrival in England, and decided in his favour. He remained in England fifteen years, during which time he was four times arrested on charges of disaffection to the government of William III., arising out of his intimacy with the deposed monarch, James II., but always succeeded in vindicating himself before the council. In 1692 he was deprived of the government of Pennsylvania, which was annexed to that of New York; but it was restored to him two years afterwards. His wife died during this sojourn in England, and he married the daughter of a Bristol merchant named Callowhill.

Poverty retarded his return to Pennsylvania, which did not take place till 1699, when he was accompanied by his wife and children. He had not been more than eighteen months in America, when an attempt of the home government to convert the proprietary governments into royal ones recalled him to England. The bill was abandoned, through the exertions of Penn and his friends, and the accession of Queen Anne restored him to favour at court. Before his departure from Pennsylvania, which he was never to revisit again, the constitution of the province underwent a revision, and continued in this improved form as long as the proprietary government lasted. The legislative power was vested in the governor and assembly, the latter being elected annually, and the people had the power of appointing sheriffs and coroners. "And now," says Baneroff, "having divested himself and his successors of any power to injure, he had founded a democracy. By the necessities of the case, he remained the feudal sovereign; for only as such could he grant or have maintained the charter of colonial liberties. But time and the people would remove the inconsistency. Having thus given freedom and popular power to his provinces, no strifes remaining but strifes about property, happily for himself, he departed from the young country of his affections."

Pennsylvania does not appear to have been to its founder the source of pleasurable contemplation which he anticipated in the early days of its settlement. His liberality was met with selfishness; and the latter part of his life was embittered by disputes with the colonists about property—a state of things which, though much to be deplored, seems a natural result of the anomalies of the constitution. Feudality and democracy were brought into unnatural union, and hence incessant antagonism and discontent. His attempts to obtain the sanctity of marriage, the advantages of education, and the rights and comforts of domestic life for the negroes, were defeated; and his philanthropic wishes for the conversion and civilisation of the Indians were equally ineffectual. His liberality was abused, and he was compelled to mortgage the province, which he steadily refused to sell to the crown, because he knew such a proceeding would undo all the good he had been enabled to do. The proprietorship remained with his descendants till the Revolution, when they disposed of their claims to the federal government for £100,000.

It is one of those anomalies of human nature for which it is difficult to account, that Penn, with all his acknowledged virtues and ennobling qualities, should not have perceived the sin and injustice of slavery, and its antagonism to the spirit of the Gospel. It is true, he tried to ameliorate the condition of the slave; but he continued to hold slaves when his benevolent intentions had been defeated. But in this he was not singular, even among the Quakers, for they all did the same, except those from Germany, who held with George Fox, that it was unlawful for those who had the light of the Gospel to guide them, to hold their fellow-creatures in slavery. Thousands of professing Christians—including even ministers—hold slaves at the present day, so much does self-interest blind men to the requirements of religion and justice; but that Penn should have done so is a contradiction to every other trait in his character.

THE VALLEY OF THE AMAZON.

WITHIN the last few years, and more particularly within the last twelve months, the explorations of European and American travellers—some with scientific, others with commercial object—have thrown a flood of light upon the geography and resources of the hitherto almost unknown region watered by the Amazon and its tributaries. By referring to a good map of South America, the reader will perceive that this river is the largest in the world, having its sources among the snow-capped Andes, and discharging its immense volume of water into the Atlantic, nearly under the equator. Its entire length exceeds 3,000 miles, and the volume of water which it pours every second through the Narrows of Obylos is calculated at 750,000 cubic feet. It has its source in the Lake of Manriococha, situated 14,000 feet above the sea-level, among the snowy peaks of the Andes; and from thence it flows for 120 miles through a ravine, in some places rushing like a mill-stream, and in others roaring and foaming as it tumbles over piles of rocks, above which soars the condor—the great vulture of these mountain solitudes. Near Huary the ravine opens, and the river flows more quietly through a wooded valley for a distance of 350 miles. Its course is then interrupted by rapids, and it flows eastward for 180 miles, with such force and rapidity that the Indian dares not venture even in his light canoe upon its foaming waters. Leaving the mountain region by the rapids of Manseriche, seven miles long, it now receives in succession, from the pathless wilds beyond its northern bank, the rivers Morona, Pastaga, and Tigre, of which very little is known; while on the south it receives the waters of the Huallaga, made known to us by the recently-published work of Lieutenant Herndon, of the United States' navy, who has lately descended it from Tinga-Maria, the head of canoe navigation, to its junction with the present stream, four miles below the village of Lagana. The Huallaga flows through a fertile plain, watered by numerous rivulets, and dotted with villages; the climate, moreover, is healthy, there are no mosquitoes or sand-flies, and the Indian tribes are friendly—advantages which induce Mr. Herndon to recommend it as the most eligible portion of the valley of the Amazon for European or North American colonisation. Cotton, coffee, sugar, and cocoa are produced abundantly—indigo grows wild—and cinnamon, storax, and gums abound in the woods, and may be procured from the Indians at prices almost nominal.

Most of the towns and villages of the extensive regions watered by the Amazon and its tributaries are situated on the rivers, and very little is known of the greater portion of the interior, much of which is a dense forest, rendered almost impenetrable by prickly creepers, and trodden only by hostile Indians and beasts of prey. Snakes and lizards are numerous—birds of gorgeous plumage hover above the gigantic trees or nestle in their foliage—huge black monkeys swing themselves from branch to branch—and at night the forest is resonant with the growlings of the puma and the jaguar. The Indians who dwell near the settlements of the whites are milder in their manners than those of the woods, profess a degraded and superstitious kind of Christianity, engrafted upon pagan ideas and customs by the zeal of the Jesuits, and wear cotton drawers, or a piece of cotton folded round the middle; but the forest-dwelling tribes keep aloof from the settlements, hold negroes in abhorrence, have no other religion than a species of Fetichism, and go entirely naked, both men and women. M. Alphonse de Lineart, who ascended the Tapajós (one of the tributary rivers) a few years since, describes the hostile tribes who inhabit the extensive forests which stretch far away on both sides as being painted and tattooed, and wearing caps of parrots' feathers, and collars and bracelets of beads, shells, and jaguars' teeth.

Next in succession to the Huallaga, but on the opposite side, is the Napo, which, after a course of 700 miles from the north, falls into the Amazon a little below the village of Aran. The Iça is next reached, which has a similar length; and then comes the Yapurá, flowing 900 miles from its source to its mouth, or rather months, for it has four, the two most distant of which are more than 200 miles apart. Both these rivers flow into the Amazon from the north. On the south it receives successively, after Nanta is passed, the Ucayali (which flows through forest solitudes producing sarsaparilla of the finest quality in great abundance), the Yavari, the Jutai, the Jurua, the Tefé, the Coavy, and the Purus, the plains and valleys traversed by which yet remain unexplored. In its course through the plain included between the mouths of these rivers the Amazon increases in width from half a mile to two miles, and between the mouth of the Madeira (its most considerable tributary, having a course of nearly 2,000 miles) and Obydos it reaches three miles. The Madeira flows through a beautiful valley, clothed with verdure, and abounding in scenery the most striking and picturesque. Of this river we shall probably soon know more through the exploration of Lieutenant Gibbon, who was sent out by the United States' government at the same time with Lieutenant Herndon, and started to descend the Madeira while his fellow-traveller was paddling down the Huallaga. They expected to meet at some point on the Amazon, but Mr. Herndon reached Pará without having seen or heard of his brother-officer from the time they parted.

KING CANUTE REBUKING HIS COURTIERS.

CANUTE AND THE DANES.

THERE is something grand and awful in the sea. Watch it when it lies all calm and still like molten gold in the red rays of the setting sun, when on its peaceful bosom a silver sail may here and there be seen, and as its waters break in gentle music on the sands, and there is not a cloud in the sky as the twilight comes and deepens into night; when there is scarcely a breath of wind astir; when there is nothing to break the prospect, and the sky and the sea, and the sea and the sky, meet together in the distance,—watch it under such circumstances as these, and a peaceful solemnity comes over the soul, for the spirit of God seems to move on the face of the deep. But watch it when the storm is raging—when the wild winds are careering over the depths, shrieking among the sails and corlage of the tempest-tost vessel—when waves roll mountain-high, and like a straw the ship is cast now into a valley of waters, now carried on a mighty wave to meet the clouds, and buried once again in what seems a fathomless abyss—when the lightning blazes from the sky, and exhibits for a moment the surging waters as they rise and fall, and rise and fall again, up to the heavens, down to the depths, the soul melted because of trouble,—a bleak, desolate prospect, as if the world were at an end and chaos come again;—and then the peaceful solemnity is changed into awe at the presence of Him who commandeth and raiseth the stormy wind and lieth up the waves of the sea.

In all its calm, still beauty—in all the majesty of its wrath—the sea is a spectacle of wonder, and calls forth the highest admiration; when a fair wind is blowing, and the good ship rides well; when the tempest is raging and the vessel rolls and plunges in the trough of waters, or even when the dead-calm comes on—such as the "Ancient Mariner" describes—

"Day after day, day after day
We stuck; nor breath nor motion;
As idle as a painted ship
Upon a painted ocean"—

it is still the same.

To be the masters of the sea, to rule the waves, to win honour and glory and renown upon the bosom of the deep, has been the boast of men in all ages. In the seventeenth century, Selden gravely asserted that the English had an hereditary uninterrupted right to the sovereignty of the seas, "conveyed to them from their earliest ancestors in trust for their latest posterity." And England indeed has, from very early days, been famous for the maritime character of her people. Her rugged shores, begirt by the waters—have given strength to the natural bent of the islanders. Some, indeed, have supposed that her first inhabitants were adventurous seamen, who, weary of the dull, tame shore, braved the perils of the ocean to discover a new land.

"Compassed by the inviolate sea"—

But there were men who boasted of their power over the sea—who gloried in it as their own peculiar element—before Britain had attained for herself any very great name in history, when her by-past glory was lost in the emurped dawn of mythical tradition, and not to be found in the broad noon-day of fact; when her people, by Roman spears and Saxon lances, had been driven to the hills for a refuge and a home. Then other nations lorded it over the ocean depths. These were called the Sea-kings, and rejoiced in the name. They were known as Danes or Normans, according as they came from the islands of the Baltic or the coast of Norway; were descended from the same primitive race as the Anglo-Saxons and the Franks, speaking a language intelligible to both nations. But this sort of fraternity exercised no beneficent influence over the manner in which they treated both Franks and Saxons. The conversion of the Teutonic nations of the south to Christianity broke every brotherly tie between them and the Teutons of the north. The Danes and Norsemen remained faithful to the divinities of Germany. They rendered tribute to Neebo, the God of the Sea; cast lots under the influence of Tamsana; and believed that the Dyse would at last bear the soul of the true warrior to the Valhalla of the mighty Odin, and there—as the Runic ode has it—

"Exalted on the noblest seat
Where the deathless heroes meet;
They immortal draughts should quaff,
And in the pangs of death should laugh."

Franks or Gauls, Longobards and Latins, became hateful to the men of Odin. Their wars against them partook of a religious character. They shed the blood of a priest with pleasure, were particularly gratified by pillaging churches, and littering their horses by the altars; and when their frightful work was done, returned, saying: "We have sung the mass of lances, it began at dawn of day and lasted until night."

These Sea-kings—elected by their followers in old Germanic fashion—were faithfully followed and zealously obeyed. The chief was always the bravest of the brave—Kongakong—king of kings; he could govern a vessel as a skilful rider guides a horse; he could throw three javelins to the mast-head and catch them alternately in his hand; he could run across the oars while they were in motion; and his boast was, that he never slept beneath a raftered roof, or drained the bowl at a sheltered hearth. The Danes laughed at the winds and the waves; "the force of the storm," they said, "is a help to the arm of our rowers; the hurricane carries us whither we would go."

So the Danes became the terror of Europe. Before they approached, say the old chroniclers, the stars fought in their courses, and there were signs in the heavens above and omens in the earth beneath. Whirlwinds swept over the land and tore up forest trees like saplings in a giant's hand; thunders loud and terrible shook the rocks, the wild waves rose with unwonted violence, fiery dragons flew in the air and settled on lofty mountain heights. Meanwhile the Danes, as their old songs express it, "kept on the track of the swans;" and the Vikings, fanatical in faith and cruel in war, came down upon the coasts of England. With what result one of their old bards tells us; their leader sang it as he died:—

"We smote with our swords on that day, when I saw hundreds of enemies stretched on the sands beneath an English headland; dew-drops of blood fell off our swords; our arrows sang in the wind, when they sought the helmets of our foes. It was sweeter to me than the smile of woman.

"We smote with our swords on that day. I struck down the youth so proud of his flowing hair, who all the day long pined after the maidens beautiful and fair. What fate so fit for the brave as to be the first to fall in battle. He who never received a wound, leads a dull life. Let us make man our enemy that we may resist him in the play of combats.

"We smote with our swords on that day. But men are the slaves of fate. We must be obedient to the will of our fairies. I thought not to meet death from the hand of Ella when I spelt to my prow of planks across the wide foam of waters, and gave a feast to the flesh-devouring fishes. Yet I laugh with delight at the thought of what is reserved for me in the halls of Odin.

"We smote with our swords on that day. Did the sons of Aslanga know the anguish I endure; did they know that the venomous fangs of snakes that twine about me are covering me with their bites, they would shudder, and would fly to the combat; for the mother I leave with them gave them stout hearts. A viper is tearing open my breast and gnawing at my heart, but I hope that the javelin of my son shall soon pierce the breast of Ella.

"We smote with our swords in fifty and one battles. I doubt if among men there was ever a king more famous than I am. From my boyhood I have shed blood. I have longed for such a death as this. Goddesses sent from Odin call me. I am going to drink at the banquet of the gods. The hours of my life are fast ebbing, but I smile under the hand of death."

Such songs as this very graphically express the character of the Danes. But however great and powerful they might be on land, however they might smite with their swords on solid ground, the ocean was their true empire. Not till the days of Alfred did they meet with any serious check, but in him they had their match.

This great monarch resolved to meet the enemy on the sea. Skilful himself in maritime affairs, he directed his attention to the improvement of his navy; and by inventing ships of an entirely new construction, he gained infinite advantages over a people continually practised in naval armaments. The spirit of this man survived in some degree in his successors, and not so easy as of old did the Sea-kings find it to stretch hundreds of their enemies beneath an English headland. But the Saxon race degenerated; the country was torn asunder by civil war; the ships rotted in the harbours. The Danes gradually regained their old position; they once more asserted their ascendancy on the ocean. "No sooner did Sweyn, king of Denmark," says the author of "The Naval History of Great Britain," "find himself superior at sea than he set up a title to the kingdom, which the Saxons were no longer able to resist. This is an early and strong proof, that this island is only safe while it remains the first maritime power; hence the importance of keeping up our navy is too manifest to be denied, and we may be convinced, that as our freedom flows only from our constitution, so both must be defended by our fleets."

When the Danes established their supremacy in England, much of their bloodthirsty spirit passed away, identical as it was with the Edith of Olin, and they became Christians. Knut, or Canute, who succeeded his father, offered up no sacrifice to Nocco, as he looked over the wide ocean that swept around his island home; he came with no magical standard, no mysterious raven to flap or droop its wings as victory or defeat attended on his arms; but he came imbued with the religion of the time, renowned for virtue in peace and for valour in war. By degrees he exhibited great humanity of disposition; he entertained views of government as exalted as his age and his position could lead us to expect; he even evinced a spirit of impartiality in regard both to English and Danes. Without diminishing the very heavy tributes imposed upon the kingdom on the conquest of it by the Danes, he expended a portion of those revenues in a payment of compensations to some of his own countrymen on their consenting to return to Denmark, thus rendering less prominent the division of the inhabitants of England into two races inimical to each other, and possessing unequal privileges. Of all the Danish warriors who had accompanied him, he retained only a body of chosen men, amounting to a few thousands, for his body-guard; this corps was named Thing-men, or retainers of the palace. The son of an apostate from Christianity, he made himself appear a zealous Christian, rebuilding the churches which his father and he himself had burned, and munificently endowing the abbeys and monasteries. Desirous of flattering the national spirit of the Anglo-Saxons, he erected a chapel over the place of sepulture of Edmund, king of East Anglia, who, during the preceding century and a half, had been venerated as a martyr for the faith and for patriotic zeal for his kingdom; besides which, the same motive actuated Canute to erect at Canterbury a monument to Archbishop Elfg, a victim, like king Edmund, to Danish cruelty. He wished to have the saint's remains transported thither, which had been entombed in London; but the inhabitants of that city having refused to be dispossessed of them, the Danish monarch suddenly, in the performance even of an act of piety, resumed the manner of a pirate and a conqueror. He carried off, in military style, the coffin, which was borne betwixt two lines of soldiers, having their swords drawn, to the Thames' side, and embarked on board a ship of war, of which the prow was decorated with an enormous figure-head of a dragon.

At the time when England was divided into independent sovereignties, several of the Anglo-Saxon kings, particularly those of Wessex and of Mercia, sent occasional contributions to the Church of Rome. The object of such gifts, partly gratuitous, was to secure a better reception for English pilgrims resorting to Rome, to provide pecuniary supplies to such of them as arrived in distress in that city, to pay for maintaining a school for youths from England sent thither for instruction, and towards supplying the lamps constantly burning at the sepulchres of St. Peter and St. Paul. The payment of these Rents—called in Anglo-Saxon Romsc' s'c'c' and Romsc' census, or Rent—was more or less regular according to the degree of zeal of kings and people; and was entirely suspended in the ninth century on the occurrence of the Danish invasions. Wishing to expiate as far as possible the wrong which his countrymen had done to the church, and to surpass in his munificence any of the Anglo-Saxon kings, Canute re-established the institution of a rent for Rome on a greater scale, and subjected all England to a perpetual tribute, which was denominated St. Peter's pence. This impost, rated at a penny of the money of that age on each inhabited house, was, thenceforward, to be annually levied, according to the expression used in the royal ordinances, "To the praise and glory of God the King, on the fast-day of the chief of the Apostles."

So the courage, the wisdom, and the piety of Canute became proverbial. He was the hero of his age, the saint of his time. His love for the ocean did not decrease. He knew it had been for ages gone the empire of his forefathers and the scene of their triumphs, and he knew that it was still his strength and his defence. Everywhere was the ocean the proud defender of

"The jewel set in the silver sea."

And the courtiers knew it too, and knew that to the king the wide-stretching sea was as the face of a friend. But the courtiers of that age were not skilled in the art of adulation. The censor spake with bated breath; there was no spots on the sun of the royal firmament; the one-eyed princes were always painted in profile; if royalty had vices, they were compensated by its graces; it was sacrilege to criticise defects, "rank blasphemy" to talk about the sins and follies of royalty; the king was king everywhere and king over everything; the language of flattery was only to fall on the royal tympanum; wholesale praise, indiscriminating eulogy, stereotyped glorifications, took the place of honest truthful speaking. But the thing was overdone; praises such as these were about as worthy as the old Eastern salutation—"O king, live for ever!"

Canute was a shrewd, far seeing man. The glittering praises of the courtiers were not all gold. They, in admiration of his greatness and grandeur, declared that all things were possible to him—that the sea knew its master, and would bow to his will. They talked to Canute; not to him who scourged the ocean when it destroyed his bridge of boats; and Canute had no stomach for such fare. He ordered a chair to be brought, and seated himself on the sea-shore when the tide was rising. As the waters approached, he said, in a commanding tone: "Thou sea art under my dominion, and the land which I sit upon is mine; I charge thee, approach no further, nor dare to wet the feet of thy sovereign."

"Merrily sprang the foaming spray
To the sovereign's feet: it melted away,
And the waters deeper grew;
They tumbled and roared around his seat,
They reached his knees, 'twas time to retreat,
And Canute looked round his courtiers to greet—Ah! where were those courtiers true?"

As the sea advanced the courtiers retreated, and now the monarch turned upon them and observed, that every creature in the universe is feeble and impotent, and that power alone resides with One Being, in whose hands are the elements of nature, and who can say to the ocean: "Thus far shalt thou go and no further, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed."

From this period Canute would never wear his crown, but ordered it to be placed on the head of a crucifix, in the cathedral church of Winchester.

The story has been told over and over again. It is one of those circumstances, real or fictitious, which stand out prominently from a great man's history. Like Alexander weeping for other worlds to conquer; like Nero playing the lute and singing of Troy's destruction as the flames consumed the Roman capital; like Alfred, disguised as a harper, entering the Danish camp, or in the head-herd's cottage, forgetting to turn the eales, and getting rated for his illness; like James of Scotland going about as a beggarman to find out the real opinion of his subjects; or like Czar Peter in Deptford Dockyard, with a timber for a throne and an adze for a sceptre, so this anecdote of Canute rebuking his courtiers is, perhaps, more familiar than the far more important events of his reign.

The story is told by Henry of Huntingdon.

THE WAHABEES.

THE Arab tribes, known by the name of Wahabees, occupy all the province of Nedjid, or central Arabia, a vast region almost unknown to Europeans, but one the war undertaken by Mehemet Ali, for the subjugation of this people, which a French writer has called the Protestants of Islamism. Many of the desert tribes are now united under this name, the principal, that of which the founder of the sect was the sheikh, being composed of the direct descendants of the Carmathites, a body of intrepid and warlike marauders, who, in the same deserts, and animated by the same spirit, became, under the Abbaside caliphs, the scourge of Islam and the terror of Arabia.

The corruptions of the Mahomedan religion, shown in the veneration of saints and the reception of traditions, the gross immorality which marked the lives of many Mussulmans, and the tyranny and luxury of the pashas, induced Abdul Wahab, the sheikh of a powerful Bedouin tribe, to attempt a reformation. He had studied theology in the school of Bussora, and during a subsequent residence at Damascus, he inveighed with such spirit and energy against the corruptions of Islamism, that he found himself in danger from the fanaticism of the Sunnites, or orthodox Moslems, and fled to Mosul. After some time, he returned to his native desert, and propagated his views with such earnestness that his followers soon formed a numerous body. He forbade the invocation of Mahomed and the saints, ordered their tombs to be destroyed, and declared the Koran to be the sole source of religious knowledge. He abolished the laws, the use of wine, opium, and tobacco, abolished the use of the crescent in prayer, and inveighed with stern and unrelenting eloquence, against the superstitions which exist among the Turk.

The Bedouins, among whom corruption had made less progress than among the Turks and the town-dwelling Arabs, needed little urging to enrol themselves under his standard, and Abdul Wahab and Mahomed Ibn Saoud, a powerful sheikh, who was one of his earliest converts, soon became the spiritual and temporal chiefs of all Nedjid. The former died in 1787, and was succeeded in authority by his son, under whom the Wahabees extended their power over the greater part of Arabia, and became a source of great uneasiness to the government at Constantinople. In 1797 the pasha of Bagdad led an army against them, but was compelled to retreat; his own province was then overrun by the victorious Wahabees, who took the town of Binnu Hussain, and plundered its famous temple of the treasures deposited there by the pious munificence of the Ottoman sultans and the shahs of Persia. In 1801 another Turkish army invaded Nedjid, but was completely routed by the Wahabees, who next marched against Mecca, which they took in 1803, having previously captured the towns of Taped and Kenfodah. The splendid mosque, the decoration and enrichment of which every Moslem prince had contributed for centuries, was plundered of its treasures and rich furniture, and the tombs of the saints were despoiled and destroyed. In the following year they took Medina, where they rifled and destroyed the tomb of Mahomed.

The sultan's indignation and displeasure which seized the orthodox Moslems when they heard that the Kaaba was in the hands of unbelievers, and the tomb of the prophet destroyed, may be conceived. It was as if John Bull, with an army of reformers, had taken Rome, cast down all the statues of the saints, and seated himself in the chair of St. Peter. Abdul Aziz, the son of Wahab, was murdered by a Persian fanatic in 1803, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Saoud, who forbade the public prayers to be said in the name of the sultan, who, from that moment, ceased in the eyes of the people, to be the visible head of Islam. The pilgrimages to Mecca ceased for six years, during which Saoud established his authority over the whole of Arabia, with the exception of the districts under the rule of the Imam of Muscat, in whom he found a powerful opponent. In 1809 the Wahabees turned their arms northward, overran Syria, and made an alliance with Yusuf, the rebellious pasha of Bagdad. The Porte soon became sorely alarmed, and, in a year for its existence, invaded the empire of Mehemet Ali, the pasha of Egypt.

Preparations were immediately made for the invasion of Arabia, and towards the end of 1811, an Egyptian army, commanded by Tuam Bey, the commander-in-chief, proceeded to the siege of the fortress of Arafah, a town of great importance in the eastern shores of the Red Sea. The invaders were repulsed at Arafah, but in 1812 they captured Mecca, and made the city the seat of their empire. Thomas Keith, a Scotch man-of-war, known as Ibrahim Aga, who led the storming party which carried the fort of Mecca, was taken by the Egyptians in 1813, and in the following year Saoud died, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Abdallah. In 1814 the invaders were defeated at Zalam, but they obtained favourable terms of retreat afterwards at Busel. Peace was then concluded, on conditions unfavourable to the Wahabees; but in the following year hostilities were recommenced, and Arabia was again invaded by an Egyptian army, under the command of Ibrahim Pasha. After an obstinate resistance, the Wahabees retreated to Deraiyah, where they were besieged in 1818. After a defence of several months, Abdallah surrendered on discretion, and he and several of his family were sent to Constantinople, where they were exposed to the gaze of the people for three days, and then suffered death by decapitation.

The greater part of Arabia now fell under the dominion of Mehemet Ali; but though the power of the Wahabees was breaking, they were not quite exterminated. Some of their chiefs in the southern and eastern parts of Nedjid refused submission, and on the approach of the Egyptians fled into the wild and desolate regions south of that province. They were still powerful enough to have considered Mehemet Ali a mortal enemy, but in 1827, and even before that time, he considered it expedient to suppress the rebellion which he encountered in the province of Yemen in 1811. Four years before he began to feel such danger as symptoms of rebellion, that Mehemet Ali thought it necessary to send an army into Nedjid to coerce them, but just as they were at length relieved from a mission, the pasha ordered his troops to send them into Syria, where his rule was disputed by the Porte. The result of the campaign was the loss of Syria, and he would have been deprived of Arabia also, but for the difficulties which the Turkish government saw it would have to encounter in dealing with the Wahabees. The loss of political power does not seem to have weakened their enthusiasm or repressed their energies, and it is not at all improbable that they are destined to yet play an important part in the affairs of the East.

Though the ascendancy of the Wahabees might for a time throw back the advancing civilisation of Turkey, there can be no doubt that the spread of their principles would be conducive to the morality of the country, and hence to the triumph of Christianity. The fundamental doctrine of their belief is the rejection of all worship except that of the Supreme Being. They refuse Mahomed the character of a prophet, and deny that the Koran is the revealed will of God, only adhering to its precepts because they believe them to be superior to those of any other book. Their mosques have neither cupolas nor minarets, and are entirely destitute of internal decorations. They hold the orthodox sectaries of the prophet in honour, and display more intolerance towards them than towards Christians or Jews. Veneration for the memory of departed sheikhs and imams is idolatry in their eyes, and as far as their power extended, they destroyed their tombs, that they might not again be made places of resort for pilgrims. In Syria, among their dispersed and afflicted brethren, and all extraneous adherents, and in India, it proved fatal.

Their manner and customs are singular. They have a strict and perfect equality of rank among them, and the only distinction is that which separates the sheikhs from the people. The system of government established by the founder of the sect was, in all, conformable to the principles of religion, the Koran, and not resembling that of the early caliphs. The sheikhs, that is, the heads of the different districts, were all to be held responsible for the conduct of justice in their respective parts. The caliph of Deraiyah, the immediate religious and civil chief, and in time of war the secular and military chief, controlled the whole of the sect, and the government. Egypt was the original seat of the sect, and the sheikhs of that country were the most numerous and influential of them any where. It was the sheikhs of Deraiyah, however, who first required laws to be constructed to govern and source of revenue, the remaining four-fifths being divided among the soldiers.

Trade and agriculture were protected, and the repugnance of the Bedouins to the latter seems to have been overcome among the Wahabees. They have cultivated the mechanical arts, also, and their linen and cotton fabrics, and even their manufactures of leather and iron, are not inferior to any produced in Arabia. In general, the frugality of the Wahabees is extreme; they live chiefly on barley-meal cakes, dates, and fish, sometimes, though rarely, substituting rice for the former, and mutton for the latter. It is only on the coast, moreover, that fish can be procured. Like all the Orientals, they take their meals seated on the ground, with their legs crossed under them, all the family sitting round the dish, and helping themselves with their fingers. Their chief beverages are milk and water; opium and tobacco, so universally used among other Moslems, whether Sunnites or Shites, they never touch.

outer garments are of finer texture and brighter colours, their caps are adorned with long tassels, and their sandals are ornamented with figures cut out of leather of various colours. In time of war, the Wahabees wear a girdle, covered with ornaments of tin or silver, in which is carried a curved poniard, that they use with terrible effect in close encounters with the enemy. The leather bags in which they carry their ammunition are always ornamented with tin and coral. When bullets are scarce among them, they use round pebbles instead, wrapping them up in leather to make them fit the barrels of their muskets and pistols; and the wounds inflicted by these projectiles are more dangerous than those made by a leaden bullet.

The Wahabees usually fight on foot or on the backs of dromedaries; the sheikhs alone appear on horseback. Each dromedary carries two soldiers, one of whom is the active warrior, the other guiding the dromedary and loading the weapons of his companion.

A WAHABEE SHEIKH.

Their powers of endurance and extreme frugality were remarked in all the campaigns of the Turks and Egyptians against them; each man carried a supply of barley-meal on the back of his dromedary or horse, and when pressed by hunger, mixed a small quantity with water, and made a meal of it without any other preparation. Accustomed to endure all kinds of privations in their native deserts, they were able to pass several days entirely without food.

The costume of the Wahabees is very simple, and nearly the same as that of the Arabs of the environs of Mecca. It consists of a full shirt of yellowish linen, which covers nearly all the body, and over which they wear a garment of woollen. Their head-dress is a coloured cap, tied round with a string of camel's hair, or a circle of wood, ornamented with pieces of tin or mother-of-pearl. The sheikhs display a little more luxury in their vestments, but are interdicted from wearing silk or ornaments of gold, which are prohibited by the Koran. Their shirts are embroidered, their

Their chief strength, however, is in infantry, the dromedary riders being seldom brought into action, but reserved for pursuing the enemy when put to flight, and for sudden attacks and plundering excursions.

The sheikhs, when equipped for war, wear a helmet surmounted with a steel spike, and having chain-mail falling from behind to protect the neck and shoulders; and are armed with a long and heavy two-edged sword of native manufacture, or a sabre of Turkish manufacture, a small buckler on the left arm, and a curved poniard in their girdle. Their saddles are ornamented with glass and coral beads, and with ostrich plumes, and are well adapted, by their form, to render their seat firm, so that they seem fixed to them. Their stirrups are usually simple rings of iron, and sometimes consist only of a cord of camel's hair. Two large rhomboidal shields, attached on each side to the flanks of their horses, protect them from the thrusts of lances and the strokes of sabres and poniards.

DRESDEN.

This beautiful city, sometimes called the German Florence, is situated in the centre of the wine district of Saxony, and occupies the finest portion of the fertile valley of the Elbe. It is divided into the Old and New Towns, connected by two bridges, the former lying on the right or south bank of the river, and the latter on the left bank. The elder of the two bridges is 1,420 feet long, and built of stone, with sixteen arches; the balustrades are of iron, and the central pier is adorned with a bronze crucifix, and an inscription commemorating the destruction of a portion of the bridge by Marshal Davoust during the retreat of the French army in 1813, and its restoration by the Emperor Alexander, of Russia. The other bridge, over which is carried the railway from Leipzig to Prague, was constructed in 1850. The fortifications were demolished by order of Napoleon in 1810, which has greatly improved stones, curiosities, and objects of virtu. The picture gallery contains the finest collection in Germany, including many of the best works of Correggio, Titian, Carlo Dolce, Paul Veronese, Annibal Caracci, Guido, Rembrandt, Rubens, Vandyck, Teniers, Claude, &c. In the apartments beneath the gallery is a fine collection of plaster casts of the most celebrated ancient and modern sculptures, made under the direction of Mengs. Augustus II. intended to build a new palace, but completed only a portion, which is now appropriated to the armoury, containing a collection second only to that at Vienna, a zoological and mineralogical museum, and a gallery of fine engravings, to the number of at least 200,000. The grand opera-house adjoins one of the wings of this fine pile of buildings, and is capable of accommodating 8,000 persons. The churches most worthy of notice in this part of the city are that of Our Lady, the city, the ground which they covered having been converted into public walks and gardens, which constitute one of the most frequented promenades of the inhabitants.

The streets of the Old Town are narrow, and the houses have a heavy appearance, often inclining considerably towards the street. Here, however, are the principal public edifices, including the royal palace, the palace of the prince, the far-famed picture-gallery, the grand opera-house, the palace of Prince Maximilian, the mint, the arsenal, the house of assembly, the town-hall, and the new post-office. The royal palace is externally a heavy and ancient-looking building, having been erected in an age when strength and security were regarded as essential characteristics of royal residences. The interior, however, is very splendid, and the state treasury contains a large and valuable collection of precious in the new market, and the Catholic church, which occupies a prominent position between the royal palace and the bridge. The former is a beautiful stone edifice, with a cupola modelled after that of St. Peter's at Rome, and is shown in our engraving on the left of the bridge. The latter, which the reader will perceive near the foot of the bridge, is a large and profusely decorated building in the Italian style, containing a fine altarpiece by Mengs, and a splendid organ, the masterpiece of Silbermann, and celebrated throughout Germany for the sweetness of its tones.

In the New Town the streets are wider, and of more regular architecture, but the public buildings are not so numerous. The railing, represented in the foreground of the above engraving, bounds the beautiful gardens of the Japanese palace, constructed by Augustus II., and now called after its royal founder, the August-team. The gardens form a delightful promenade for the citizens, and the palace contains a splendid collection of antiquities and sculpture, a cabinet of coins, an extensive library, and the celebrated porcelain cabinet, with sixty thousand of the choicest productions of the potter's art, from the manufactories of Meissen, Sèvres, Italy, China, and Japan, altogether filling eighteen apartments. The gallery of sculpture contains, among other antiquities, the torso of Minerva, the head of Niobe, a fawn, three female figures from Herculaneum, and a fine series of Etruscan vases. The library contains 250,000 volumes, 100,000 pamphlets, 20,000 maps, and 4,000 manuscripts, including a "Treatise" by Albert Durer, on the proportions of the human body. All these apartments are accessible to the public. In the market-place of the New Town is an equestrian statue of Augustus II., who is represented in the ancient Roman costume, but with the singular addition of a full-bottomed wig. The only other public buildings worthy of notice on this side of the Elbe, are the town-hall, the church of the Holy Trinity, and the residence of the military commandant.

The inhabitants of Dresden are industrious and orderly, and concern themselves very little with politics; but a love of music and the fine arts generally is very highly developed among them. There are five newspapers, but none of them take a prominent or decided part in political agitations. A stroll through the picture-gallery, and afterwards a walk on the Brühl Terrace, or the beautiful gardens of the Augusteum, are the principal amusements of the people. In the environs of the city are several places to which they resort in fine weather to indulge their love of promenade and dancing—as the Zinkbad, a hotel on the right bank of the Elbe, surrounded by beautiful gardens, and the tastefully-laid out gardens called Findlater's Vineyard, about three miles beyond the New Town. On Sunday afternoons these places are thronged with company, sitting under the trees, refreshing themselves and listening to the music of the excellent bands with which all these places of popular resort are provided. Dancing is a favourite amusement at these gardens, but is not prolonged to such a late hour as it commonly is in this country, as few people in Dresden are out of bed after half-past ten at night. The moderation that is displayed in the pursuit of these enjoyments, and their love of art and appreciation of intellectual pleasures, speak highly for the national character.

LORD COLLINGWOOD.

CUTHBERT COLLINGWOOD, afterwards Lord Collingwood, was born in the town and county of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, on the 26th September, 1750. He was the eldest of three sons. His father, though descended from an ancient and once wealthy Northumberland family, was a man of narrow fortune. The Collingwoods had taken the side of Royalty during the memorable struggle for liberty with Charles the I., and again had taken the side of Legitimacy in the rising for the Stuart cause in 1715. This lost them their estates, and the father of the subject of this memoir with difficulty brought up, educated, and provided for a family of three sons and three daughters. The education which young Cuthbert Collingwood received was obtained under the Rev. Huzh Moises, the head master of the Endowed Grammar School of Newcastle, an establishment at that time in some repute. At this school, from which have issued various men more or less known to the world, he had four school fellows, the two sons of Mr. Scott, a coal-merchant, John and William, who with himself were destined in a few years to reach celebrity and a peerage, though by a path less heroic, and probably less pure, than that of their little playmate. It is a curious instance of the vicissitudes of life, that, in this ancient school of a remote town, should be, at work or at play, within a few yards of each other, the future Lords Collingwood, Eldon, and Stowell. The fortune of Collingwood's parent was, as we have said, not great; and hence, probably, he was early destined for the sea. His uncle by the mother's side, Captain Brathwaite, afterwards Admiral Brathwaite, who was then in active service, readily received his young kinsman; and in 1762, when Collingwood had turned his eleventh year, he was placed with Captain Brathwaite, and began soon after a sailor's life, as a young midshipman. In after days, Collingwood used to describe the pain which this early separation from parents, friends, and home caused him to suffer; for of home, Collingwood through life was enthusiastically fond. The anecdote as he told it, is very characteristic of the feelings of a child so circumstanced. After coming on board, and seeing his captain and relative, he found himself so lonely that he sat down and cried heartily—thinking of his home and kind parents. The first lieutenant observing this, and being a humane man, took his hand, and cheered him up by affecting to make a little companion of him. This kindness so won upon the heart of the poor boy that, taking the lieutenant down to his berth, he offered him, in gratitude, a large and doubtless nice plum-cake, which his careful mother had deposited in his sea-chest.

Collingwood's first ship was the Shannon, then commanded by his relative Captain Brathwaite. Here he served for some years of his youth; and afterwards sailed with another Northumberland friend, Captain, afterwards Admiral Robbun, of Robbun in that county. The fatal American war, caused by the outrageous cupidity and tyranny of the English aristocracy, now broke out; and in 1774, young Collingwood, now in his twenty-fifth year, was sent to Boston, under Admiral Graves, to assist in carrying on that suicidal, and to England disgraceful and disastrous, conflict. In 1775, he was raised to the rank of lieutenant, and received his commission on the day of the memorable fight at Bunker's Hill, for the troops who fought at which he was employed in the conveyance of stores. In 1776, he was removed to the Hornet sloop; and afterwards to the Lowestoffe. Of this vessel, Nelson was then lieutenant; and the two officers, soon perceiving each other's value, became friends for life. This friendship was highly honourable to both. In some respects no two men could be more different than were Nelson and Collingwood. The latter inheriting of the rash ardour of the former; but was cool, calculating, and prudent to a high degree. Both, however, possessed an unbounded devotion to the service of their country, and a contempt of the corruptions then very prevalent in the navy, which they carried with them through life, but not with equal steadiness. The transactions in the Bay of Naples, many years after this, no doubt prompted by the profligate queen of Naples, and her equally profligate confidante, Lady Hamilton, cast a shade upon the character of Nelson, from which that of his comrade Collingwood is completely free. From those stern rules of honour and honesty, which were his pedestal through the whole of his career, Collingwood never for one instant swerved. He never was subservient to influence or official corruption. He was incapable of a mean action. His sense of honour was what is now termed "romantic." His sense of honesty was unchangeable and impregnable. He had nothing of the showiness of Nelson, but he had more stability, common sense, conjoined with a rare intrepidity, was the characteristic of Collingwood. During, joined to wonderful tact and splendour of conception, distinguished Nelson. Thus differing, as they did, their life-long friendship was honourable to both.

To Collingwood it was useful in many ways. His great modesty of character made him liable to be overlooked. He had no pretension, and, with superficial men, pretension is everything. Lieutenant Nelson, however, made his worth known to his own patron, Sir P. Parker; and whenever Nelson was advanced Collingwood succeeded him; and thus in early life he gained ground in his profession and kept it, though some of his very virtues stood sadly in his way towards promotion.

After Collingwood joined the Lowestoffe, his promotion was rapid; and he soon became master and commander, first of the Bulger and next of the Hinchinbroke, a twenty-eight gun vessel, then on the West Indian station; and whilst on this service, he was made a post-captain. In the year 1780, towards the close of the great American conflict, the Hinchinbroke and her captain were sent on an expedition to Niagara. The object seems to have been to try to open a passage by water into the Pacific, through the river San Juan, and the Nicaragua and Leon Lake—precisely the line by which a ship canal is now projected. The project failed. The ventilation of ships, and the mode of preserving the health of crews, were then little understood. The result was, that numbers of those who went on this ill-fated adventure died of fever, until, in some cases, hardly a man was left; and the expedition was, as a matter of necessity, abandoned.

From the Hindostoeke Captain Collingwood was now, in 1780, conveyed to the Pelagon, a small frigate, in which he was, in the midst of a tropical hurricane, wrecked upon some rocks called "the Morant Keys," and with difficulty saved his life and those of his crew. They were compelled to remain upon a sandy island, almost destitute of food, and still more of water, for ten days, until providentially taken off by the Diamond frigate. The American war now found its disastrous conclusion. The United States became an independent union of Federated Republics; and Collingwood, together with his friend Nelson, was employed in the unpleasant duty of stopping the trade between the States and the West India sugar islands of Great Britain, now illegal, but yet clandestinely carried on by the English colonist and their American friends. This difficult service Captain Collingwood executed with a goodly measure of humanity but strictness of surveillance, that gained him great credit. In this disagreeable task he was ably assisted by his brother-in-law Captain Wilfrid Collingwood, whom, however, he lost shortly after, a victim to the climate.

About this time Captain Collingwood appears to have corresponded with a young connexion of his own, named Lane, who was about entering the navy. These letters are strongly characteristic of the good sense and correct notion for which this great man was, throughout his whole career, distinguished; as the following extracts will show:

"I need not say more to you on the subject of sobriety, than to recommend to you the continuance of it as exactly as when you were with me. Were a man as wise as Solomon and as brave as Achilles, he would still be unworthy of trust, if he addicted himself to wine. He may make a dupe of; but a respectable officer he can never be, for the doubt must always remain that the capacity which God has given him will be abused by intemperance. Young men are generally introduced to this vice by the company they keep; but do you guard against submitting yourself to be the companion of low, vulgar, dissipated men, and hold it a maxim that you had better be alone than in low company. You don't find pigeons associate with hawks, nor lambs with bears; it is as unnatural for a young man to be the companion of blackguards. Read, let me charge you to read. Study books that treat of your profession and of history. . . . Remember, Lane, before you are five-and-twenty, you must establish a character that will serve you all your life. November 9th, 1787."

In this strain of sensible and high morality did Collingwood, himself still in the morning of life, write to his young friend. We shall afterwards see in what strain he wrote to his own children, when full of honours and at the head of his profession.

From 1786 to 1790, he was not on active service; and, of course, went down to Northumberland, to make himself acquainted with the branches of his own family to whom he was yet a stranger. During his sojourn in the neighbourhood of Newcastle probably the happiest portion of his life: he became acquainted with Miss Sarah Blackett, daughter of John Erasmus Blackett, Esq., of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, whom he afterwards married, and to whom he was devotedly attached through life. The marriage took place in 1790, and his wife, in due time, bore him two daughters; Sarah, born in May, 1792; and Mary Patience, born in 1793. This state of peaceful content, so congenial to the well-regulated mind of Collingwood, was not, however, fitted to last. In 1789, the French Revolution began by the opening of the States General. As it proceeded the passions of both the royal and democratic parties became more and more inflamed. One excess brought on another. A coalition against France was formed by the continental depot of Prussia and Austria. This led to the death of the unfortunate King; and England having now joined the League, war was proclaimed, and Collingwood again in actual service. He was now captain of the Princess Admiral Boscawen's frigate, and in her bore his share in the action of the 1st of June. His fondness for his family is beautifully, because unobtrusively, evinced in his letter to his father-in-law, Mr. Blackett, written after the conflict. He thus expresses himself: "We crucified like disappointed people, looking for what they could not find, until the invasion of 1793. Sunday, 14th February, between 11 and nine, when the French fleet of twenty-five sail of the line was discovered to windward." With the enemy in sight and on the verge of a bloody conflict, he dwells on his little daughter's birthday. The detail of this remarkable battle are known to all readers of history. That Collingwood's duty nobly is beyond all doubt. Yet here the singular modesty and humility of his character seem to have stood in his way. He was not named in the despatch of the admiral, Lord Howe, nor did he receive the medal given for this victory until 1797. This omission astonished the whole fleet, as Collingwood's valour and skill were conspicuous; but it was afterwards amply atoned for. That he was deeply hurt on this occasion, he has put on record; but for that hurt he caused a balsam to be afterwards applied, which was potent to heal.

It would be needless to go into the details of the various service in which Collingwood was busily engaged, between the period of this victory and the equally memorable action, under Jervis, off Cape St. Vincent, on the 14th February, 1797. Suffice it to say that, on this occasion, he commanded the Excellent, line-of-battle ship, and in activity and intrepidity was second only perhaps to his friend Nelson, who in this action commanded the Captain. On this last occasion, it is evident from all the narratives of the battle that the united intrepidity, devotion, and skill of Collingwood really caused the surrender of three of the prizes, if not four, although he only took possession of one formally. He first compelled the Salvador del Mundo, of 112 guns, to strike; but passing on to the next, the Spaniards again hoisted their colours, until attacked a second time by a succeeding vessel. He then took the San Isidro, seventy-four, and left her in charge of the Lively frigate. He next fell on board the San Nicholas of eighty, and the San Joseph of 112 guns, and silenced their fire, but left them to be boarded and taken by Nelson, whose ship they had terribly shattered. He then attacked and engaged for upwards of an hour the Santissimo Trinidad, a huge four-decker of 132 guns; but though he was assisted at last by other ships, this enormous ship escaped them all, being reserved for another fate. And now came Collingwood's triumph, and the action honorable for the most unmerited and unworthy slight which he experienced after his services on the 1st of June. When the admiral saw Lord St. Vincent inform Captain Collingwood that he was to receive one of the medals which were distributed after this victory, he refused to take it unless that of the 1st of June accompanied it. He at once avowed that he had been unjustly treated, and that he would not appear to ratify injury by receiving a medal now, whilst the other was withheld. "This," was the answer I expected from you, Collingwood," was the reply of Lord St. Vincent. Both medals were immediately sent, together with an apologetic letter from Earl Spencer, at that time at the head of the Admiralty.

We must reserve the conclusion of the gallant admiral's biography for a future occasion.

THE MERCHANT OF THE EAST CENTURY.

The rise of commerce in Europe dates from the time of the Crusades. The vessels which conveyed the soldiers of the Cross to the shores of Syria, and the greater part of their military stores and provisions, were furnished by the Italian republics; and the towns on those coasts which were temporarily in the hands of the Christians became the emporiums of Italian commerce. The products of the sultry East, which have since become the materials of a lucrative and extensive commerce, were thus first introduced into Europe; and while the prizes of the Crusades filled the stores of their palaces, strown with riches, the merchant of Italy tried the soft carpets of Turkey.

The application of Gibber's discovery of the polarity of the magnet to navigation, and the opening of the ocean route to India by Vasco di Gama, in the fifteenth century, transferred the commerce of Europe from the hands of the Italians to those of the Portuguese. The discovery of America opened a new world to commercial enterprise, the benefits of which were shared by the English and French, while the countrymen of Pizarro and Cortez were absorbed in the search for gold.

At the commencement of the eighteenth century, the great commercial powers of Europe were Britain, France, Holland, and Spain. The war of the French Revolution established the naval superiority of Britain, and gave such an immense impetus to our foreign trade, that our manufactures and the produce of our colonies now find their way to all parts of the globe. Of the merchants of the early part of the last century we have some interesting glimpses in Scott's "Rob-

The relations between the merchant, who was almost always a shipowner, and the crews of his ships, were much more durable than at the present day. Generally the sailors continued all their lives in the service of the same firm, and very often this relation was continued through two or three generations, the sons serving the same employers as their fathers and grandfathers. Partaking, under certain conditions, of the benefits of each voyage, they regarded the affairs of the firm they served as their own, and while acting with exemplary fidelity and honesty, often contrived to save sufficient money to engage in trade on their own account, or secured

Roy," in the elder Osbaldestone, his honest old clerk Trisham, and worthy Bailie Nicol Jarvie. Perhaps, as a class, the character of British merchants for probity, intelligence, and generosity was never better maintained than at that period. Heads of commercial houses were anxious to transmit the reputation they had acquired to their sons, as an heritage of honour.* Death caused no interruption in their affairs; the business of the firm continued to be conducted on the same principles, and generally under the same name; so that the old maxim, that "the king never dies," and the proclamation of the French heralds, "The king is dead! Long live the king!" was as applicable to them as to more exalted personages, in an ample provision for their declining years. The master, generally honoured with the title of captain, was a sort of middleman between the merchant and the crew; and in the picture which we have engraved the artist has represented one of this class arranging the preliminaries of a voyage with the owner. The costume of the merchant and his clerk indicate the middle of the last century; the captain's is such as was worn at that period by the mariners of Dieppe and Flushing. His attitude is free and independent, as characteristic of his class; and he holds in his right hand the pocket-book from which he has taken the charter-party which the merchant is perusing.

THE HARE AND THE RABBIT.

We presume that most of our readers are aware that the hare—when first caught and afterwards cooked in a cocoon with the well-known receipt of the celebrated Mrs. Glasse—constitutes a highly-esteemed article of food; and, taking this for granted, we shall not trouble ourselves with the consideration of the dietetical properties of the animal, although doubtless much might be written present day, so much so, in fact, that Martial terms it “inter quadrupedes gloria prima,” with some other nations of antiquity it was a forbidden food; the prohibition in the Jewish law is well known, and our own Druidical ancestors even considered the use of hare’s flesh an act of impiety. The Koran also prohibits the followers of Mahomet from eating the flesh of this animal.

HARES AND RABBITS.

upon the precise degree of putrefaction at which its flesh acquires the finest flavour, the superiority of one mode of cooking over the other, or the origin of the custom of eating currant-jelly with it as a condiment. With reference to this important branch of the subject we may observe, however, that although the hare was as great a favourite with the ancient Romans as with the epicures of the

The appearance of the hare must also be pretty well known to our readers; but many of them are perhaps not so well acquainted with its natural history; and as this presents much that is interesting, we shall confine ourselves as far as possible to a sketch of its habits.

The Hare Lepus timidus, with its well-known congener the Rabbit (Lepus cuniculus), belongs to the same order of quadrupeds as the rat and the squirrel,—an order distinguished by having a pair of strong chisel-shaped cutting-teeth in the front of each jaw, by means of which they are enabled to gnaw with facility into hard substances, such as wood, bark, &c.; from this peculiarity they are termed Rodentia, or gnawing animals. The construction of these teeth, and the provision for their constant maintenance in an effective condition, is very curious; the front of the tooth is covered with a thin coating of very hard enamel, so that the cutting-edge is kept sharp by the continual wearing away of the softer parts; and as this would in course of time gradually wear them down to useless stumps, they are furnished, instead of roots like those of other teeth, with a permanent pulp, which keeps the teeth continually growing, so as to make up for the wearing of the upper extremity. This circumstance is sometimes productive of a singular deformity, for if one of the teeth happens to be broken off, the corresponding one in the other jaw, having nothing to check its growth, goes on increasing in length, until so far from being of service to the animal it must become a positive nuisance to him, and in some cases may even cause him to starve to death. It is with these teeth that the hares often strip the bark from young trees—a proceeding which is by no means regarded with favour by the proprietors of plantations. In fact, like most game animals, hares are a great pest to the farmers in their neighbourhood, their fondness for succulent vegetable food leading them to make frequent incursions upon the young crops, to which they often do immense damage; and as they are completely nocturnal in their habits, it is by no means easy to prevent their depredations.

Fortunately for the husbandman, the numbers of these animals, whose great fecundity would otherwise soon render them one of the farmer's greatest enemies, are continually kept in check by their numerous natural foes. The numbers destroyed by men are certainly very great, but the human epizootic is not the only carnivorous animal endowed with a taste for hare's flesh; all our wild canivora, from the fox downwards, appear to be equally fond of it; almost any dog will pursue a hare as soon as he sees it, although his success in the chase is rarely commensurate with his zeal. The domestic cat is not infrequently a successful poacher; and birds of prey, and even snakes, often drive the hare from its resting-place. Surrounded in this manner with inveterate enemies—seeing a foe in almost every animal it meets—the hare, as might be expected, is an excessively timid animal, and every part of its organisation is peculiarly adapted to enable it to perceive and avoid the dangers which environ it on every side. Its ears are very long, and adapted, like the tubes used by deaf persons, to collect and convey to the internal ear the very slightest sounds; the eye is large and prominent, giving the animal a great range of vision; and it is a popular belief that it always sleeps with the eyes open. It is singular that the same practice has also been attributed to the lion, probably with equal justice in both cases. There can be no doubt, however, that the hare is a very watchful animal; during the day it sleeps in its form, and only ventures forth when the shades of evening seem to promise it security. Then the hares come out of their resting-places and gambol about in the most sportive manner; but the slightest sound, the rustle of the wind in the bushes, or the fall of a leaf, is sufficient to interrupt their sport and scatter the whole troop in every direction.

When actual danger approaches, the hare flies with a swiftness which has become proverbial, always endeavouring to make for some rising ground, as its long and powerful hind legs give it a great advantage in running up hill. The instincts with which it is endowed then come into play; it endeavours by continual turnings and dodgings to throw its pursuers off the scent, and sometimes, when hard pressed, it has been known to turn another hare out of its form. If water comes in its way, it will plunge in and swim across; sometimes it will run up one side of a hedge and down the other, and instances are related of a hare's completely throwing out the dogs by getting on the top of a cut hedge, and running along for a considerable distance in this elevated position.

Notwithstanding this apparent league of all carnivorous animals, biped and quadruped, against the life of "puss," the continuance of the species is amply provided for by its prolific nature. They generally produce three or four young at a time, and breed several times in the course of the year, so that, but for these numerous checks upon their increase, the country would speedily be overrun by these animals.

The fur of the hare, with that of the rabbit, was formerly much employed in the manufacture of hatter hats. Linnæus tells us, that the hare being a favourite animal with the fleas, the inhabitants of Dalecarlia make a sort of cloth of the hair, which attracts the fleas, and thus saves the wearer from the attacks of those troublesome insects. We fear that the fleas would soon find out their mistake, and that the protection afforded by this hare-cloth would not be very lasting.

In confinement, the hare exhibits many entertaining and amiable qualities, loses much of its timidity, and adapts as play-fellows animals that would have been looked upon as sworn enemies in a state of nature. Cowper's account of his tame hares must be familiar to most of our readers, and although many will, perhaps, be inclined to laugh at the poet's attachment to his pets, few, we think, will read his description of their habits and the variety of character displayed by them without pleasure.

In its general structure and many of its habits the rabbit closely resembles the hare. Its enemies are equally numerous, and its timidity perhaps almost as great, although as it is not endowed with the same swiftness of foot as the hare, it rarely exhibits this in the same manner. To make up for its want of speed to fly from its enemies, the rabbit burrows in the earth, and disappears into its holes with the quickness of thought the moment it suspects the approach of danger. Like the hare, the rabbit feeds principally at night, remaining during the day in its burrows, which are often of great extent, and inhabited by an immense number of these creatures. This peculiarity in the habits of these animals enables their breeding to be carried on as a branch of rural industry, and, as both their flesh and skins are consumed to an enormous extent in most countries of Europe, a good rabbit-warren is by no means an unprofitable concern. Immense numbers of rabbit skins are imported into this country from the continent, to be worked up into cheap furs, and a considerable exportation of them also takes place, especially to China, where they are in great request. The particular skins preferred by the Chinese are those denominated "silver gray," and these will fetch from two to three shillings a-piece in the home market.

It is generally supposed that the native country of the rabbit is Spain, and that the species has been introduced into this country. They are now, however, completely naturalised both here and in most parts of Europe, although they are said not to thrive in the cold northern countries.

THE SECRET TRIBUNALS OF WESTPHALIA.

No period in the history of Germany presents such a picture of social anarchy, of the operation of the law of might in all its uncontrolled fulness of power, as the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. The landed nobility were the universal disturbers of social order and the most reckless violators of the moral law; from the Rhine to the Elbe, and from the Baltic to the Alps, they set the written laws of the empire at defiance, filled their castles with banditti, and, according to the testimony of Arnold of Lubek, each followed the bent of his inclination. When a social evil becomes no longer endurable, circumstances invariably arise to counteract it, often such as at other times would be an evil in itself. The crimes of the barons led to the establishment of the Vehm-gerichte (holy tribunals), which the genius of Goethe and Scott has invested with so many circumstances of mystery and awe.

These remarkable tribunals had their origin in Westphalia, where the first traces of their operations are discovered in the latter part of the thirteenth century; but they soon existed all over Germany. Owing to the secrecy which surrounded them, and the awe with which they were regarded, for death was the penalty of revealing their secrets or becoming surreptitiously possessed of them, their history is involved in obscurity. The first writers who mention them—Henry of Heworden, a Dominican monk of the fourteenth century, and Eneas Sylvius, secretary to the emperor Frederick III.—ascribe their institution to Charlemagne; but Eginhart, the secretary and biographer of that monarch, and all other contempoetry writers, say nothing of this circumstance, and there is no evidence whatever to support such an opinion. It is true that this opinion was always prevalent, for the members of the Vehm, or ichte, were assiduous in disseminating it, to add importance to the institution and their decisions; but the most probable hypothesis is, that they owed their origin to a little band of bold and honest men, determined to put a period to the lawlessness and tyranny of the feudal nobility, and the outrages of the landritzi with whom they were often leagueed.

In drama and romance, the black-robed judges of the Vehm tribunals have been represented as meeting, at the solemn hour of midnight, in the dungeon of some baronial castle, when, by the red light of flickering torches, revenge usurped the place of justice. But, in reality, the equity of their proceedings formed a striking contrast to those of the ordinary tribunals, and for almost a century they were the only check upon crime and oppression. The powerful baron who exercised jurisdiction over his own domains, and the knight who had at his disposal a hundred robbers in the nearest wood, could afford to treat with contempt and defiance the decisions of the ordinary tribunals; but the secret organisation of the Vehm, gerichte, their widely-extended ramifications, and the number and fidelity of their emissaries, were not so lightly to be set at naught. Their castles and their armed retainers might enable them to resist successfully the execution of the ordinary laws, but no strength of walls or depth of moat could protect them against the sworn servants of the Vehm tribunal dwelling unsuspected beneath the same roof.

No one was allowed to become a member of the Vehm-gerichte who was a foreigner, or of illegitimate birth, under the ban of excommunication or outlawry, or a member of any religious order. The ceremony of initiation was a very solemn one: the oath of secrecy and adherence was administered, and the signs were communicated by which the initiated recognised each other. The clergy, women and children, Jews, and heathens (as some of the natives of Prussia still were), were exempted by the regulations of the Vehm tribunals from their jurisdiction. When an offender had been denounced to the Vehm judges, and did not appear to the citation served upon him, he was outlawed, and every one of the initiated one hundred thousand in number, according to Ennius Sylvius, was empowered to take him, alive or dead. The chances of escape, in such a case, were small indeed; and brief was the period which usually intervened between the issue of the ban and the appearance of the offender before the dread tribunal.

The Vehm-gerichte had three methods of procedure—the summary, the secret, and the open. The summary course was only followed when an offender was caught in the act of commission, or in endeavouring to escape; and then only when three of the initiated happened to be present. Such cases, it must be evident, could very rarely occur; but when they did, the daggers of the initiated were the instruments of execution. The secret process was only adopted when the crime was of more than ordinary atrocity, and there was a fair of the offender's escape; the tribunal was then summoned in haste, and on proof of the crime being given, sentence of death was passed, and communicated to all the initiated, thousands of whom were immediately on the offender's trail. The more usual method was to cite the offender to appear before the tribunal of the district in which he resided, failing in which a fine of thirty schillingen, a much larger sum in that day than at present, was recorded against him; if he did not appear to the second summons, the fine was doubled; and if the third was equally unsuccessful, the offender was outlawed. The plea of unavoidable absence was always admitted, the impediment being proved by the Vehm laws being sickness, imprisonment, pilgrimage, the public service, lawful absence from the country, and unavoidable delay upon the way to the tribunal.

In romances and drama, the Vehm tribunals are always represented as being held in gloomy vaults, but in reality only one—the Land-Vehm tribunal being held underground, and it was at Brandenburg; and in the majority of cases they were held in the open air, the initiation of the parties to a murder, as described by Tacitus. It is probable that they originally met in the glades of forests, where they would receive more observation; but it is recorded that at Dormund the tribunal was held in the market-place, at Nordkirchen in the church, and at Arensburg in an orchard. No one was allowed to wear armour or carry arms in the tribunal, and the ranks of the association required that the tribunal itself, who was always of the rank of nobility, and the assessors, who formed the jury, should be sober and free from anger. The judge, or tribunal lord, sat at the head of a table, on which were placed a halberd and a naked sword, and on his right and left stood the clerks, the assessors, and a number of the initiated as chose to be present, all bare-headed. The accusation having been read, witnesses were called in support of it, and the accused had the privilege of calling whom he chose for his vindication. The assessor appeared to have decided by a majority of voices, and if the sentence was a capital one, the offender was hanged upon the spot, and his name, crime, and sentence recorded in what was called the "Blood Book." If he was one of the initiated, he was hanged seven feet higher than usual, as being the greater criminal. If the accused had not surrendered, all the initiated were set in pursuit of him, and when taken he was hanged on the nearest tree, without further ceremony or delay.

At the commencement of the fifteenth century, the jurisdiction of the Vehm tribunals extended over all Germany. But, like all similar institutions, they at length became corrupted, and were made subservient to private interests and passions. Various attempts were made in the sixteenth century to reform them, but without success; and having outlived the social state in which they had their rise, they became an evil and a nuisance. The civil reforms of the Emperor Maximilian did much to render them obsolete; and though they were never formally abolished, they gradually sank into insignificance and desuetude, and towards the end of the sixteenth century became a thing of the past. Their power and influence were at their zenith at the commencement of the fifteenth century; the middle period of their history, when the Emperor Rupert ordered the decisions which declared and defined the privileges of the emperor with respect to these tribunals to be collected; and this is the earliest accredited source from which a knowledge of the Vehm laws and methods of procedure can be derived.

The power and influence which the Vehm courts possessed in the fifteenth century is proved by the citation of powerful nobles, and even sovereign princes. In 1419, the Rhingrave was summoned before the secret tribunal of Norderman; in 1448, the Elector Palatine was cited to appear before a Vehm court, and with difficulty escaped condemnation; and in 1451, the Duke of Saxony was compelled to appear and defend himself before the tribunal of Limburg. The Duke of Bavaria also was cited to appear before the tribunal of Waldeck, on the charge of depriving one Gaspar of the office of chief huntsman, which was hereditary in his family; of having destroyed his castle of Tornuzen, beaten his servants, and seized his bounds; and with having robbed the said Gaspar's wife of her jewels and other property. The duke appealed to the Emperor Sigismund, who declined to interfere; and finding it necessary to answer the charge, he had recourse to the artful expedient of causing himself to be initiated in some other Vehm court, and thereby acquiring the privileges of membership, which obtained him more lenient treatment than he would otherwise have received.

Towards the close of the fifteenth century, we find the Vehm tribunals rising superior to the prejudices of the age, and boldly supporting the cause of a man accused of treason against the highest powers of the empire. The accused was a citizen of Gorlitz, named Weller, and a member of the Vehm society; for the time alleged against him he was expelled from the town, and his property confiscated. Having vainly appealed to the chancellor of the empire and to the pope, Weller resolved to bring the matter before a Vehm tribunal, and the magistrates of Gorlitz were cited to appear before that of Bruckel. Gorlitz having been exempted from foreign jurisdiction by the emperors, the magistrates appealed to the King of Bohemia, who attempted to mediate; but his interference was disregarded, and the burgesses and town-council, failing to appear before the tribunal, were outlawed. The diet of Bohemia and the Landgrave of Hesse were desired their mediation, but the Vehm-gerichte would be bound of nothing but the reversal of Weller's sentence. The emperor finally interposed for the protection of Gorlitz, and Weller died in 1502, without obtaining his property, but in 1512 full compensation was made to his heirs.

TOURING IN IRELAND IN 1854.

THAT portion of Ireland lying to the south and on either hand of the point at which our last article concluded having been described and illustrated in previous numbers of this periodical, we have now to invite the reader to commence with us a rapid glance at some of the more remarkable features of what may be called the Shannon district, beginning with the central point of tourist departure for such exploration, namely, Athlone, an important trading town and military station, on the Shannon, which here separates Leinster and Connaught, and the counties of Westmeath

Shannon at the place of the ancient ford, rendered famous by the desperate encounter upon it between the army of King James, under St. Ruth, and King William's soldiers, under Ginkell, in 1691, was pulled down a few years ago, and replaced by the present graceful structure. The barracks, adjoining the castle, can accommodate 267 artillery, 592 infantry, and 107 horse; and there is an armoury of 15,000 stand of arms. Of numerous monasteries, scarcely any remains exist; probably they were destroyed during some of the many sieges, the most memorable of which occurred in

Once Athlone was the chief pass from Leinster to Connaught; and, soon after the settlement of the Anglo-Normans, became one of their strongholds. Of the ancient walls- portions remain; and the north gate, a square tower of Elizabeth's time, was pulled down only a few years ago. Several relics are still preserved, one being the doorway of the residence of General de Ginkell at the siege in 1689. The renowned bridge of Athlone, which spanned the

In 1697 the citadel was struck by lightning, when 260 barrels of powder, 10,000 charged hand-grenades, besides other combustibles, exploded, destroying nearly the whole of the town. Besides the church of the Establishment, and several Roman Catholic chapels, Athlone contains Baptists' and Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists' chapels. There are no modern senting the reader with a fac-simile of the birthplace of the poet himself, and exactly as it is at this present moment, for it has been expressly sketched by the artist within the last twelvemonth.

On the direct line to Galway there are few things to arrest us between Athlone and Ballinasloe, except the fine viaduct over the Suck, across which the train passes. Ballinasloe is a town of considerable size, partly in County Roscommon, but chiefly in County Galway, containing some handsome buildings, and remarkable for the great fair held from the 5th to the 9th of October, the largest cattle mart in the kingdom, attended from all parts of Great Britain and the Continent. Garbally, seat of Lord Clunmear, in the immediate vicinity of the town (his lordship is proprietor) is a beautifully laid out, and the house contains some fine pictures, and the access is generously granted to both. The ruins of a castle, of great strength in Elizabeth's time, are situated on the Roscommon side of the Suck, and the fosse and several flanking towers remain. Four miles from Ballinasloe is the village of Aughrim, remarkable from the battle on the adjoining fields of Kilmoulan in 1691, between James and William, when the former was totally routed, and St. Ruth, his general, killed. However, the point from which the tourist should start for the scene of this great and decisive conflict is Athlone; and it has been the cause of much wonderment with some that Mr. Creasy did not give this hand-to-hand fight precedence to the battle of Crey. A part of the ruins of Aughrim Castle can still be traced; and in the village are a church, chapel, and small Methodist meeting-house.

The next object of interest we meet is Kilsnoel, a village where a monastery for Franciscan friars was founded about 1169. Nearly the entire shell of this most beautiful structure remains. A little further on we come to Athery, a village also most remarkable for its ancient buildings, of which the castle, built in the thirteenth century by the De Bermingham family, is the most perfectly preserved. The Dominican Abbey is, perhaps, one of the finest ecclesiastical ruins in the whole country.

Besides the castle and its religious houses, the whole town retains a great portion of its wall, and one of its ancient castellated gateways. The former, which is of considerable height and thickness, is defended at intervals by round towers of great strength.

We have now almost accomplished our journey to Midway, near the seventh mile-post from which we pass the ruined Castle of Berrydonnell; and from about the twenty-first, we see Oranmore Castle, built by the great Earl of Clarendon. The splendid swivel bridge at Lough Athalia, said to be the largest in the world, next arrests attention, when the tourist finds himself before the magnificent railway terminus and hotel of the ancient "city of the tribes," the proverbially Spanish aspect of which will be readily recognised from the two little sketches subjoined, with which we close our pencilings for the present.

SELF-DENIAL;

OR,

PASSAGES OF A LIFE.

BY A WAYFARER.

IV.

SELDOM did any one begin life with a smaller share of worldly goods, and at the same time richer blessings of hope, health, and a bright future than I did. I certainly did feel a kind of oppression come over me, as I reflected that I had taken this important step without consulting my mother and father; but that was a feeling that weighed on me only when I was alone, and my dear little wife did not leave me often.

I had a good deal of work to do at home. The — — Magazine used my articles occasionally, and the paper was regular in its payments and in its payments. When tea was cleared away, she would draw up her work-table near to me, or take a book. Sometimes I would read to her. I had much to do, to prepare myself for the career of a literary man. I had to study and read, my stock of knowledge being rather scanty on the whole. I saw at once that there was much to be learnt, and I set to work in earnest to make up for my deficiencies.

Charles came the second Sunday after our marriage. Mr. Ellis, as I at present must call him, was with him. Charles looked very pale and thin. The quiet sacrifice he had made had proved upon him. He shook me warmly by the hand, and tried to look smiling, but it was too much of an effort. Presently, however, he was better, and when Edith chatted with him, and gave him his tea, and called him dear Charles, he was soon himself again, full of spirits, life, and talk. He made us laugh before he had done, and quizzed my wife because she was so shy of showing her affection for me before company.

Our way of life was humble, because we were poor, and knew it. Luckily I fell into no bad habits in those days. My home was everything to me, and no sooner was my work done than I flew home to delight myself in the sunshine of Edith's smile. Things went on tolerably well for about a year. I lived abstemiously, but well enough for my taste. I even saved a little, because I knew it would be wanted.

At the end of our first year of love and happiness I became the father of a boy, and we called him Charles. When I showed the infant to his namesake for the first time, I saw his lip quiver.

"God bless you, child!" he said in a murmuring tone; "as long as I live, you shall never want a father."

His health was much injured by his severe study; and when he knew that all was right, and that Edith and her child were well, he bade us adieu, and went down to spend a month or so, during the long vacation, with his mother and sisters. We saw him depart with regret; but as we believed the journey necessary to his health, we were bound to be glad.

I had concealed from Charles, and I believe I was wrong to do so, that the expenses of this period had for the first time placed me in debt. Ozily had restored my mother's watch to me, and already it had gone again to meet the demand made upon me. When Edith went out for her first walk with me, I had scarcely a penny left. I went down to the office that evening, and obtained a small advance.

With this in my pocket I began work anew. I had a few good books, and I read hard. I had projected a work on a popular subject, which required, however, reference to many books, and I applied for admission to the British Museum. By the favour of the publisher of my magazine, I obtained it at once, and I made a point of going there three days a-week, collecting materials for my volume, which I firmly relied on selling.

Oh, those were happy days indeed. My dear little wife was so proud and joyous, and light-hearted, especially when she could show her infant to her mother, who, like all grandmothers, we suppose from Doro: Bye did win, was in raptures with the child, and vowed — except that its mouth and eyes and nose were different, and that it was a boy — that it was the very image of Edith.

About this time I had an offer made me, which, promising an addition of ten or fifteen shillings a-week to my income, I gladly accepted. As few of my readers are among the initiated, I must explain my new duties rather clearly. All the leading Sunday papers copy the police reports from the morning journals, except on Saturday, when, in the competition for news, they pay for the reports to be made for them, thus forestalling the Monday morning publications. Now it appeared that the — — had had a difference with the man who supplied the copy usually. There was only one reporter at this office, who had a monopoly of all the papers. The — —, however, declined his copy, and I was requested to attend on Saturday and supply the deficiencies.

I went. I found myself in quite a new and changed atmosphere. It was a tainted and insober one. I associated at once with men of a different character from what I had been used to. To write my report I went to a public-house. I found myself among detectives, witnesses, officers of the court, from whom at this early stage of my career I was obliged to ask information. I wrote my report, and then drank without eating. I took down the copy to the office, but I spent more money than it could bring me in. Yes! I went home that night in a state which alarmed my wife. I must own it. But I was gentle as a lamb. I have heard of men beating and ill-using their wives under such circumstances; but I am thankful to say I was never guilty of such disgraceful brutality.

I was very ill the next day. How my dear darling Edith did nurse me. I never saw her look so much like an angel. She would scarcely let me give her an explanation of how or what it had been, or of Edith, but scolded my dear mother with a blow, and before me not do it again.

"The dear fellow is punished enough. I don't like any to be a mother; I will not allow him to be a father."

And I was not scolded, but got up on Monday morning with a firm resolve not to let this happen again. I am ever ready to confess, but why write my life, if I do not tell the truth of what did happen again.

I was angry with myself that I could not look at Edith, I could not bear to hear the child cry; but the fever was on me, and I was way to it. I was thirsty and feverish, and drank again. When I wrote, was necessarily very inferior to my former productions. I utterly neglected my book.

One week I had obtained an advance from the printer of my new rent. It was given to me rather oddly, with an intimation that it must be worked out before I had any more money. The following Saturday came round. A thin, obscured of sufficient respect to warrant a police report. I sat at one or two trifling things. They were not inserted.

I went to a tavern that evening, where I was in the habit of meeting my new class of acquaintances. There was one there with whom I was more familiar than the others. I asked him to lend me five shillings. He did so, with the understanding that I was to repay him on the following Saturday. With this I went home to my dear little wife, who took the money with a painful and blank look, which did not strike me so much then as it did afterwards. She knew by my manner that it was the last for some days. I even told her that I had borrowed it.

"Of whom?" she said, bending over the table, ready to give her tears.

"Of a friend," I replied quickly.

"Of a friend, Edward?" she continued, shaking her head, "one of your new acquaintances you mean?"

"Well, yes." Herbert of the ——" I said, slowly and reluctantly. "And it's precious hokey I did, for I don't know where I should have got a farthing, but for him."

"You used to get money enough before you knew anything of the police-reporting for a Sunday paper," said Edith, with a very strong stress laid on the word "Sunday."

The next Saturday I paid the borrow'd money and some of my debts, and I went home with very little again. I was, strange to say, at that time quite sober. I paid the little money I had to my wife's hand, and I looked in her face. She held down her eyes, which were red with crying.

"You are not well, dear ste," I said, in a very young and gentle tone.

"I am afraid I have not lived quite well enough," she replied, kindly but kindly; "but oh, Edward, I would not care, but for the baby."

I snatched the money from her hand almost fiercely, and rushed into the open air.

THE GOLDEN FLEECE.

Is there not a proverb that says a good story cannot be told too often? I thought so. Well, encouraged by that proverb we are about to tell a very old story here.

Once upon a time there lived in beautiful Thessaly a king and queen named Athamas and Nephele. They were blessed with two children, a boy and a girl. After awhile Athamas grew weary went the ram—his golden fleece glittering in the bright rays of the sun—and took his course toward the east; the boy, however, was alone preserved, for, as they crossed the strait which divides Europe from Asia, poor Helle fell into the sea—an accident which needs no other confirmation than the fact of that strait ever afterwards being called the Hellespont. As for the youth Phryxus, he reached the

of his spouse, put her away, and took another. Kings and emperors since that period have occasionally copied his example—

“Sigh no more, lady, sigh no more,
Men were deceivers ever;
One foot in sea and one on land,
To one thing constant never.”

On account of their stepmother, poor hapless Nephele trembled for her children, and sought diligently for some means of effecting their escape. Mercury—like a true knight of chivalry, or rather like a truly classical divinity as he was—came to her help, gave her a ram with a golden fleece, on which she placed her darling children, trusting, with all the fond trustfulness of a woman’s heart, that the ram would convey them to a place of safety. Of king Ion of Colchis on the eastern shore of the Euxine, was hospitably received by Eetes, the king of the country, sacrificed the ram to Jupiter, and gave the skin to his new friend. So the golden fleece was placed in a consecrated grove, and a dragon, which was never known even to wink, kept watch and ward over the precious treasure. “Lies,” says the Spanish proverb, “have short legs” but truths have unnumbered long ones. The story of the golden fleece spread far and wide. People regarded it, some with doubt, some with strong belief, some as a dream of the poets, and some as the subtle engine of the mystic—it was to them as the lost Atlantis, which puzzled the minds of philosophers in after years. Who could any young man of spirit and daring do better to attest his zeal and courage than go in search of this golden fleece? Who can wonder that the chivalric Jason, Hercules, Theseus, Orpheus, and Nestor, the heroes and demigods of Greece, should flock together, and in adventurous brotherhood take water in the Argo, and with oars propel the vessel—for masts and sails were yet as things unknown—to Colchis? Who can feel surprise that the hero Jason should overcome every difficulty that was thrown in his way? should calm the brazen-footed bulls, whose snort was like the heat of a furnace, should make them gentle as so many "sneaking doves," and put the charmed yoke over their necks? Who can wonder that when the dragon's teeth were sown, and a goodly crop of armed men sprang up and rushed on Jason, he should dexterously fling a stone into their midst and set them fighting one another till there was not one left? Who but can readily suppose that with the certainty of chloroform he should send the ever-watchful dragon fast asleep, and seize upon the golden fleece, which had cost him so much trouble? Who can wonder at all this, when they recollect that the beautiful Medea, as potent in sorcery as she was beautiful in appearance, had aided him to gain the triumph? Nobody can wonder at it—not one—nor that Medea fled away with Jason to Thessaly the beautiful.

As to what the story means—it may be, that if stripped of all its glory, and seen in open daylight, this Argonautic expedition was nothing more than a piratical invasion, the rich spoils of which gave rise to the idea of the GOLDEN FLEECE; but, however this may be, certain it is, that a skilful artist has embodied the beautiful old story in as beautiful a bas-relief, of which we here present a spirited engraving.

SUPERSTITIONS CONNECTED WITH GEMS.

It is curious to reflect, when gazing at the brilliant wares in a modern jeweller's shop window, that a time existed when such a display of varied coloured gems, of gold and silver ornaments, instead of conjuring up thoughts of fashion and festivity, of bridal morns, ball-nights and birth-day presents, would probably have aroused a host of perturbed associations, in which sorcery and sickness, poison and the evil-eye, would by turns predominate, and the liveliest fancy have been the choice of periapt or counter-charm.

Then—for every gem had its genii, every precious stone some occult power—instead of studying fashion or his taste, the purchaser would have had respect to secret tendencies—his hopes, his fears, the terror that came by night, the pestilence that walked abroad at noon-day, and would have bought his jewellery less as an ornament than as a spell.

Chronology throws no light on the birth of this belief in the magical properties of gems; research only deepens the idea of its antiquity, and shows it to have obtained from the earliest periods of human history of which we have any record.

That dusky father of the church, Tertullian, unable to trace the origin of their use, or the discoverer of their presumed medical and mysterious qualities (of at least bestowing the mercurial charm of ornament on the fair wearers of them), boldly advances, not as an hypothesis, but as a fact, that in those days, when there were giants on the earth, and angels visited the daughters of men, those fallen spirits, in order to enhance and preserve the beauty that had captivated them, sought out all secret spells, and brought from mines and caves these glittering talismans for good or evil.

Pliny, referring to the legend of the Roman poets, makes men ignorant of even the existence of precious stones (did the writhing hand of Prometheus, bound by an iron band to Caucasus, broke forth a crystal fragment of the rock, which gave the type of the ring, and the gem which afterwards solemn it).

Yet, long before the Roman poets sang the fable of Prometheus, in the days of the swartly Phœnicians, we find evidence of idolatrous and forbidden superstitions in connection with jewels. Why else, when Jacob purified his household from all the strange gods that were in their houses, did he also bury with them under the oak at Shechem the earrings that were in their ears?

It is true that the Israelites had not yet entered Egypt, where the eye of Osiris, the sacred Scarab, and other symbols or images of their gods, partly from religious, partly from superstitious motives, were in common use; but they had wandered through the borderlands, and the incident only proves how wide-spread was the belief in these mystic agencies.

A little later there occurs a striking instance in the Hebrew annals of the oracular power attributed to precious stones, in the supernatural evidence of the Petræ and Thaumata, glowing in the gems of the Jewish high-priest's pectoral, divination by means of which is frequently alluded to, and to which appeal was made under various solemn circumstances by kings and great men. Here we probably see the prototype of a belief existing era after era in human history, surviving in this country to comparatively modern times, in the magic crystal of Doctor Dee, and only fading out with the extending light of the liberal sciences, wherewith the soul of man is beautified.

Hereafter we shall come to the presumed virtues of some of the gems employed in adorning the miraculous breast-plate of the Jewish high-priest, and as these reputed properties were believed to be imbibed by the wearer, and to endow him with their secret influences, we may imagine how its resplendent glory, full of solemn associations, of occult power, and a divine mystery, graven with the names of their tribes, and flashing up to heaven, as it is expressly said, in memorial of them, must have added personal awe to priestly veneration, and have affected the deeply superstitious minds of the Jewish people.

We read that the Egyptians, Persians, Arabs, and Hindoos regarded precious stones "if not as spiritual creations, at least as abodes with which spiritual influences were associated, and gave to each its tutelary spirit or guardian genii. Hence the Arabs wore gems set in Afric gold bound on their arms to defend them from demons, and hence in more recent times the Asiatics had the blades of their scimitars engraved with a text from the Koran, with the figures wrought in gold or silver or in marquetry with small gems.

The Greeks and Romans, in like manner, found a presiding deity for every gem, and thus Proserpine claimed black agate, red Mars the blood-stone, Apollo the sapphire, and Bacchus the purple amethyst.

Gems were regarded as so precious by the Hindoos, that the very gods were accused of stealing them; and Christina in his childhood was said to have purloined one from Præsona. What wonder, therefore, that the exhibition of gems should have entered largely into the pharmacopœia of these mystic periods of human science, or that men should have hoped by contact with them to elicit their supposed healing virtues, or by their simple presence to escape contagion. In a learned treatise on Hindoo medicine, we find gold, silver, diamonds, and pearls plying a very important part in their prescriptions, but it is evident that these costly medicaments were only necessary to the constitutions of rich men, for the sage, after giving a prescription of gems for the diseases of a King, adds another of simples for those of people in general.

It has been suggested, that the primitive use of gems in medicine was probably as much with the view of propitiating the spiritual power associated with them as from any intrinsic healing properties, of their own. The Indians, however, laid great stress upon these properties in disposing of their pearls from the Persian gulf, and diamonds from Golconda; but as nearly all the precious stones were brought from India, commercial policy might have mingled slightly with professional zeal, and have tintured their representations to other eastern nations, who purchased gems, and used them medicinally, as remotely as the times of the Persian Magi.

The diamond, ruby, sapphire, coloured agates, onyx, crystals, jaspers, and emeralds, as well as the rare opalescent sapphire, with pearly-like reflections that Pliny speaks of, and which partook in itself of all the virtues of the rest, were brought from India. Upper Egypt had, it is said, its mountains of emeralds, the islands of Crete and Candia their sacred agates, and in Lombardy the poplar wept amber, which, though not of them, has ever kept in the company of gems, and has been used for the same purposes of health and ornament.

Gold, also, though not coming under the head of our subject, is yet so blended with it, that without much irregularity we may be allowed to observe, that it anciently claimed almost as large an amount of superstitious veneration as the gems for which it has always served as the setting. The belief of the ancient fire-worshippers, that gold was the first production of the sacred element, no doubt sanctified this metal in every land where the knee was low. In the East; hence, it was not only used for golden images, but served to enclose graven ones, and was itself supposed to be endowed with healing qualities, and with a protective power. This alone will account for its appearance in rings, chains, bracelet and earrings at a period when such things were regarded, not as ornaments, but as amulets, and symbols of rank and power; it was with this intuition that it figured in the heart-shaped bulls of the Romans, and was suspended, as late as the chibblish days of Dr. Johnson, in the English vein called an "angel," round the necks of those patients who received the royal touch, the efficacy of which would have been very doubtful if unaccompanied by this sign of pure gold.

It is no one thing, perhaps, is the growth of human nature so distinctly marked as in the enlargement of the reasoning faculties. In those twilight days of the world's history to which our subject refers, when men sat down like children in the dusk, and spite of the great side-lights skinting on them, frightened themselves with shadows—the powers of the imagination appear to have been in a state of the most intense activity, while the reasoning principles were only partially developed, and the few great heads in possession of them ruled the rest, not in the modern sense of intellectual superiority, but with an iron sceptre, as sars and slaves. All things, therefore, that tended to envelop the multitude in the thick darkness of ignorance, to mystify and terrify them, were so many veils between reality and the fables, which bowed them in the veriest slough of superstition, and rendered their numerical and physical strength timid and helpless in the hands of their intellectual tyrants, save as they led the way, in mystic pillars of fire, or clouds of smoke, with gorgeous ceremonies or solemn rites of magic. From the beginning there has been no such engine of power in this world as superstition, and no superstition so fatal to the intellectual and moral growth of mankind as that which hid its malignity, like the spear of Balaam, with the leaves and flowers of religion. Only the priests of Egypt were allowed to heal the sick; the knowledge of medicine, like all other knowledge, was in their hands; and in order to heighten the effect of their power over mind and body, magic made a part of their religion as well as of the mystery of leokeraft. Even the wandering Arabs, who, it is said, had some skill in the application of plants and minerals to medicine, affected a knowledge of magic in their practice of it; and the same superstitions inoculated the Greeks, and subsequently the Romans.

When we remember the relation in which Greece stood to Egypt, it could scarcely have happened otherwise. Eighteen hundred and fifty-six years before we find Inachus the Phœnician founding Argos. Three hundred years nearer the Christian era, Cæsar had peopled Attica with Egyptians; and in 1493 B.C., Cadmus built Thebes upon the model of the Thebes of Egypt, and introduced, with the alphabet, her gods and superstitions. What wonder, then, that we find the amulets and talismans of the East—the idols, the scarabæus, and sacred hieroglyphics, engraved on rings, or worn suspended from the neck, or fashioned into necklaces—in constant use amongst the early Greeks? The stones of which these amulets were formed, and on which these images were graven, were always chosen with reference to their own reputed virtues; and the fact that the majority of the fine engravings of antiquity are executed in cornelian, speaks to the lover of such line of more than the aptitude of the stone for the art of the graver, and exhibits, in the frequency of its use, a pleasing trait of those antique people in their domestic relations, though shrouded with the mask of superstition; for it was supposed to appease anger, and make peace and love reign in households that were unhappily the scene of strife and hatred.

The virtues of the sard, worn as an amulet, were numerous, that Montfaucon tells us we should scarcely believe, had it not been put forth in what Pliny says: "In summo est a sardonyx, corneum in an emerald is a certain mineral, and first all poison of no kind, and finally it is in such a way, but it is said to be a stone in a ring, when any one wishes to be the possessor of a friend, or a favour from a tyrant. But Pliny is not alluding to the sard, but of the sardonyx—one of those stones which were growing amongst the rocks in that island of Upper Egypt that Plutarch tells us was for ever guarded by serpents, which in Egyptian mythology represent the god Cneph, or good genius; though Christians regard them as the type of Aspidochelone, and he tells us that one of these precious stones, engraved with an eagle, or the like animal herms, has not only the qualities Montfaucon has quoted, but that it also averts hail and bad weather, properties which Ambrosius also confirms of it.

The emerald made a part of the rich merchandise which the Syrians imported to the sea-bound Tyre, and glittered no doubt upon the finger, or in the bracelet, or lay secreted upon the breasts of many a merchant prince and sea-captain, as well as amongst the talismans of the landowner—a spell to calm the tempest, and ward off the insect spoilers from the summer fruit and harvest.

General Lesh, in his "Annals of Artillery—Imprinted at London, in Flere Street, within Temple-Barre, at the Sign of the Kloude and Stare, by Richard Tuttle, A.D. 1568," remarks of the emerald (or scriptural smaragd) that "Ecclesiastes, in commendation thereof, maketh the comparison, that as the myrrour musse comforteth the spirits, so the smaragd comforteth the sight, by which the heart receiveth joy"—a scriptural allusion to the constant belief that this gem cleared the vision and helped against talismans. It was doubtless with this impression (disisted on when Pliny wrote) that we find the Emperor Nero, at the spectacles and theatres of old Rome, using a large emerald as the frequenter of the opera house and theatres of our times do their lozenges; but the modern use of green glasses, to refresh the optic nerve and assist the sight, proves how much of fact lay hidden in the fable of its virtues. But its effect on the serpent tribe was exactly the reverse; for it was believed in the East, that if a snake or serpent fixed his eyes on the green lustre of this transparent stone, it immediately became blind; when we add to the former as good as proven quality, that it comforted the vital spirits—so wrote the natural historians of the times—increased riches, and made the wearer prevail in play, we think an excellent case has been made out for a count for the popularity of the sea-green gem, which shone in the second row upon the breastplate of the Jewish high-priest, and remains to this day one of the most precious in the regalia of kings.

Yet in comparison with the potent diamond, which Pliny prettily thinks should grow nowhere but in a mine of gold, though he owns it is a miracle to find it there, the spells of the emerald become weak and insignificant. Not even the wild legends of oriental superstition could have ascribed to this gem-guarded gem more various and mysterious influences than did the western nations of Europe through the long night of intellectual darkness that followed the destruction of the Roman empire, and continued till the dawn of the Reformation.

Precious above all other natural bodies, its value was further enhanced by the spiritual influences imputed to it, and which promised the fortunate possessor immunity from almost every ill that flesh is heir to. It insured the wearer long life, rendered him invincible, and drove away those vain imaginations that set men beside themselves, dispelled vain fears, resisted witchcraft, and tested conjugal fidelity; borne on the left shoulder, says Boccaccio, "it hath virtue against chidings and strife of enemies;" and, better still, made peace in the domestic circle. At its touch, the magnet lost its power of attraction, and diseases, though they had baffled every other mode of treatment, vanished. It was an antidote to poison; though, on the other hand, Paracelsus tells us that the powder of the diamond was so fatal that no remedy could arrest its venom! No wonder that the Persian kings wore gems upon their foreheads, when the very possession of them not only conveyed the knowledge of wealth and power, but was supposed to enclose the wearer within impregnable. The Star and Morning, and Hunt, and Rabbit, of these days must have driven a pretty capital business; perhaps, besides the magic, and a knowledge of the gem, they had some skill in the art of their trade-traffic. The matter, the mounting, the figure—not only so-called to be a certain gem, but also engraved upon particular parts of the gem, which were not the star, which they were to be placed in a ring, and the whole finished with a special skill—these things must have given a mysterious attraction of the nature and tear-binding as the laboratory of an alchemist of the middle ages.

THE TOWERS OF DUNKIRK AND SARAGOSSA.

THE towers represented in the accompanying engravings are assuredly not of the same origin, for they were erected at different epochs, and their architecture is very dissimilar. They are connected, however, by a popular ceremony, which is celebrated in both places—the procession of the giants, which is represented in both illustrations. The sole difference consists in the costume of the effigies which figure as the heroes of the fiés. At Dunkirk the giants are always three in number, supposed to represent father and sons, and wear helmets and coats of mail; at Saragossa a claimed for the Dunkirk fiés, on the ground that a similar ceremony is observed at Douay, which is shown by documentary evidence still in existence to have been instituted in 1580, “in honour of God and all the celestial court, and of Monsieur St. Morand (the patron saint of Douay), to whom thanks are to be given for the taking and keeping of this town by the French, on the 16th of June.” In 1670, however, the day of celebration was changed to the 6th of July, in commemoration of the capture of the town by the troops of Louis XIV. Some historians assert that all the

the number is also three, but they wear the turban and flowing robes of the Moslem. These gigantic effigies are formed, in both cases, of wickerwork, and are always carried, at Saragossa as well as at Dunkirk, past the great clock tower.

This singular procession seems to be of Spanish origin, and its introduction into Dunkirk probably took place while Flanders was subjected to Spanish domination. At Saragossa it was instituted after the expulsion of the Moors, of which event it appears to be a festive commemoration. A French origin has, however, been claimed for the Dunkirk fiés, who sought by this means to neutralise the dissatisfaction of the people by amusing them.

The clock tower at Dunkirk was erected previously to 1440, in which year it is recorded that the town possessed only one church, and that the inhabitants, being desirous of obtaining additional accommodation for worship, erected another, using the existing tower for the porch and for containing the clock. This church was destroyed by fire in 1538, but the tower was uninjured. A new church was built subsequently, but at a little distance from the tower. This church, dedicated to St. Eloi, still exists. On the redemption of Dunkirk by Louis XIV., it was stipulated that all the towers and belfries should be pulled down to the level of the housetops, but the inhabitants of Dunkirk evaded the treaty as regarded the clock tower, by building a little house on it, which served as a temporary landmark to the mariners frequenting the

The clock tower of Saragossa is of later origin than that at Dunkirk, having been commenced in 1504, and finished in 1515. It inclines towards the street in a very remarkable manner, reminding the traveller of the singular leaning towers of Pisa and Bologna. The basement is constructed entirely of cut stone, and is perfectly perpendicular; it is the superstructure, which is built with bricks, that overhangs the street, and looks as if it were about to fall into it. The bricks on that side appear as if crushed by the superincumbent mass, and in some places have lost half their thickness. The inhabitants entertain no fear of its fall, for it began to lean towards the street, as it is seen at present, very soon after it was completed, and has not yielded any further since. Indeed, during the siege of the city by the French, in 1808, a shell burst exactly over it, without at all impairing its solidity.

SELF-DENIAL;

WHEN once I was in the street, I sat down upon a distant step and wept. Then I rose and walked along towards town. As I went, I bought a basket. I laid out every farthing I had, in articles of food. I bought meat, bread, tea, sugar, and other necessaries. I purchased a small joint for the next day, and some steak for supper. With all this I sallied home, as proud as if I had really done something very wonderful.

I reached the door, and, as I did so, looked up at my window. I saw a man's shadow on the blind. I almost fell with shame and sorrow. I could have fled and concealed myself for ever from their sight. I knew it must be the noble Charles Ogilvy. All the past flashed before me like a panorama. Would he have lowered her and made her suffer in this way? I was quite sure he would not. I felt it was not in his nature.

Never before or since have I felt such humiliation.

But I had repented of my sin, and I was ready to bear the punishment without flinching.

I knocked at the door. Mrs. Brown opened it to me.

"Goodness gracious," said she, "what a load!"

"Hush!" I replied, "I don't want her to know. Have you got a fire?"

"A beautiful fire," she replied, in a half timid tone, as if she feared my acts were the freaks of intoxication.

Now, my good Mrs. Brown, I have been neglecting that dear little wife of mine, and making a fool of myself; but never mind, that's all over now. Just come along with me into the kitchen. The girl had left about a month, because we could not pay her.

"Well to be sure" said Mrs. Brown, as I displayed my riches, "this is a treat. The fact is, Mr. Mildmay, she has neglected herself lately. When you are not at home she never thinks about cooking."

I almost choked. I knew it was, because there was nothing to cook. But on this point I said nothing, satisfied that my wife having kept her secret herself, would be pained indeed if I revealed it.

"Now, Mrs. Brown," said I, for I was rather diffident about appearing upstairs suddenly, myself. "Will you lay the cloth for supper upstairs. There is Mr. Ogilvy with my wife, and there is nothing he likes better than taking a little supper with us."

The old woman was about to move, when I heard Charles Ogilvy come out on the landing.

"I won't stop to-night," he said, with affected carelessness; "as he is out, I will come to-morrow morning. I am anxious to see him after three months of absence."

"I am sure he won't be long," replied my wife, who in reality was overwhelmed with sorrow; "he never stops out—very late."

"But it is late," said Charles, good humouredly, "and I must be off. Good night, Mrs. Mildmay. Good night, baby."

"Good night, Charles," replied Edith, slowly.

"Good night! no such thing," said I popping out of the kitchen. "Don't you smell the steaks? Here am I broiling away like a masher, to get you a nice hot supper, as our Mary is gone, and you are running away. How do you do, old boy?"

"Why I thought you were out, Edward," said my wife, almost overwhelmed with surprise.

"So I have been out—to market to be sure," I replied cheerfully, "I am coming. Only let me wash my hands, and I will join you."

They went into the room where Mrs. Brown was busy laying the cloth, and in a few minutes I followed. I shook Charles heartily by the hand.

"My dear fellow," said I, when we were alone, "you have come here on a very suspicious evening—suspicious, I mean, in comparison with all those of the last three months."

Charles looked bewildered. Edith made signs to me to hold my tongue. But I would not be checked. I was determined to speak the truth, to unburden my conscience to a friend, and thus have support even against myself. I told the whole story, of which Charles had no conception. I watched him narrowly as he listened to me. His lips were compressed once or twice convulsively, and his hands were clenched. He turned pale and red in turns. At last I ceased.

"Edward," he said, warmly, "to say I am not grieved at what has passed would be to assert that which is not true; and I have never said I my lips with a falsehood. I heard at the office that there was something wrong, that you kept rather late hours, and I had a hint about Herbert having your place."

I groined in reply, but said nothing articulate.

"Never mind," continued Charles, cheerfully, "you only stick to work, and all will be right. They say themselves they will try you another month, so that is all right. Nothing is wanting to place you where you were, but to keep your own excellent resolutions."

From that night I went no more to my old haunts. But I had a rude battle now to carry on against my difficulties. I had very little coming in, while for a week or two I was unable to commence my new work. I persevered, however, and the bright smiles of my wife were my best reward. We contrived as well as we could for some time. I worked very hard; my paper gave me a good deal of work, and I pushed on with my book with increased energy. It was impossible quite to conceal our position from Charles, and, not regarding it, we were compelled to receive assistance from him. We always, however, made light of our difficulties, and, above all, took care to be cheerful and happy. And we were happy. Edith had such a joy in her child that no other cares or sorrow could touch her while the babe was well.

At last my book was finished and I left it with a publisher. That was a proud day too; for it is something to have written a book, especially when one feels that it has been written with care and under the influence of high aspirations. I was now in a very great state of anxiety. I leave it to the imagination of my reader to tell all the dreams that now came to me by day and by night. I could scarcely sleep. I considered that on this work depended my whole future.

At the end of a fortnight I called on Messieurs———. I sent in my name. I was requested to walk into a very neat, very elegant apartment, where a gentleman asked me to take a chair. He then quietly informed me that he could give me no answer just yet, he was very sorry—

"I hope you will excuse my anxiety," I said rising, and speaking with some little trepidation, for the man before me was one on whose will depended the fate of my whole future existence. He was a scholar and a gentleman; but he was that awful thing to an author's mind, a publisher.

"Quite natural, my dear sir," said the other blandly; "but we have so many manuscripts on hand just now, that the gentlemen who read for us are quite unable to keep pace with them."

I returned home, like a very weak personage as I was, with a very serious face. I was too young in my profession not to feel overwhelmed with disappointment at the very natural interview I had had with the world-renowned Mr.——. Edith saw it at once.

"No success, Edward," she said, with a little sigh, for I had promised her so many things—not luxuries, but necessities. "Well, never mind; you must try some one else."

"But I have no answer of any kind," I said, with a mortified look.

"No news is good news," said the little woman, with a jocund laugh, tossing the baby into my arms; "there nurse that, papa, while I get the dinner."

I took the little one, and as I sat with it in my arms, very unreasonably wished authorship at the bottom of the sea, mused about the philosophy of sweeping a crossing, wondered whether I could get a clerk's place, and, in fact, thought the usual amount of nonsense which a disappointed man will think. In reality I ought to have been very thankful that, with my youth and inexperience, I was able to support a wife at all.

That evening I walked down to the Strand and called on Charles. I told him my day's adventure with a very solemn face. He laughed at me.

"You unreasonable dog, you!" he said; "why, if I get a brief in five years after I am called I shall be satisfied."

"But you have an income," I replied.

"Not an income to enable me to fight my way at the bar," said he, with his gentle smile. "I know it well, and I am working hard at short-hand. The gallery is the place for a young unfledged barrister."

"Indeed!" I cried; "have you made up your mind to it?"

"Yes, and got my engagement, my dear fellow. I don't recommend it to you, because you are a married man, and I don't think you would find it pleasant. Better, your branch is better. Put on your hat again, for I am going up to sup with Mrs. M. I will buy a lobster as we go along, to celebrate my engagement on the 'Morning ———'"

MONKEYS AND LEMURS.

SCARCELY anything, perhaps, is more attractive to the great mass of mankind, especially in their juvenile days, than the curious imitation of human actions displayed by the different species of monkeys. The near resemblance of their form to that of our own species, at one time, indeed, have led them with an importance in the eyes of philosophers which they no longer possess; for, during all periods of antiquity, the dissection of the human body was strictly forbidden, as something almost sacrilegious, and the ancient philosopher was compelled to get his best notions of human anatomy by the dissection of monkeys. To the modern naturalist they are still interesting, although in a less degree, from the same cause, their resemblance to man; which, it must be confessed, in the higher species is so close as to be by no means flattering to our pride, although we cannot think it is sufficient to justify the views of some, even of the most distinguished of modern zoologists, who place the human race in the same order with the apes.

One of the principal external distinctions consists in the conversion of the hind-feet into grasping organs or hands; and this, when we compare them with the feet of civilised men, whose toes have been confined all their lives in a barbarous leathern case, is certainly very striking; but the toes of savages, which have never been subjected to this beautifying pressure, retain a great deal more individual motion; and we remember having seen two native Australians, who were in London a year or two since, frequently make use of their feet to pick up objects even of small size from the ground, transferring them afterwards to their hands in a very monkey-like fashion.

This order of four-handed animals, however, includes a great variety of creatures; and if the higher species exhibit a considerable resemblance to man, the lower forms are certainly very far removed from him. To illustrate this diversity of structure we have given representations of two species, — one a member of the highest, the other of the lowest group of the order.

The former, of which only the head and hand are represented in our illustration, is the common Barbary ape (Pithecus harrisi), which is particularly remarkable as being the only species of this order found in Europe. This animal, which is the one most commonly met with in confinement, exhibits a considerable amount of intelligence; and it is to this that most of the anecdotes of monkeys are to be referred. When taken young, and properly brought up, this monkey is generally very good-tempered, especially when he is allowed a certain amount of freedom; but strict confinement soon renders him savage, and his powerful teeth then give him a dangerous means of revenging himself for any fancied injury. The Barbary ape usually measures from two to three feet in length; his colour is a grayish-brown; his hands are well-formed, and furnished with thumbs on both pairs of extremities; but the tail, which in many monkeys is such a striking feature, is reduced to a most absurd fleshy rudiment. The only spot in which it is known to occur in Europe is the rock of Gibraltar, although it is supposed by some authors to exist also in the mountains of Andalusia and Granada.

As compared with the chimpanzee, the orang, and the other large, man-like apes, this monkey exhibits some little deficiency in intelligence; but he is still greatly superior in this respect to many of the other monkeys of the Old World. Amongst these, the baboons, distinguished by their elongated snouts, which give the head somewhat the appearance of that of a large, fierce dog, are particularly unintelligent; in their character and habits they exhibit an exaggerated picture of all the worst passions of human nature, unredeemed by any of the lighter graces which render the

When he who had been so bitterly disappointed could be so cheerful, how could I rejoice.

I determined not to do so, and the next morning went to work again with renewed energy, after writing a letter to Messrs. ———, to say that when they had decided, perhaps, they would drop me a line.

monkeys in general such amusing pets. Their appearance is in accordance with this unamiable disposition; their bodies are heavy and strong, their heads large, their face generally clothed with bare skin, sometimes decorated with brilliant colours, and disfigured by bony lumps or ridges, and their buttocks usually covered with callosities of a most disgusting appearance. Some of these animals are nearly of the size of a man, and their jaws are armed with canine teeth quite as large in proportion as those of the most voracious animals, rendering them very formidable antagonists for an unarmed man.

The American monkeys are at once distinguished from those of the Old World, by the position of the nostrils, which in the latter are placed close together at the extremity of the snout, whilst in the former they are separated by a broad space. The thumbs are often wanting, especially on the fore-hands, and even when present, they are not properly distinguishable from the other fingers. In the form of the head and the size of the brain, these animals generally show a greater departure from the human type than their brethren of the Old World. Many of them, however, are very lively and intelligent pets; the little marmosets in particular were formerly great favourites with the fashionable ladies of Europe. In their habits many of them are nocturnal, and they all appear to have a great liking for animal food, often surprising small birds upon their nests, sucking their eggs, and even devouring the mother when they succeed in capturing her. Mr. Wallace, the Amazonian traveller, tells us that a marmoset in his possession "was particularly savage. He once seized a large parrot by the neck, pulled him into his cage, and bit out a large piece from his bill, and would probably have destroyed it, had he not opportunely come to the rescue. Two other small birds which approached too near his cage he seized and completely devoured."

The most singular of the American monkeys, however, are the howling monkeys. These animals have the lower jaw of enormous size, and the bone of the tongue dilated into a large bony case, within which their voice reverberates until it acquires a degree of loudness which appears quite disproportionate to the size of the animal producing it. The noise thus produced is said to be most awful, breaking, as it does, upon the stillness of the night. Waterton, in his interesting account of his "Wanderings" in Guiana, says of the howling monkey: "While lying in your hammock in these gloomy and immeasurable wilds, you hear him howling at intervals, from eleven o'clock at night till daybreak. You would suppose that half the wild beasts of the forest were collecting for the work of carnage — now it is the tremendous roar of the jaguar, as he springs on his prey; now it changes to his dejected growlings, as he is pressed on all sides by superior force; and now you hear his last dying moan beneath a mortal wound." Writers on the natural history of South America are not altogether agreed as to whether the noise is produced by an individual at a time, or by the combined efforts of a grand chorus; but all seem to be unanimous in representing it as one of the most terrible sounds that can well be conceived. Many of the American monkeys are furnished, as it were, with a fish limb, in the form of a prehensile tail, by means of which they can swing their bodies from a branch in perfect security, and so tenuously does this singular organ retain its hold, that it is a thousand times more so pulled from a branch of a tree, than it is dislodged from its hold when the hunter is gone.

From the numerous monkeys of the Western Continent, the true subject of the present article of the Old World is but a step. The general characteristics of these animals, generally of a somewhat cat-like form, with long pointed snouts, and usually with long tails. In their manners they are mild and tractable, and one species, the ring-tailed lemur (Lemur catta), is a very handsome animal. The greater number of the known animals of the Lemur tribe are found in the great island of Madagascar, where they seem to take the

SCENES FROM AMERICAN HISTORY.

THE scenes which we have chosen for illustration present America under two very different aspects: in one, asserting liberty—in the other, maintaining loyalty; in the first, denouncing the executive of kingly power—in the second, fighting nobly in defence of monarchy; in the former, speaking with a stern, strong voice, the same hard truths it uttered at Bunker's Hill—and, in the latter, proclaiming the sentiments which were almost universally held till other, maintaining loyalty; in the first, denouncing the executive of kingly power—in the second, fighting nobly in defence of monarchy; in the former, speaking with a stern, strong voice, the same

American blood, shed by English soldiery, crimsoned the snow in the streets of Boston.

They are both of them grand subjects, picturing incidents worthy of the country and the people. We propose, as briefly as may be, to tell the story that they illustrate.

Who is this, that stands so proudly in the presence of the Governor of Virginia, and compels—veritably compels—him to sign a commission, as truly as Cromwell swept away the Long Parliament, or Napoleon scattered the Council of Elders? This Nathaniel Bacon, a young man scarcely thirty, who has studied law in London, but who, leaving the old country, has come to the colonies, and is “popularly inclined.” He possesses all the qualities which people want in a leader—“a complete man,” singularly endowed with a persuasive eloquence and quickness of apprehension.

Virginia—the beautiful land of Sir Walter Raleigh, who first beheld it in all its palmy grandeur—was riddled by these distresses. A fatal change had taken place in the constitution of the state; and, betrayed by one in whom they had almost blindly trusted, the people felt the hard, pressing, crippling tendencies of a foreign policy. They had been free, as free as the elk in the valleys yet untrodden by the foot of man; they had rejoiced in that liberty, and with a brisk trade and increasing affluence had hailed with shouts of joy and blazing bonfires the restoration of King Charles II. But then a change came. The liberty they had loved was to be taken from them; the trade that had been brisk and thriving was stunted by the Navigation Laws; the democratic tendencies which some of their laws exhibited were carefully weeded out, as cockle from among the barley; the executive power was no longer dependent on the will of the people, but on that of a monarch thousands of miles away; and the freedom of religious sentiment clean gone for ever. Customs, liturgy, and catechism took the place of the “old ways,” and Virginia found to late that her people had shouted and lighted their bonfires to very little good; that the promises even of a king were not always redeemed; and that old Hebrew wisdom was as true and fresh in the seventeenth century of the Christian era as when Solomon sat on the throne of Israel, and that consequently it would have been far wiser not to have put their trust in princes.

In our enlightened age it seems almost incredible that any man in authority should express himself as follows: “Thank God, there are no free schools, nor printing; and I hope we shall not have them for three hundred years; for learning has brought disobedience, and heresy, and sects into the world—and printing has divided them and libelled the best of governments. God keep us from both!” So spoke, however, the sage Sir William Berkeley, sapient governor of Virginia. Under such rule and authority the people became seriously alarmed;—what was the beautiful succession of valleys on the other side of the Blue Mountains, what the rich vegetation of their plains to them, if every means was to be employed to impoverish the subject and enrich the ruler—when, added to all the local and incidental tyranny of such government, the king bestowed one day in a merry humour upon his favourite, the Earl of Arlington, “all the dominion of land and water called Virginia, for the full term of thirty-one years, together with all quit-rents, escheats, the power to grant land, and all other powers of absolute sovereignty!”

The people of Virginia found their alarm to be turning rapidly into discontent, and discontent into a desire to resist the tyranny that so cruelly oppressed them. In the grand old forests, under the shade of night, they met and talked over their grievances. Glimmering, half-red embers, if kindled together, get into the brightest white glow. Matters were coming to a crisis. At this time portentous omens were observed—a comet stretched its fiery tail across the black canopy of night—a fearful plague of flies settled on the land, the Indian war, which had slumbered so long, broke out again with fearful violence; the war-whoop sounded—the signal of death to many a peaceful family; atrocities of the most frightful description were perpetrated;—but the governor adopted no measures to put an end to the struggle; he disregarded all their appeals for defence, and, irritated by their wrongs, they determined to help themselves, and looked round for a leader. That leader was found. The hour had come, and the hour brought the man. Nathaniel Bacon stood forward as the champion of the people.

The governor sternly forbade the people to arm, or to attack the Indians—he had an interest in the beaver trade, and it might have interfered with that; but despite his commands they prepared for the fray, and young Bacon protested that if he was denied a commission, he would march against the Indians with no other commission than his sword. A white man was slain—scalped to the music of the war-whoop—the Red Skins fell upon some of Bacon’s personal friends, and slew them with every aggravation of cruelty. He pursued them, and was himself pursued by the troops of the governor. Circumstances, however, prevented an encounter, Bacon was victorious over the Indians, returned in triumph, was elected a member of the council, confessed his error (so they termed it), in taking up arms without a commission, was promised a commission on the Monday—that being Saturday—so that the colony rang with applause, and Bacon was the hero of the hour.

When Monday came there was no commission for the self-made captain. With many idle words and a variety of protests, the granting of the commission was deferred from hour to hour, and from day to day. Worn out with such treatment, and suspecting treachery, Bacon withdrew from Jamestown. Writs were issued for his apprehension, and he came, not as a prisoner, not banded with irons like the unhappy Drummond, but at the head of a considerable army, the sight of which made Governor Berkeley tremble with fear, under his robes of state, and rush forth in a sort of tragic excitement, leaving his breast and crying:—

“No, may it please your honour,” Bacon answered, “we will not hurt a hair of your head, or of any other man’s; we are come for a commission to save our lives from the Indians, which you have so often promised, and now we will have it before we go.”

The governor looked hopelessly around; there met his glance on every side the same waving crowd of stern determined faces, the same dense forest of spears, and the shout rang through the air, “We’ll have it! we’ll have it!” He turned and entered the State House, followed by Bacon, and as the shout of the people still arose, one of the council went to a window and harangued them into quietness, sending down soft and gentle premises as thick as snow flakes on a wintry day. While this man was speaking to the people, Bacon addressed the council, not confining himself to the Indian disturbances, but condemning the exorbitant taxes, the corruption of the administration, and mourning over the grievances of the country. The commission was signed, the harbinger of a better legislation, on the 4th of July, 1676, one hundred years to a day before the signing of the final Declaration of Independence.

What followed need be told very briefly. Attempts were made to do away with the force of the commission, and Bacon was branded as a rebel; he and his people swore to defend themselves and the liberties of their country, not only against Governor Berkeley, but against England itself. Sarah Drummond lifted a small stick from the ground and broke it, saying, she feared the power of England no more than a broken straw. The civil war commenced. Jamestown was besieged by Bacon and his forces. Those within were unable to withstand those without. A tyrant is proverbially a coward. Berkeley was the first to fly. Next day Jamestown was in flames, and the ruins of the church tower and one or two gravestones in the churchyard are the only remaining memorial of the place. The revolutionary spirit spread. The fire of enthusiasm caught, and far and near the people turned out against English rule. Bacon was the leader in that tremendous struggle, a prodigy to the more tremendous struggle to be made a century later; but in the midst of his triumphs disease attacked him, and he who had faced death on the battle field unscathed, fell beneath the marauding of the Jamestown marshes. There was no one to finish his work; as is generally supposed, the people sank the body of their chief in the majestic waters of the York river, they buried their cause with him, and the rest was blood and murder, and rampant tyranny trampling down all honest zeal with its iron heels.

But now of our second sketch. It is about eighty years later in American history. The French war was the one grand theme in America as well as in England. Virginia was in a state of perpetual alarm, for the Indians had joined with the French, and accomplished fearful and deadly work. Scalping parties advanced to the very centre of Massachusetts, and it became necessary that some earnest effort to repel these attacks should be made at once. The

BUCHAREST AND THE WALLACHIANS.

BUCHAREST is agreeably situated in a wide and fertile plain, on the eastern bank of the Dumbovitzza. Its name signifies "the city of enjoyment," but beyond its agreeable situation, it has little claim to such an inviting appellation. Its first appearance creates ideas of beauty and magnificence, which are doomed to speedy disappointment. The towers and domes of sixty churches and the turrets of numerous convents, rising among gardens and promenades shaded by trees, give it an agreeable aspect as the traveller approaches it; but once within its streets the illusion ceases. Wooden cabins rise in the close vicinity of marble palaces, and a heap of ruins is seen next to a splendid hotel; while in some parts there are whole streets of wooden or mud huts, without either pavement or drainage.

The plan of the town is very irregular, as it consists of sixty-seven quarters, which are the property of as many boyards, on whose lands colonies of their serfs have gradually accumulated. The residences of the boyards are spacious, and built of stone. The palace of the hospodar is a large and irregular pile of buildings, used instead of the modern palace, which was destroyed by fire in more modest of these edifices. There are also a Roman Catholic and a Lutheran church, and a synagogue for the Jews. Seven of the Greek churches, as well as the twenty monasteries, are surrounded by walls. The other principal edifices deserving of notice are, a large bazaar, several hospitals, and the residences of the foreign consuls, among which that of the Austrian consul is the most handsome.

Schools are numerous enough in Bucharest and the neighbourhood but it is only within the last twenty years that education has made much progress. French is taught almost universally, and is the pivot of the national system. The Lyceum for young Greeks is conducted by twelve professors, and the example set by the German portion of the population, mostly skilled operatives from Saxony, has led to the establishment of several other schools. There is also a society of the belles lettres, a public library, and several reading-rooms, supplied with the German and Russian newspapers.

In one respect, Bucharest well deserves the name of "the city of enjoyment." The people are extremely gay, fond of music and

GREEK CHURCH AT BUCHAREST.

1812. This building and the metropolitan church are both situated in the principal square, and in the centre of the town. The principal street, Sogoumokol, is as crowded and lively in the afternoon as the Boulevards of Paris.

The boyards vie with each other in the splendour of their equipages, and frequently ruin themselves by their ostentation and extravagance. The magnificence of their costume, and the rich liveries of their numerous servants, contrast strangely with the rude and simple garb of the working classes, and still more with the slovenly and dirty appearance of the Jewish usurers.

There are sixty churches, none of which have fewer than three steeples or towers, and many no less than six; some even have as many as nine. A coat of brilliant stucco usually covers the fronts, and the roofs, as in Russia, are covered with tin, and painted green. A profusion of statues generally encumbers the peristyle, and the picture of some saint is often placed over the principal entrance. The nave is ornamented with statues and pictures, and separated from the choir by a handsome screen, which serves to conceal the altar, on certain occasions. Our illustration above will give an idea of the dancing, and addicted to sensual pleasures generally. For such tastes and desires there is abundant provision. The city is full of taverns and coffee-houses, nearly every one of which has a room devoted to billiards, bagatelle or cards. Casinos and concert-rooms are as numerous as in Paris, and music is heard at night in every street. There is also a theatre, where French operas, dramas, and vaudevilles are represented by native performers. The saloon is crowded nightly with the beauties of the city, dressed in their gayest attire, and with the rich boyards and gay officers of the army. The white uniforms of the Austrians have now replaced the green jackets of the Russians, but the brilliant throng is as gay and sparkling as ever. The pit presents a curious mélange of all the Oriental types, Greeks, Turks, Armenians, Bulgarians, etc.

But for observing these various types and national costumes and peculiarities, the traveller will not find a place better adapted than the annual fairs, particularly the great fair of St. Peter, held at Giurgevo, a town on the Danube, opposite Rustshuk. There the picturesque costumes of Wallachia may be seen in the greatest variety. Tall, robust men, with long black hair falling upon their shoulders from beneath a fez of scarlet or blue cloth, and dark moustaches, hanging down like those of the Tartars; pelisses trimmed with fur, the cloak thrown over the left shoulder, breeches of remarkable amplitude, and high boots: such are the men of the middle class, who can command some of the comforts and some of the luxuries of life. Mixed with these are seen peasants in their broad-rimmed hats, loose jackets and leather girdles, each carrying a staff that will serve for a stout weapon as well as for an assistant on the road; Jew pellars, meanly dressed and excessively dirty, displaying their wares; and Bulgarian shepherds and herdsmen, clad in sheepskins, and stamped indelibly with an impression of servility and brutish degradation. The costumes of the women are even more picturesque than those of the men. The ladies of Bucharest, particularly among the resident aristocracy, adopt the Parisian fashions, though much less picturesque than the national costume of their countrywomen of the rural districts. This consists of a white veil, which covers the head and falls down behind over the shoulders; a dress full in the body, and coming close to the throat, with loose sleeves, and rather short in the skirt, which is sometimes embroidered a little above the hem; and over this a loose jacket, with sleeves nearly as long as those of the dress. The hair states that, when Aurelian ceded Dacia to the Goths, he removed the Roman colonists into Moesia, and there is no trace of such a population in Dacia at any subsequent period. The Byzantine historians, on the other hand, frequently mention a people called Vlachi, who lived chiefly in the country round Mount Pindus; and in the twelfth century a great number of these people, being oppressed by the Greek emperor, left Thrace, and settled north of the Danube. A fresh emigration took place in the thirteenth century, after the extermination of the original inhabitants of Dacia by the Tatars. That the Wallachians are descended from the Vlachi is most probable, especially as the same people are still found in Thrace and the neighbouring provinces. Moreover, there is no trace of the introduction of the Greek religion into Wallachia by missionaries, as was the case in Russia; for the Vlachi were already converted to Christianity, and carried their religion with them.

The basis of the language spoken in Wallachia is Latin, which contributes about half the words, the remainder being derived from the Greek, Albanian, and Slavonic languages. The alphabet resembles the Russian, and contains forty-two letters; it was invented by Bishop Cyrillus, about the year 870, and is called is often ornamented with strings of gilt or mother-of-pearl beads, and falls down behind in two and sometimes three long plaits, which are tied at the end with ribbon. Women of the humbler classes wear a very loose garment, with long, loose sleeves, and over this a petticoat of a darker colour, open down the right side, and confined at the waist with a girdle. The under-garment scarcely reaches the ankles, and about six inches of the skirt is shown below the petticoat. Very often their feet are bare, and their long black hair, instead of being plaited, falls loosely over their shoulders, and waves in the breeze as they walk.

Gipsies, of whom there are said to be 90,000 in Wallachia, also attend this and other fairs in great numbers, some offering wooden bowls and spoons for sale, or telling the fortunes of the credulous; while others attend the lower sort of taverns, or set up booths in the fair, the young women dancing, and the men playing various rude instruments of music. Juggling tricks are also exhibited by some of them, and, indeed, the fair depends very much upon these tawny wanderers for the amusements offered to the people.

It is the opinion of some writers that the Wallachians are descended from the Roman colonists whom the Emperor Trajan sent into Dacia; but this is extremely doubtful, for Vopiscus after his name. Literature, however, is at a very low ebb in Wallachia, though some of the more enlightened boyards have endeavoured to substitute the Roman characters for the Cyrillian, with the view of promoting it. Many ancient chronicles and other works exist in manuscript, and will probably be published when the country is under a better system of administration, and education has made greater progress. There is a newspaper, called "The Wallachian Courier," published at Bucharest, and another in the Wallachian language at Jassy, the capital of Moldavia, called "The Bee." There is little difference between Moldavia and Wallachia, the two provinces having originally been one country, and the people and language are the same. Much ignorance prevails among the bulk of the population, which will take a long time to remove; but considerable progress in civilisation has been made during the last twenty years, and wherever progress is visible, hopes may be entertained of better things to come.

The Austrian occupation of the principalities promises to be as inimical to their progress, and to the well-being of their inhabitants, as was that of the Russians, and only with the return of peace can we hope for very marked signs of progress. War is a sad retarder of civilisation, but its results in this case will probably be beneficial.

LORD COLLINGWOOD.

We now come to another of those traits of character, which, though not of a nature to be widely known, mark the temperament of the great and good man. Lord Collingwood, from his earliest years, held the practice of flogging in great dislike; he would recommend no officer, however skilful, that indulged in severe corporal chastisement. When a commander, he rarely ever practised it; and when compelled, was always seen to suffer inwardly and to be much depressed afterwards. When flogging seemed imperative, he limited the lashes to a few, and always remitted his punishment when he could. Yet so excellent was he deemed as a disciplinarian, that, after the Mutiny of the Kore, several of the most violent mutineers were drafted into the Excellent. "Send them to Collingwood," Lord St. Vincent used to say, "and he will reform them." Yet this was effected more by kindness than severity of any sort, and often by a minute consideration of the feelings of his men, of which he was very careful. "If you do not know a man's name," he told his officers, "call him 'Sailor,' and not 'You-sir,' and such other appellations; they are offensive and improper." Of the sick, his care was exemplarily indeed; even when admiral, he personally visited them, and inquired after their wants and welfare. And thus he came to be revered more like a father than a commander, while his command was perfect and complete; for though kind to his seamen, he never permitted himself to unbend too much, and preserved a dignity and awe about him which went far with some of the spirits with which he had to deal. Such was the example he set his officers, and thus he contrived to dispense with severer methods of discipline. One day his favourite lieutenant, Clavell, being out of humour with some of his men, exclaimed: "I wish I were captain, for your sakes!" The admiral happened to overhear this, and tapping him on the shoulder, said: "Pray, Clavell, what could you have done if you had been captain?" "I would have flogged them, sir, precisely well," answered the lieutenant, still in a passion. "No, you would not, Clavell—no, you would not," quietly rejoined the admiral; "I know you better." In fact, it was said of him, that his officers were more afraid of him than his ordinary seamen, which in one sense was true; for though his reproofs were gentlemanly and considerate, yet such was the quickness of his eye, that he detected the most trifling disorder or carelessness, and never omitted to notice them, however small.

With all this kindness of nature, however, and consideration of those under his command, he would brook nothing resembling slight or insult, or wanton disregard of propriety, in those above him. On one occasion, when post-captain, he evinced this resolute maintenance of dignity in rather a marked way. When off Cadiz, the Excellent was signalled to close with the admiral's ship; and, in running down, the signal was made five or six times for altering her course—first to one side, then the other, and at last for a lieutenant. Captain Collingwood, who had observed this in silence, and did not had to be annoyed, and accompanied his lieutenant. On boarding the admiral's ship, he ordered his lieutenant, when the order was copied, to bring it to him. In the meantime, he walked the quarter-deck with Lord St. Vincent and Sir Robert Calder. When the order was brought he read it aloud, and it turned out to be merely to receive two bags of onions for the use of the sick. "Bless me!" exclaimed Collingwood; "is this the service, my Lord?" "Is this the service, Sir Robert? Has the Excellent's course been five or six times altered for two bags of onions? Man my boat, sir"—turning to his lieutenant—"and let us get on board again." Nor could all the civilities of Lord St. Vincent detain him to dinner.

Another prominent characteristic of this admirable seaman was his economy of naval stores. Nothing irritated him so much as waste of the nation's resources, and his most severe reproofs were always elicited by any flagrant waste of naval means on the part of inferior commanders. On some such occasion he once broke out: "That man would exhaust a dockyard, and still want! I do not think such a man should go to sea; they certainly neither regard nor feel for the future necessities of their country." Of another he said: "That officer should never sail without a store-ship in company. He knows as much seamanship as the king's attorney-general. I wouldn't trust him with a float in a foot-steam!" Had the navy possessed more Collingwoods, our "national debt," would have been somewhat less bulky than it is.

Collingwood's employment, for some time after this, was of a desultory nature. He was to blockade Cadiz, and to cut off the trade of the Spanish ports. Whilst thus engaged, his friend Nelson achieved the victory "of the Nile," as it is called, though fought in Aboukir Bay. His letter to Sir Horatio, soon to become Lord Nelson, does honour both to his head and heart. He was above the meaner passions; envy or jealousy had no room in his breast. Yet it is evident how strongly he wished to have been present; and, in a familiar letter to Captain Ball, he laments that, whilst they are winning victories that may change the fate of Europe, he is only "watching market-boats and cabbage-carriers off St. Lucars." In this harassing duty Collingwood was employed till 1801, when that famous coalition against the naval supremacy of Great Britain, at the head of which was the Russian emperor Paul, was organized. At this period Collingwood was ordered to Plymouth, and here he had the happiness of meeting once more his wife and children, whom he had not seen for some years. The interview was short, for he was again ordered to sea, where he remained until the Peace of Amiens was signed, when he rejoined his beloved wife and family at Morpeth, in Northumberland, now their place of residence. During this period, he took great pains with the education of his daughters; and there exist, in the hands of his relatives now living, various abridgments of particular portions of English history, with remarks by Collingwood, written with great power and terseness, for his daughters' use. He hated all trifling occupations, even for females; and his own spare time was spent in cultivating his garden on the banks of the beautiful river Wansbeck, and in draining and planting his grounds. It is said a brother seaman, who called upon him here, sought him through his garden in vain, until at last he was discovered, with Scott, his gardener, hard at work in the bottom of a deep trench which they were cutting. He, however, real steadily and wrote occasionally, and so well that one of the ministers, with whom he afterwards had to correspond, used to say: "Where did Collingwood get his style? I can't conceive where—but he writes better than any of us."

In 1803, war had been rekindled, and Collingwood's services were soon in requisition. He was ordered to reinforce the squadron of Admiral Cornwallis off Brest. On Nelson's own application, his friend Collingwood was given him as second in a command which only ended with the lives of both. They soon had to engage in that terrible and final conflict off Cape Trafalgar, which will long be remembered. The circumstances of that greatest of naval conflicts are generally known. The share which Collingwood had in it was certainly extraordinary, and his reliance upon the discipline and bravery of his crew must have been complete to induce such a man to run the apparent risk he did. His conduct on the eve of this terrible action is eminently characteristic of the cool courage of the man. Smith, his servant, entering the cabin, found the admiral dressing himself. Collingwood told him to look to leeward, and he would see the French fleet, adding, "We shall soon see more of them." But, continued Smith, the narrator of this scene, "I looked more at the admiral, who was shaving himself with a composure that quite astonished me." Lieutenant Clavell, coming down dressed in boots, the admiral remarked to him, "You had better, Clavell, put on silk stockings, as I have done. If one gets a shot in the leg, they are much more manageable for the surgeon." He then went through the decks and encouraged the men, and finally addressed the officers, saying, in conclusion—"Now, gentlemen, we are to do something to-day which the world will talk of hereafter." The result is known to all; but it is a remarkable fact, that Collingwood's flag-ship so much outstepped all the rest, that, when he closed with the enemy, the nearest of his followers was a mile astern. It is said that this during combat greatly affected the spirits of the enemy; and that, from the first, the French commander despaired of success. There is nothing like this in the naval records even of England. Towards the close of the conflict, Collingwood went on board the Victory to visit his dying commander-in-chief; on his reaching the cockpit, however, Lord Nelson had just expired.

From this time forward until his death, the life of Lord Collingwood was one of harassing anxiety and wearing occupation. He was now Commander-in-Chief of this great fleet; and his correspondence with the ministers and other officials, both of his own and other countries, was varied and incessant; and when to this was added the care of such a force, it was more than any man of his age could long sustain. That Lord Collingwood ardently desired to be suffered to rejoin his family, and to recruit, if possible, his sinking health, is on melancholy record. No success could, however, be found for such a man and at such a crisis; and he was suffered to die at his post, worn down by labour and confinement on board ship. A few extracts from his correspondence, and anecdotes of his conduct, will best illustrate the plain and practical nobility of his character, his manly contempt for all corruption and frivolity, his devotion to his country, and next to his family, his high morality, and his deep sense of religion, as evinced more in act than word. Lord Collingwood's constant attention to economy in naval stores has already been adverted to; but one proof of it is of a nature so singular that we cannot resist relating it. In the hottest part of the battle off Cape St. Vincent, when closely engaged with the Santísima, Collingwood was heard to observe to his lieutenant, at that time near him, "Bless me, Mr. Pettus, how come we to forget to bend our old topsail!" They are quite ruining that new one. It will never be worth a farthing again!" Of his hate for everything mercenary, the following passage of a letter to Lady Collingwood, written soon after his promotion as a peer, affords ample proof, especially when it is recollected that his whole revenue at that moment was not more than £1,100 per annum: "I am afraid the fees for this patent will be large, and will pinch me; but, never mind. Let others seditiously pension: I am an Englishman, and will never ask for money as a favour." On another occasion he writes to his lady in this strain: "Here are several officers so much in distress, that they cannot get home; but what can I do? The Admiralty will not say a word to me about the prizes, the promotion of officers, or any subject! I never did, nor will I ever do anything but what I think conducive to the public good. I am not ambitious of power or wealth more than I have; nor have I connexion of any kind to sway me from the strict line of duty to the country. I have neither sons nor cousins to promote by any of those tricks which I have ever held in contempt: so that when I err, it will be from the head and not from the heart." To his father-in-law, Mr. Blakett, he thus expresses himself in reference to the pension voted him by parliament: "The pension was most honourable to me, as it flowed voluntarily from his majesty's bounty; but if I had a favour to ask, money would be the last thing I would beg from an impoverished country. I am not a Jew, whose god is gold; nor a Swiss, whose services are to be counted against so much money. I have motives for my conduct, which I would not give in exchange for a hundred pensions." It would be easy to multiply these noble passages twenty fold; but our limits tell us we must, with whatever diligence, curb our inclination, and restrain.

We have already given proofs of the amiable and great manly-deep love for his family, and his desire to improve them with sentiments concerning his own. When can be finer than the following remark addressed to his lady, with reference to the education of his daughters, in the year 1805: "To inspire them with a love of every thing that is honourable and virtuous, though in rags, and with contempt for vanity in outward show, is the way to make them the darlings of my heart. They should not only read, but they require a careful selection of books, in which they ever have access to two or three volumes; but when a subject is begun, it should be finished before anything more is undertaken. How it would enrage their minds, if they could acquire an imperfect knowledge of mathematics, and a trifling acquaintance with the beauty and wonder of the creation! I am persuaded that the generality of people, and particularly 'true ladies,' only act as if they were told to be ignorant of the fashion of the church. But I would have my girls gain such a knowledge of the works of the creation, that they may have a fixed idea of the nature of their Being, who could be the author of such a world."

That Collingwood was truly a philosopher, as well as a hero, the following exquisite passage amply demonstrates. It occurs in a letter to his lady on October 2nd, 1806: "I have written enough about money; and I between ourselves, I think, I believe, there is more plague in it than can be said, and that the fruits of our Morph garden, and the howa would have afforded us as much happiness as we shall ever have. I have lived long enough in the world to know that human felicity has nothing to do with exterior; then let us cultivate it in our own minds."

When writing to his daughters, he often indulged in a strain of light sarcasm and keen jealousy. He tells his eldest girl: "I think I know the character of a lady pretty nearly from her handwriting. The de lices are all impudent, however they may conceal it from themselves or others; and the scribbles flatter themselves with the vain hope that as their letter cannot be read, it may be mistaken for sentiments." With lazy, incompetent officers he had no patience. Of one, he says: "He is living on the navy, not serving in it. He, —, too, is applying to go home. If he goes, we may stay. I have no notion of people making the navy a mere convenience for themselves, as if it were a public establishment for loungers."

We now conclude. This great man died at sea on the 7th of March, 1810, of a disease brought on by long confinement and over toil, at the age of fifty-nine, a martyr to his devotion to his country. Posterity will not fail to do him full justice, and recognise him as an example to be admired, studied, and imitated by all who pursue a profession of which his character is one of the greatest ornaments.

THE ORGAN MOUNTAINS.

THE Serra dos Organos, or Organ Mountains, are a branch of the Serra do Mar, or sea range, which runs parallel to the coast of Brazil, between the Bay of Santos and Cape Frio. The highest summits of this range rise to about 3,500 feet above the level of the sea, and the passes over them to from 2,000 to 2,500 feet; their distance from the coast is scarcely anywhere more than twenty miles, but south of the Bay of Santos, where they form to be called Serra Cubatão, they recede to sixty or eighty miles from the coast.

In that portion of their course adjacent to the river Mucuna these mountains are elevated into a great number of inaccessible peaks, some of them of very singular forms, and the name of the range is derived from a faint resemblance which several of them bear to the pipes of an organ. The highest of these peaks is 3,600 feet above the level of the Atlantic, and its summit has not yet been reached by man, for only the hardy hunter and the enthusiast naturalist have ventured to climb its craggy and precipitous sides in pursuit of game or in quest of rare specimens of natural history. The picturesque spot represented in our illustration lies in the rear of Rio Janeiro, the capital of Brazil, and, with one other site in the range, has been for several years a place of pilgrimage for persons whose health has suffered from the intensity of the tropical heat during the summer months. Europeans, who are especially liable to the enervating influence of the Brazilian climate, find their faculties renewed by a timely removal to the eastern slopes of the Organ Mountains, where the tropical heat is tempered by the breezes which have blown from the Atlantic, and the atmosphere rarefied by the elevation of the site, they find a climate as agreeable as that of Sicily or Andalusia. According to Dr. Silland, physician to his Imperial majesty, Dom Pedro II., there are nearly always seven or eight degrees of difference between the temperature of Rio Janeiro and that of the Organ Mountains at the height of 3,000 yards above sea level in the illustration. Hall and Silland, who were the first to visit these mountains, are intervals between Rio Janeiro and them frequently on these mountains, but we cannot admit the statements of those authors who assert that the peaks of the Organ Mountains are constantly covered with clouds, and that their summits, whitened by the hoar-frost, present a striking contrast to the richly wooded hills of the lower region.

In the Organ Mountains, however, originate those violent storms which sometimes burst over Rio Janeiro; and from thence, also, blows that invigorating wind designated by the Brazilians by the significant name of vento terral, which exercises so agreeable an influence upon the hygienic condition of the city.

Favoured by the delightful coolness enjoyed in this portion of the province, Mr. Marsh, an able English horticulturist, has been for several years engaged in acclimatising experiments, and has succeeded even beyond his hopes. The greater part of the fruits and useful vegetables of southern Europe, already naturalised under the happy climate of Minas Geraes, are now produced in equal perfection under the tropical sun of Rio Janeiro. By the judicious application of his horticultural skill and experience, Mr. Marsh has succeeded

The marvellous riches of nature reserved in the Organ Mountains for the explorations of future botanists, are said to surpass the most glowing conceptions of the imagination. Gardner, the traveller, who, while pursuing his scientific investigations in the Organ Mountains in 1837, was for several months the guest of Mr. Marsh, has painted these beautiful solitudes with the enthusiasm of a lover of nature, and speaks of the region as the "land of promise" of botanists. The whole of Brazil, in fact, is characterised by the same rich exuberance of vegetation. A great part of the interior is overspread with magnificent forests, which have hitherto been trodden only by the jaguar and the native hunter, and in which vegetation prevails in its most wondrous and gigantic forms. Tall palms and arboreal ferns are tangled with rope-vines and other climbers; mahogany and caoutchouc trees support screens of flowering trailers; and everywhere beneath them is a thick undergrowth of aloes, azaves, and prickly creepers, which in producing excellent cherries, and peaches and apples very little inferior to those of Europe. The exceptional climate of the Organ Mountains, influenced by the causes we have noticed, has enabled him to place the most delicious fruits of Europe on the tables of the wealthy Brazilians, in competition with the luscious horticultural productions of the tropics. Our strawberries now mingle their perfume with that of aracás and ruddy pitangas, and the peach takes its place by the side of the yellow and glossy-skinned caju, the mara caju, the taste of which reminds the partaker of that of the prune, the combaca, which has an agreeable acid flavour and the odour of the apricot, and the jubicaba, which grows abundantly in bunches, and is a most refreshing fruit. It is right to mention here that, sometime before Mr. Marsh began his experiments, a Frenchman, the Count de Gestas, had already enriched the fruit and vegetable markets of Rio Janeiro with some of the productions of his own country, and was engaged in further attempts at acclimatisation when his useful labours were interrupted by death, sometimes render the forests absolutely impassable. "In the interior of the new continent," says Humboldt, "we almost accustomed ourselves to regard man as not being essential to the order of nature. The earth is bled with plants, and nothing impedes their development. An immense layer of free mould manifests the uninterrupted action of organic powers. The crocodiles are masters of the rivers; the jaguars, peccaries, and monkeys traverse the forests without fear and without danger: there they dwell as in an ancient inheritance. This aspect of animated nature, in which man is nothing, has something in it strange and sad. To this we reconcile ourselves with difficulty on the ocean and amid the sands of Africa; though in these scenes, where nothing recalls to mind our fields, our woods, and our streams, we are less astonished at the vast solitude through which we pass: Here, in a fertile country, adorned with eternal verdure, we seek in vain the traces of the power of man; we seem to be transported into a world altogether different from that which gave us birth."

FRENCH ART PRIZES.

In France there has of late years been a good deal said in disparagement of the School of Fine Art and the Roman Academy. Divers opinions have been held as to the utility of the noble creation of Colbert's, and the liberal institutions of Louis XIV. Yet are they well calculated to excite emulation, and their rewards are such as to be thoroughly serviceable to the art-student. Many have slighted, if they have not derided, these advantages; and the result has been most unfavourable to art and artists. To make a pilgrimage to Rome, is the ardent desire that should animate every disciple of art: for that seven-hilled city—the mistress of

This is effected by the French Academy by way of prize, and the very same plan is adopted by the Royal Academy of London. A promising student, whose talent is sufficient to entitle him to the prize, receives that which is the greatest of all prizes to him, the means of perfecting himself in his art by the study of those grand masterpieces which have won for their authors immortal names.

Among the painters who have been successful in obtaining prizes this year in France, we may mention M. Renard, whose admirable landscape is deserving of all praise. The grouping of the trees, the distant scene, the calm, still water, and the clear sky, testify the the world, once in Pagan glory, once again in Catholic Christianity—boasts of possessing the richest treasures, both in painting and in sculpture, which the world has ever seen. But the necessary expense attending a continued residence at Rome involves considerable outlay; and, as it sometimes, alas! too often happens, that the student's means are bounded by very narrow limits, the benefits arising from a sojourn in the Eternal City are denied to all but a favoured few. Nothing can be more appropriate, more in keeping with the aims of true art, than to assist those who need such assistance to acquire that which they could not otherwise obtain.

Both of these works have obtained for their authors the grand prize—the first in landscape painting, and the second for figure drawing. The sculptures are also very good. The subjects which we present have gained the first and second prize. The first, "Hector imploring the Gods for his Son" is a very masterly composition, and M. Carpeaux has fairly earned the prize he has obtained. The second, "A Fawn," by M. Cumery, is also deserving of great praise. The accusation—by often I thought again t

THE GRAVES OF BYRON AND MARY CHAWORTH.

THE tourist in the midland counties, if he be an admirer of the genius of Byron, as well as a lover of the beautiful in nature, should leave the railway at Derby, and inquire the way to the hamlet of Hucknall, where the noble poet lies interred. The road is over a wide moor, formerly a part of Sherwood Forest, the scene of the exploits of Robin Hood and his "merrie men;" and many a fragment of ballad lore will occur to the tourist's recollection, as he pursues his way through the yellow-blossoming furze, and sees a magnificent oak here and there spreading its branches over the track. The road is very indifferent, and the soil sandy; but on a fine morning in summer no pedestrian excursion can be more delightful. After a walk of seven or eight miles, the tourist reaches a primitive-looking wayside ale-house, which, according to the traditions of the neighbourhood, was a resort of Robin Hood and his stalwart lieutenant, little John; but the hostelry looks much more modern than the tradition would indicate, and the bold foresters of Sherwood loved to quaff their nut-brown ale under the shade of the venerable trees.

About a mile beyond this lonely little inn, almost the only habitation of man which is seen during the walk, the tourist reaches Annesley Park, the birthplace of Mary Chaworth, whose beauty captivated the heart of the poet in his boy-h-days. Through the park lies the nearest path to Hucknall; and as the tourist winds his way onward, he will have no difficulty in recognising the scene of "The Dream." There is the "gentle hill," on which the poet and Mary Chaworth met, and which is still

"Green and of mild declivity, the last,
As 'twere the cape, of a long ridge of such,
Save that there was no sea to lave its base,
But a most living landscape."

But the "trees of circular array" are gone, and the broad branches of the oaks no longer shade the spot where the "youth and maiden" of "The Dream" once stood together, in the sunny time of their youth, ere disappointment and misfortune had clouded the path of either. The scenery of the park, however, is very picturesque, groves of magnificent oaks crowning the surrounding hills, and numbers of deer reclining beneath the shade of the venerable trees in the park, or cropping the verdant herbage.

Hucknall is a mere straggling hamlet, without any other attraction than the poet's tomb, which suffices, however, to draw around it tourists of every civilised nation under the sun. It is approached from the park by a lane, shaded with tall hedges and bending trees, the branches of which, in some places, nearly meet overhead, forming an agreeable shade in the summer; and on reaching the village street, the tourist sees a comfortable-looking inn on one side, and a little distance before him the church. The latter is old and decayed, and everything about it, both within and without, bears the marks of neglect. The vault wherein the poet lies buried is covered with two large slabs of rough stone clumsily fitted together, and the floor of the church, which is of the same material, is broken and irregular. A plain white marble tablet, bearing an inscription to the poet's memory, is fitted into the wall, and surrounded by a black border. It is immediately above the vault, and beneath it are the memorial bearings of the Byron family carved in stone. The remains of the poet's mother lie near him, and opposite to his tomb is a stone bearing a long inscription commemorative of the virtues and services of a Byron who adhered to the fortunes of Charles I., and perished when

"At Marston, with Rupert 'gainst traitors contending, Four brothers bedewed with their blood the bleak field."

The road from Hucknall to Newstead Abbey lies through a wood, and the foliage of oaks and pines forms an arch of verdure overhead for more than a mile. This part of the journey is very pleasant. Several clear streams cross the road, while footpaths lead off at different points into deep shades. At the end of the wood, the road runs over a gentle eminence, and on reaching its top the tourist sees the Gothic ruins of Newstead Abbey rising before him. They stand in a quiet valley, surrounded by green hills, and are partly mantled with ivy, which nearly covers the old chancel window. In one portion of the tastefully laid-out grounds, an oak planted by Byron is shown; and in a deep, shaly dell, called the Devil's Wood, there is an old tree on which the poet, when he visited the spot in company with his sister on the evening before he left Newstead for ever, cut the following inscription:—

AUGUSTA, } Sept. 1814.

The bark has partly grown over this interesting record, and some difficulty is now found in deciphering the date. Near this spot is a shady recess, formed by the intertwined branches of the oaks, overhung with ivy, and a sparkling spring called the Holy Well.

In the body of the abbey, among the ruins, are several figures in stone, and a fountain gurgles through an old and quaint piece of sculpture, realising the description of Byron:—

"Amidst the court a Gothic fountain played,
Symmetrical, yet decked with carvings quaint,
Strange faces, like to men in masquerade,
And here perhaps a monster, there a saint.
The spring gushed through grim mouths of granite made,
And sparkled into basins, where it spouted
Its little torrent in a thousand bubbles,
Like man's vain glories and his vainer troubles."

Should the tourist continue his ramble to the neighbourhood of Nottingham, than which he cannot do better, if he is fond of old English scenery, such as the railways are fast altering, he will find, below that town, on the romantic banks of the Trent, the large estate of the Musters family, whose patrimonial mansion is called Colwick Hall. This place has nothing to do with Byron, but there Mary Chaworth lived and died. The handsome exterior of Mr. Musters won the heart of the blue-eyed Mary, and she became his wife; but her life was blighted by his brutal manners and profligate habits, which rendered him an object of aversion to all the neighbourhood. During the reform riots of 1831, when Nottingham Castle was destroyed by an exasperated mob, the rioters visited Colwick Hall, and set fire to it, but it was not burnt down. Mrs. Musters fled from the house in alarm, and took refuge in a wood on the estate. Fright and exposure brought on an attack of fever, which terminated her existence after a few days' illness. She is buried in Colwick church, where her tomb is frequently visited by tourists.

The church is close to the hall, and is draped with ivy, and overshadowed by trees gray with age. The Trent flows close at hand, sparkling in the sunlight as its clear waters ripple over its pebbly bottom, murmuring the requiem of her who was the object of a great poet's love. She is spoken of in the neighbourhood as a woman of remarkable personal attractions, and of a character forming a bright contrast to that of the man to whom she was unhappily united. That Byron long remembered her with tenderness, is well known; probably he never ceased to do so. What might have been the results of their union, as regards the happiness of both, it is of course impossible to say; but we know the influence which the virtues and more spiritual character of Shelley had over the poet while they were together, and it is pleasing, though vain, to contemplate the firmer influence which such a woman as Mary Chaworth might have had upon a heart so susceptible of softening influences as that of Byron. Poor Byron! A feeling of sadness steals over us as we read his "Dream," and then think of the unhappiness of the "two beings" whom it immortalizes, and who now await the resurrection and the judgment, the one in the odd and dreary church of Hucknall, the other by the banks of the blue and winding Trent.

CERVANTES.

DON MIGUEL CERVANTES SAAVEDRA the author of the immortal romance of "Don Quixote," was born in 1547, at Alcalá de Henares, a town in the province of New Castile. His father, Don Rodrigo, was a poor hidalgo, or noble, one of those who possessed little more than a lance in the arm-rack, an old round shield, a bony and buck-set horse, and a lean greyhound. He had served his country by sea and by land, and talked often and with enthusiasm of his campaigns; but as he well knew the frightful cost of military duty, he sent his son to Madrid, to pursue there the studies necessary to prepare him for the more peaceful honours of the church. Don Miguel, however, after making considerable progress in his studies, renounced the pretensions and bishoprics which his family had dreamt of for him, and resolved upon trying his fortune in the thorny paths of literature. In fact, he had made acquaintances among the students of the capital, and become a frequenter of taverns, where his wit and humour were a hindrance, and he was easily converted to the opinion of his associates, that he possessed those qualities in an uncommon degree, and of the highest order. Thus it was that he conceived the idea of becoming a poet, and living upon the productions of his intellect, though he was unconscious at that time of the genius which he really possessed, and which revealed itself at a later period of his life.

Having taken this resolve, as it was necessary for him to eat and drink, he did not allow his pen to remain idle; but instead of making use of his own ideas, he employed those of others, after the example of his poetising companions. During two or three years he continued to produce rhymes resembling all the verse of that period of Spanish literature, mediocre as regards the style, and without any pretensions to originality of ideas. They brought him little else than compliments, that old currency which, worn as it is, always has for young poets the same sound and the same value as new pieces of gold. Always confident in the promises of his muse, but always ignorant of the side on which she called, he published, in 1569, a work on which he expected to establish his future renown as an author. It was a pastoral tale, entitled "Philene," in which he was no more successful than in verse, for it was as insipid, as improbable, and as wearisome as anything of the kind that ever emanated from the press.

Disappointed in the hopes with which he had embarked on a literary career, young Cervantes resolved to try the army. Destitute of all, yet doubting nothing, except the good taste of the Spanish public, full of illusions, loyalty, and courage, he left Madrid one fine morning, and returned to the paternal mansion, where he acquainted his father with his new views and hopes. The good hidalgo, with whom he remained some days, advised him to renounce his project, and seek employment at court. Finding, however, that Don Miguel was little disposed to listen to this advice, the old man saddled his lean Rosinante with a sigh, and gave the animal to the young adventurer. It was, alas! with his blessing, all that he had to give. Miguel mounted, bade his father adieu, and set out for Italy.

What golden dreams he indulged in on the road! He was assuredly now on the track of fortune. Italy was in arms; there was war also in Germany and France. Armies must need officers; the officers would require commanders. What an illimitable vista was opened to his ambition! Alas, for the bright beams of youth, the golden exhalations of the dawn of life! When he arrived in Italy, a truce had just been proclaimed, and the services of Don Miguel Cervantes de Saavedra were not required. It was a sad awakening from his glowing dreams to twilight from his horse, and he became, like Gil Blas, val de charbon to a bishop, the cardinal Acquaviva; but such, in fact, was the only employment he could obtain.

In the following year, however, the war broke out again, and with more fury than before; and Cervantes threw off the livery of the cardinal, and enrolled himself under the banner of Marco Antonio Padovano, Duke of Palliano, who commanded the troops of the Venetian republic. His first campaign was an unfortunate one. His regiment was sent to the relief of the island of Cyprus, then besieged by the Turks. The island was taken, the inhabitants were nearly exterminated, and the ship which carried Cervantes and his companions in arms narrowly escaped being captured by the fleet of the victorious Ottomans.

The vessel was then ordered to Legonia, and in the terrible engagement off that place Cervantes greatly distinguished himself. Unfortunately, he received a shot wound in his left arm, which crippled that member for the rest of his days. But as he did not need his left hand to hold his sword, this accident did not prevent him from continuing in the service, and he served against the Turks in the Morea until 1575, but without obtaining any solid advantage in return for the almost daily risk of life and limb. The hollow glory was his sole reward.

He now resolved to return to his native country, and embarked on board a galley for that purpose. After all, though he had not become a captain, he had lost the use of his left arm, and this would qualify him to wear his hat jauntily on one side, and raise his voice in the taverns when he talked of battles, and the dangers he had encountered by flood and field.

But, as that admirer of proverbial philosophy, Sancho Panza, was afterwards made to observe, "one misfortune never comes alone;" the galley in which he had embarked was captured by a corsair, and Cervantes, instead of returning to Madrid to tell long-winded stories of his exploits in the Morea, was carried into Algiers, and sold into slavery.

His first master was a Venetian renegade, called Hassan, who had become commander of the militia. This advancement, which had given him an authority of which few persons knew exactly the limits, caused him to be regarded with much fear, a feeling which was not, however, shared by our adventurer. It appears, on the contrary, that Cervantes inspired the renegade with a certain respect which does credit to his mental perception. Don Miguel had expected to be impaled for the feats of valour he had performed in the conflict which occurred before the corsairs became masters of his destiny, and was surprised to find that Hassan did not give him so much as a single blow, or even a hard word. The renegade was contented with exercising over him a surveillance which forbade every hope of escape.

Instead of being disheartened, Cervantes became more daring. Guarded by night and by day, and in a foreign country, escape was almost impossible; but Cervantes made several bold attempts, and even planned an insurrection of the slaves. All his schemes failed, however, and five years were passed in servitude and chains. In 1580 he was ransomed by the Fathers of Mercy, established at Algiers for the purpose of manumitting Christian slaves to the extent of their funds, and obtained a passage to his native country.

When he returned to Spain he was thirty-four years of age. His father was dead, and his cousin had sold the greater part of his little patrimony in order to effect his ransom from slavery. Being destitute of resources, he joined an expedition which was then preparing for the Azores, and was engaged in that and other expeditions four years. On again returning to Spain in 1584, he became enamoured of a young lady of noble birth, but as poor as himself, Donna Catharina Salazar y Palacios de Espinosa; and under the influence of this passion he resumed his pen, and wrote a pastoral tale in prose and verse, entitled "Goldoni," in which he has introduced himself and the object of his attachment, as a shepherd and shepherdess, by the names of Elvira and Galatea. The liberty of our waters washed the Italy, and promised him, if a life of domestic felicity and literary ease, for he was not yet weary of the illusions which make up the life of the enthusiastic, the disappointment consequent upon whose awakening is always in proportion to the brightness of their anticipations.

Disillusion came as before; his marriage had been, to speak like Sancho Panza once more, the union of hunger and thirst, and did not bring him the happiness he had anticipated. He continued to write, not for pleasure or for fame, but to obtain bread. The soil, not by his muse, but by hunger and his creditors, he made thirty plays, which, he has assured us, were acted at Madrid with great success; but, judging of them by the two which alone have come down to us, we can only credit the assertion of our contemporary Madridians of that day were very considerably overvalued by the taste. It is certain that his success as a dramatic writer, whether real or pretended, did not prevent him from being very poor; and, in 1588, he solicited and obtained the insignificant office of assistant purveyor to the Indian fleets. He endeavoured to obtain some appointment in America, but without success; and in 1596 the purveyorship was abolished, and he was again thrown upon his own resources.

He appears, for some years subsequently to this period, to have lived a very unsettled and precarious life, wandering with his wife from town to town; sometimes employed in the capacity of agent to various municipalities and wealthy individuals, but always in him as being employed at this time as tithe-collector in the province of La Mancha, and as being arrested by the alcalde of Argamasilla, and kept some time in prison, when he is supposed to have commenced "Don Quixote." The truthfulness with which he has described the scenery of La Mancha, and the manners and customs of the people, show that he must have passed some time in that province, and give a colour to these suppositions; but Navarrete, who has spared no trouble in investigating the most minute incidents of the life of Cervantes, has demonstrated that the story of his imprisonment rests on no other foundation than a vague tradition.

necessitous circumstances. Two burlesque sonnets are all that remain of his literary productions of this period, which, probably, were not numerous. Perhaps we have in these two poems all that he wrote between his cessation from dramatic writing and the appearance of "Don Quixote."

The obscurity of his pursuits at this period is evidenced by the fact, that nothing is really known of the manner in which he lived, and in what corner of Spain he concealed his misery, from the time of his leaving Seville, in 1598, till we find him, four years later, living at Valladolid. Some authors, who have supplied from their own imaginations the gaps in his life's history, have represented

The first part of his renowned romance appeared in 1604, and was dedicated to the Duke of Bejar. Of all the works of Cervantes, "Don Quixote" is the only one worthy of preservation; but this is a masterpiece, and perhaps the most original, the most amusing, and the most profound that exists in any language. Without being superior to Molière, Le Sage, Shakspeare, and the other great painters of humanity whose works we admire, Cervantes has placed mankind in a broader point of view. His characters, extravagant as they are, resemble a greater number than those which we see on the stage or meet with in other novels. Harpagon, Tartuffe, Lovelace, do not represent varieties of the human species so numerous as those of which the knight of La Mancha and his trusty squire may be accepted as the types. All the world are not, thank Heaven! misers, hypocrites, or libertines; but who among us does not carry in himself his Don Quixote and his Sancho Panza? Who among us has not combated more than once in his life with windmills? Who among us has not run himself out of breath after that marvellous island which drew Sancho Panza in the footsteps of the cavalier? So much courage wasted, so many sword-thrusts in water, the hope which survives so many deceptions, and those charming conversations of the simple hidalgo with his worldly-minded squire—are not all these typical of what passes in the lives of all of us?

The gradual disenchantment of Cervantes from the illusions of his youth, had revealed to him the strength and scope of his genius. He no longer saw life through a rose-coloured medium, but in its reality. The tales of chivalry which had excited his enthusiasm in who, mounted on his ass, trots behind the knight, like tardy experience, always coming when the evil is done.

These two persons, Don Quixote and Sancho, are inseparable; they are soul and body, sun and shadow. One represents all that is lofty and generous in human nature, the other all that is grovelling and selfish. Give to Don Quixote a little of the hard common sense of his squire, or to Sancho a little of his master's heroism and loyalty, and of the two madmen you will have made a sage. But the elements of the two characters are seldom found in combination; imagination and common sense are qualities which possess little accordancy or power of cohesion. Prudence and experience are the cold currents which temper the generous ardour of enthusiasm and philanthropy, and give the individual the hardness of character which marks the man of the world.

"Don Quixote" made no sensation on its first appearance; it attracted, in fact, scarcely any notice. He continued to live, poor his youth now only called up a smile. Chivalry had gone out of Spain with the Moors, and in the rest of Europe only a vague souvenir of its former existence remained. Cervantes demonstrated that the institution was long dead, by resuscitating one of the knights-errant of old, and bringing him into ludicrous juxtaposition with modern manners, institutions, and modes of thought. His first intention was probably to parody the wild and incredible stories which were then current in Spain; but the character of Don Quixote was such a happy conception that he found it difficult to take leave of him; for the first and only time in his life, he was veritably inspired; he had created his hero himself, and found a subject in which he could resume the experience of his own life, his dreams of glory, his dreams of love, and all the rude lessons which dissipated his illusions. He conducts us through the history of the honest hidalgo, who squanders his substance in running after the shadow, glory, and gets only hard blows; and introduces to us Sancho Panza, who is common sense by the side of imagination, and and forgotten, at Valladolid, awaiting to some of his biographers, at Toledo, subsisting on the bounty of his patrons, the chief of whom at this time was the Count of Lemos. He was obliged, in order to obtain readers, to publish an anonymous pamphlet, in which he pretended that the work was, under the veil of an allegory, a satire on the reigning monarch, Philip III., and the principal persons about the court. The opus succeeded; the work was read at court, and in a short time the whole of the edition was sold. A second, a third, and a fourth were demanded within the year in which it first appeared; but from two of these, printed at Valencia and Lisbon, it is probable that the author derived no profit. Our second illustration represents Cervantes receiving the welcome intelligence of the success of his stratagem to obtain popularity from his patron, the Count of Lemos. The poor author is sitting upon his bed, perhaps because the state of his wardrobe would not permit him to rise, and has been interrupted in his task of writing the second part of "Don Quixote." His wife stands near the head of the humble couch, and the plumed hat, boarding-axe, and stiletto of the hero of Lepanto are suspended against the whitewashed wall as memorials of his military exploits.

According to some accounts, Philip III. was so much pleased with this work that he wished to see the author, who was introduced to him by the Count of Lemos. Be this as it may, he was shortly after engaged by the Duke of Lerma, that monarch's minister, to write an account of the festivities, bull-fights, religious ceremonies, etc., with which the British ambassador, Lord Howard, was entertained at Valladolid in 1605. In the following year he took up his abode in Madrid, and continued to reside there to the end of his life. In 1613, he published a collection of "Employment Tales," which are not only interesting and amusing, but have not the least taint of immorality, by which so much of the similar literature of that period is infected. The tales are twelve in number, and added greatly to the literary reputation of their author. In the following year his "Journey to Parnassus" appeared, a satire on the bad poets of the period, who were much offended by the publication, and one of whom published a continuation of the adventures of "Don Quixote," full of abuse of the author. The response of Cervantes to this attack was the publication of the second part of "Don Quixote," which shone in bright contrast to the miserable production of his traducer.

The other works of Cervantes are a collection of comedies and interludes, written in the new style of dramatic writing introduced by Lopez de Vega, published in 1615, but never acted; and a novel, entitled "Persiles and Sigismunda," the least successful of his works, and written in a different style from any of them.

Cervantes died on the same day as Shakspeare, the 23rd of April, 1616, being then in his sixty-ninth year. He was buried without the east display in the convent of the Holy Trinity, at Madrid, in which his daughter Isabella had taken the veil four years previously. Some years afterwards the nuns removed to another convent, and the old one being pulled down, the remains of Cervantes were lost.

His fame spread rapidly throughout Europe, and the universality of his genius is proved by the many languages into which his great work has been translated, and the number of editions it has gone through. With the exception of "Robinson Crusoe," there is no work of fiction, the popularity of which can be brought into comparison with that of "Don Quixote." In Spain, however, a long period elapsed before the work was so extensively read and appreciated as it has been in other countries. But its popularity has increased rapidly since the commencement of the last century, and within the last few years, two monuments have been erected in Madrid to the memory of its author: one, a handsome bronze statue, which stands in the Plaza de las Cortes, on a pedestal of granite, ornamented with bas-reliefs representing subjects taken from "Don Quixote"; the other, the bust of Cervantes in white marble, placed over the door of the house in the Calle de Francos, in which he lived and died.

RELIGIOUS SECTS IN RUSSIA.

THOUGH there has never been any large secession from the established Greek church, there are in Russia a considerable number of dissenting sects, the members of which are called generally Raskolniks, from the Russian verb raskolat, "to split." The only considerable schism which we find on record is that which arose out of the emendation of the corrupted text of the Slavonic version of the Scriptures in the middle of the seventeenth century. During the period of the Tartar domination, which greatly retarded the cultivation of learning, the text of the Scriptures became corrupted by omissions and interpolations, arising generally from the ignorance of those by whom they were transcribed. The propriety of obtaining a correct version was acknowledged on several occasions, and an attempt was made to remedy the evil, in the middle of the sixteenth century, by comparing the version in use with the Greek text, by a monk of the convent of Mount Athos; but he encountered so much opposition from the ignorant and bigoted clergy of Russia, that nothing was done until more than a century afterwards. In 1651 a council was assembled at Moscow, presided over by Nicen, the patriarch of that city, which decided unanimously on the propriety of revising the corrupt text of the sacred books. This decision was approved by the patriarch of Constantinople, and the reigning czar, Alexis Michaelovitch, ordered the version of the Scriptures used by the churches of Greece and the East to be substituted for the corrupted version hitherto in use.

The bishop of Kolomna protested against the alteration as an heretical innovation, and was supported by a number of the inferior clergy, as well as of the lower classes of the people, all of whom were extremely ignorant. The strenuous opposition of the bishop and the schismatic clergy to the introduction of the new liturgy caused the former to be deprived of his dignity, and confined in a monastery, in a remote part of the empire, where he died. His followers regarded him as a martyr, and increased rapidly, especially in the northern provinces. The consequence was a terrible persecution, during which many of the opponents of the Niconian heresy, as the revision of the Scriptures was termed, were put to death. Some fled into Poland, and others into Bulgaria, where, under the protection of the Porte, they were secure from molestation. Many shut themselves up in their churches, and setting fire to them, suffered a horrible death, finally believing that the baptism of fire would suffice to secure their salvation, and that their souls would immediately rise to heaven in the form of doves. A remnant shut themselves up in the fortified monastery of Solovetzki, situated on an island in the White Sea, where they defended themselves with the most dauntless courage against the troops sent to dislodge them, and prolonged their resistance for seven years. The place was at length taken by storm, and the defenders were all either put to the sword or perished in the flames by which their stronghold was destroyed.

A great number of the rising generation had imbibed the hostility of their parents to the new version of the Scriptures, and the severe persecution to which they were subjected in the following reign did not abate their opposition to it. In the beginning of the reign of Peter the Great, the harshness of their treatment provoked a dangerous tumult in Moscow, which led to a ukase granting toleration to the sectaries, but imposing a tax upon them, and requiring the to wear a copper medal stamped with a beard.

Though the terms Raskolniks, or dis-centers, and Starovertzoe, which signifies "those of the old faith," are in general applied indiscriminately to all who dissent from the established church of Russia, there are some considerable differences among them, both as regards doctrines, rites, and discipline. They may all be classed under two heads—the Popovosheheena, or those who have priests, and the Bespovosheheena, or those who have no priests; the latter division comprehending a great variety of sects having nothing in common except the peculiarity which separates them from the former.

The Popovosheheena approach nearest in doctrines and ceremonies to the established church, from which they differ on no essential point, notwithstanding the tenacity with which they adhere to their own notions. They use the old version of the Scriptures, and differ from the church as to the form of the cross. They repeat the "Hallelujah" only twice, instead of three times, adding, "Praised be the Lord;" and use two fingers, instead of three, in making the sign of the cross. They also differ from the church in beginning their processions from the left, instead of the right. Shaving the beard is regarded as a deadly sin, in which opinion they are supported by the declaration of the general synod held at Moscow in 1551, which denounced shaving the beard as the "most damnable and criminal of the heresies which are punishable by excommunication." The eating of hares and sausages, likewise prohibited by the synod of Moscow, and the use of tobacco and snuff, are also regarded by them as unlawful. They admit the ordination of the priests of the established church to be valid, although performed by heretical bishops, because it descends in uninterrupted succession from the times of "the true church," viz. before the revision of the Scriptures. They therefore admit among them priests who have been expelled from the established church for misconduct or heresy, without requiring them to be re-ordained.

The most important of the more heterodox sects, or those which have no priests, is that of the Pomoranes, which signifies "the inhabitants of the seacoasts," so called because it originated on the shores of the White Sea. These maintain that all ordinations of priests of the established church since the time of the patriarch Nikon are invalid; that the administration of religious rites by them is a profanation; and that their churches are the abodes of Anti-Christ, whose reign has already commenced in spirit, though he is himself invisible. As a necessity arising out of the two former articles of their faith, they rebaptize all who join their communion, and also dissolve the marriages of such as have contracted matrimony. The couples thus dissolved may be married again by those who officiate as ministers of religion in the sect. They confer one another the sacrament of the Lord's supper to themselves, and assemble for prayer in private houses. Their ministers are not ordained, and may follow any other vocation when they please, which is not allowed to the priests of the established church. The sacramental bread which they use, is said to be derived from some consecrated loaves saved from the monastery of S. David when it was stormed by the imperial troops, which has been preserved and multiplied by working fragments of it into each successive dough. The bread thus prepared is considered as holy as the original, and every member of the sect is always provided with a crumb of it, that he may be able to administer the sacrament to himself in case of emergency. There are several subdivisions of this sect, the principal of which are the Theodosians and the Philipians, which are named after their respective founders, both of whom had been priests of the established church. The points of difference between them are very trifling, and relate merely to external forms of worship; but they are characterised by the wildest fanaticism, which manifests itself in the frequent suicides among them, these ignorant and misled people believing that self-murder is pleasing to God, and that by it they obtain admission into heaven.

The Doobhorotzy, or "Bomohorotzy in spirit," first became known as a sect in the reign of the empress Anne, who appointed commissioners to inquire into their tenets. There are many points of resemblance between them and the Quakers and Moravians, and it is very probable that they are a branch of the latter sect. Like them they never take an oath, and are opposed to war. They entertain Unitarian opinions, and admit only the New Testament. They have neither churches nor pastors, and in their devotions use only the Lord's Prayer. In the reign of Catherine II. and Paul they were much persecuted, but bore every oppression with the same resignation as the followers of George Fox. Alexander ordered them toleration, and offered them waste lands in the south of Russia, which they have colonised and cultivated. Their settlements still flourish, and travellers have spoken highly of their industrious and frugal habits, and the simplicity and inoffensiveness of their manners.

The Chovstomniki, or "Sentimentalists," are a sect founded by a monk named Bonifati, and very latitudinarian in their doctrines, which incline to deism. There is some confusion in the accounts respecting them, but it seems that they use the unreviled Scriptures and do not require those who join them to be rebaptised. The cause of the difference in the accounts given of them by different writers appears to be that there are many shades of belief among them, some deriving little from the Popeworth heath, and others being Unitarians.

The Capitulars were also founded by a monk. Like the Pomorans, they have no churches, but assemble for prayer and the celebration of their religious rites in private houses. They also dissolve the marriages of those who join them, and are obliged to live in a state of great licentiousness. They have no public prayer, which seems to be performed among them as the administration of the communion. A girl prays on her knees, clothed with raisins, which, after several prayers and prostrations, she distributes among the assembled votaries.

The Shekolniki, or "Chinkians," form a sect, who, according to the Cossacks of the Don, and derive their name from the custom of kneeling when they pray, before a drink, through which a ray of light enters. They reject images, and never go to church, saying that God is omnipresent, and does not dwell in houses built by man. They use the revised version of the Scriptures, in which they differ from every other dissenting sect in the empire.

All the preceding sects are confined, for the most part, to the labouring classes, and seem to be on the increase, which is probably owing, in a great measure, to their zeal for making proselytes. Most of them display much hostility towards the established church, and an equal amount of unity and kindness of feeling within their respective communions. Although they are no longer persecuted, they are only tolerated; they have no record of existence, nor are their ministers and priests regarded as such by the government.

THE ABBEY OF ST. BAVO.

THE ABBEY OF ST. BAVON, AND CRYPT OF ST. MARY, AT GHENT.

St. AMAND, one of the first missionaries of the Christian faith in Flanders, founded, about the year 631, a chapel and a cloister, the former dedicated to St. Mary, and the latter to St. Peter, at the confluence of the rivers Scheldt and Lys, on the site of a fortress or intrenched camp which the old chroniclers call Castrum Gandarum. According to some authors, this castrum was a work of the Romans, others suppose it to have been constructed by the Normans during one of their earliest incursions into Gaul. Such portions of this fortress as were in good preservation were retained by St. Amand, and served in part for the foundations of his chapel and cloister; they still exist, and distinct traces may be observed of the kind of masonry known as herring-bone work, the chief characteristic of which is, that on each row of stones arranged obliquely from left to right, another row is placed leaning obliquely from right to left.

Allovin Bayon, prince of Hesbaya, having been converted from paganism by St. Amand, retired into the seclusion of the Abbey of St. Peter, and died in the odour of sanctity, in a cell which he had constructed near the cloisters. His beatification took place in 680, under Abbot Wilfred; the proclamation was made by St. Eby, bishop of Noyon, and on this occasion the dedication of the abbey was changed from St. Peter to St. Bavon. The crypt of St. Mary, according to the most reliable accounts, was constructed in the time of Arnold the Great, count of Flanders, on the site of the chapel erected by St. Amand among the ruins of the Castrum Gandarum. This crypt, which is only in part subterranean, appears to have been restored about 1148, at which time it was newly consecrated by Anselm, bishop of Tournay. In it was interred St. Macaire, archbishop of Antioch, who died of the plague in the Abbey of St. Bavon, and was the last victim of the pitiless scourge which desolated Ghent in 1012. In 1177 the body of the archbishop was transferred to the sanctuary, where the holy relics were deposited; and in 1179 it was again removed, and placed in a special chapel, constructed above the lavatory, and consecrated to St. Macaire by Everard, bishop of Tournay.

The remains of the abbey and crypt are considerable; the walls are partly mantled with ivy, and bear evidence of their great antiquity. Shrubs and flowering plants grow profusely among the ruins, and broken columns and sculptured monuments meet the eye at every turn. A picture by Rubens, representing the reception of St. Bavon into the abbey, after having distributed all his worldly goods among the poor, adorns one of the numerous chapels of the cathedral of Ghent, which was originally dedicated to St. John, but took the name of St. Bavon in 1540, when Charles V. caused the collegiate chapter of the Abbey of St. Bavon to be removed to it. The picture was carried off by the French during their occupation of Belgium, but was restored in 1817.

SUPERSTITIONS CONNECTED WITH GEMS.

II.

The vulgar sigels and magic rings, with which the superstition of poverty sought to protect itself, made as distinct a branch of traffic from that of the dealers in precious stones and costly pearls, as exists at the present day between those of the rich goldsmith who supplies the jewelled altar-plate, and the purveyor of waxen saints and wooden rosaries for the use of the Roman Catholic church.

Fragments of agate, amber, cornelian, and jasper, rough and unpolished, or rudely carved into the shape of beetles, animals, eyes, fingers, or other parts of the body, and suspended about the person, or strung into a necklace, served as a charm, and were probably to be bought at the shops of such tradesmen as Eulamius (in Aristophanes), or Phertatus (in Antiphones), who grew rich by the sale of rings, supposed to possess magic qualities, at the low price of one drachma (about twopenny) each.

A jeweller of those antique times must have known more of the predilections, the mental fears, the prevailing passions or unbreathed aspirations of his customers, from their purchases, than a priest knows of the consciences of his flock through the confessional.

Doubtless the veil or lappet of the toga did the same service on some of these occasions as the mask and cloak performed in the conferences of the metallurgists and necromancers with their dupes in later times; but under any circumstances, a wide field was open to them for the knowledge and study of human nature and its varied idiosyncracies.

From the amulet of amber beads to hang about the neck of the heir, as a singular preservation against secret poison or sorcery—for those were times in which changelings crept into cradles, and the glance of an evil eye had power to blight young babes—to the subtle opal, which Nares tells us, wrapped in a bay-leaf, rendered the wearer invisible, and was such a spell as the midnight assassin, the coward thief, or jealous tyrant, would crave; as well as the black agate or sacred jasper, that went down into the grave to ward off evil spirits from a corpse—our jeweller possessed them all. From the moment, therefore, that the child of a rich man was born, till the gloomy funeral flames closed over his remains in deceased manhood, he became in some sort the client of these dealers in sacred gems and magical or medicated jewellery.

The nurse—for nurses were expected to have a perfect knowledge of amulets, and to know what would best shield their infant charges from the jealousy of treacherous relations, witchcraft, and venomous animals—doubtless recommended a collar of amber or malachite, either of which was supposed to possess a natural virtue to preserve young children. Not that the use of amber necklaces was confined to infancy. The country dames of Lombardy and the adjacent parts wore coronets of it, partly to adorn themselves, and in some sort for health; for it was said to be of great use in bronchial affections, and had very anciently been esteemed for its medicinal qualities. Great quantities of it were brought to Rome during the reign of Nero, who, having made a sonnet in praise of the hair of Poppo, which he compared to amber, caused it to be more than ever in vogue amongst the ladies of the imperial city, who made use of it as a gem. Callistratus has recorded that necklaces of amber are good against frenzy and faustical illusions; and our jeweller (if he had not discovered to the contrary) very possibly believed, with Pliny, that it detected false gems.

Pearls are another branch of our subject which were very important to infancy, whenever nature was tardy in providing its sustenance. Outwardly applied, in the shape of a ring, or bracelet, or monile, the usual forms in which the Roman women wore their amulets, they had power to fortify the mother's heart and raise her spirits; and a confetion of pearl powder never failed to produce an abundant supply for her offspring.

Engendered, according to the poetical theory of Isidore, of the dews of heaven, pearls were especially dedicated to Venus, to whom, we may remember, after his conquest of our island, Julius Cæsar offered a votive shield emblazoned with British pearls. Both Aristotle and Plato insist on their restorative and comforting qualities, and the latter adds that they are food for man, to which old Gerard Leigh, whom we have already quoted, gravely subjects that this is verified by Josephus, "who sheweth that, when Jerusalem was besieged by Titus Vespasian, the Jews lived long, having nothing to eat but pearls." Probably because sacred to Venus, pearls were believed to have the gift of imparting beauty, and were much coveted by the Roman women; and as gems were in England objects of great superstition, as late as the reign of Elizabeth, it is not unlikely that some shadow of this faith mingled with this royal lady's abundant and constant use of them. When we recollect that a place was created at court (that of master of the gloves) to mark her majesty's favour of Dr. Dee, whose magic crystal, there is little doubt, the greatest of the Tudors had many times consulted, and remember also the agate ring which the Lord Chancellor Hatton sent to her, to be worn in her sweet breast against infectious air, we may presume, without much heresy, that a shade of classic superstition blended itself with her majesty's exuberant partiality for pearls.

Agates, by the way, were anciently esteemed most potent in magic properties; the little handkerchiefs that are sometimes to be traced in them seemed too miraculous for anything short of supernatural agency, and accordingly every description of this stone was accounted sacred and holy. The Persians supposed that a perfume of it could calm the tempest, and stay the violent streams and rage of rivers; but, in order to insure these effects, it was essential that it should be worn tied with the hairs of a lion's mane.

It is held for a truth, says Pliny, that only to look upon an agate is very comfortable for the eye; and in Eastern lands the possession of one must have been as good as a water-gourd to the sun-parched traveller, for we are told that, held in the mouth, it quenched and allayed thirst.

The agate was one of the precious stones of which the Sidrophels formed their seals, which not only averted accidents and cured diseases, but destroyed the power of the evil eye and overcame witchcraft. Only such as were marked with a hyena's skin, Pliny tells us, the magicians could not abide, as they always caused discord in a house. Agates of a simple blue rendered wrestlers who possessed them invincible, and hence, no doubt, formed part of the necklaces worn by athletes (according to the Scholiast on Juvenal) to insure them victory: a practice, the tradition of which may be traced in a custom of the middle ages, of which Douglade tells us—namely, that in all legal single combats it was part of the champion's oath that he carried not about him any herb, spell, or enchantment, by which he might procure the victory.

It is curious, in reference to agate, that at Paris none have a right to trade in it, save wholesale merchants and goldsmiths. Sword-cutlers may sell it, but only when made into handles for couteaux de chasse, and ready set; and the same privilege is extended to the cutlers for their knives and forks.

Another stone, which in some degree partook of the virtues of the agate, was the jacinth, or iacinth. Like that, it gave strength, and defended from pestilential air; but it did more—it put away sorrow and increased mirth. Oh! why cannot faith in better things do us much for us? There was another spell also proper to the jacinth, which must have made it the only "read blessing" of the day to mothers and the sick. It promoted sleep; and so thoroughly was this property believed in, that not a century ago apothecaries were supposed to keep a cordial and confection of it in their shops.

The topaz, glowing like a bit of imprisoned sunshine, was another talismanic gem of wondrous power, and according to Dioscorides possessed even more sedative qualities than the precious jacinth: it calmed wrath as well as sorrow, of which this last is so often a consequence; it was good against melancholy, and put away evil thoughts and bad dreams; it helped the bearer against frenzy and sudden death; and for its worthiness, observes our quaint friend, Gerard Leigh, was set in the breast-plate of Aaron!

Like the cornelian, the sapphir should have been a household gem, for it had the lovely property of reconciling people at strife; but it held too high a price in those magnificent porticoes of old Rome, wherein the jewellers and those who dealt in the most precious wares took up their standings, and was more used as a medical than as a domestic talisman; bound to the pulse it abated the heat of fever, helped to drive away melancholy, and stayed the bleeding heart that coughs of anguish. Hunters probably wore it, just as warriors did the beryl, for while this excited courage even in the timid, and kept the warrior from falling into indiscussible of enemies, the former lightened the body, and preserved the limbs, and being especially hallowed to Apollo, strengthened and preserved the sight. It was also regarded as a remedy against venom and poison, catastrophes which the ancients appear to have been in constant fear of.

The ruby, as an amulet, must have been rather a questionable combat, for while revelling in many imaginary excellences, hot blood, troubled sleep, and a temper easily roused, appear to have attended the wearer. It is true that if being "forewarned is being forearmed," he had greatly the advantage of his neighbours, for the gem was said to change colour and become obscured when any danger threatened him, and to recover its brilliancy when the peril had passed away. In times of pestilence, also, the carbuncle or ruby was esteemed a singular preservative against infection and sickness, and trusting to the doctrine of ions many wore them with this intention so late as the period of the great plague in London.

Another gem, famous in ancient time for its presumed power in relation to man, was the sacred amethyst of Bacchanalian memory, whether so called because its fine purple colour resembled the dark grape, or because it gleams in the sun like the hue of wine mixed with water, or from the prevailing supposition that it prevented drunkenness, we know not; but this we know, that it occupied the ninth place on the pectoral of the Jewish high-priest; and that Pliny says of it, that if the name of the sun and moon be graven on it, and so worn about the neck, either hanging therefrom with the hairs of a cynocephalus's head or swallows' feathers, it is a sovereign remedy against charms and poisons.

Rings of its deep violet colour flashed on the fingers of the bona vacants, who perhaps shared with Horace and the wanton Lyde, the full cups of that cask that bore its date from the consulship of Bibulus, and which he breached in honour of the feast of Neptune. Or perchance hung insculp'd with a Bacchus or Silenus (a secret charm against is potency) upon the breasts of those al fresco painters, those fast gentlemen of ancient Rome, who preferred the green sward, under a plane-tree's shade, to the domestic tribulation, while some singing girl stood by to entertain them and a slave cooled their cups of Verdant Falernian in the passing stream. Certain it is, that with the classical nations, it was customary for great drinkers to wear an amethyst about the neck as a charm against drunkenness. But this was not the only virtue of the gem; like the emerald it had power over the elements, and averted hail-storms and tempestuous weather, and as it was said 'to cause a man to have good forecast, a quick mind, to remove idle thoughts, and increase the understanding,' it is easy to perceive why it should be supposed a countercharm to an excess, which robs him of them all.

Those were times when people suffering from diseases of the skin wore red jaspers graven with Marsyas, and when merchants and sea-captains felt all the safer with their lives and merchandise for the possession of a Neptune carved in aqua marine! In those days, also, when the Roman matron (thanks to Venus and her pearls) rose up looking fairer and fresher than before, and saw her boy thrive till his amulet of amber-heads was put aside for the holla aurea, at once the sign of his rank and the seal of supernatural protection; when anything had happened to disturb the serenity of her lord the senator's temper, and he returned from the Torum Romanum or the Senate, weary, heated, and angry, ready to find fault even with his little son (and what mother could see this and not resort to it), perchance when some good angel—though she would call it her good genius—suggested patience for love and peace sake, instead of uttering the reproaches that rose to her lips, Maria, or Julia, sought the jewel-merchants in the portico Argyrotaria, and after a little inward debate between the virtues of cornelian and the potent sapphir, ordered an agate of Crete (which rendered the wearer eloquent, proud, amiable, and agreeable), to be forthwith graven with a figure of Harpocrates and set in a ring, so that it might remind her to keep silence, save when the spells of the agate were upon her. Rings so graven were worn by the Roman women when Pliny wrote; and we can fancy that some such gracious myth was involved in the usage.

The sardon, or sardonyx, so frequently mentioned in Scripture, was another precious stone on the excellence of which great stress was laid by the old naturalists and medical empirics, who sold it as a charm to render men discreet in their valour, "not hasty in battle, but victors!" Jodire affirms that it hath "most pure virtue;" and our Lordlie authority, Leigh, adds that St. John says of this gem, that the sardonix shall be the sixth stone of the foundation of the heavenly Jerusalem; "in which city," he exclaims, "I pray God that I may be persuisant!"

The opal was another very precious stone with the dealers in amulets and talismans; because, partaking of the colour of every other gem, it was supposed to possess all their virtues; and so firmly was this superstition rooted, that we find a Roman senator named Norminus, preferring banishment to the giving up of a favourite opal which Mark Antony was desirous of possessing. In its presence the witch muttered her incantations in vain; it subbut all less potent spells in the hands of the enchanter; it could wear a to walk safely in the midst of pestilence, and resist the venom of poisonous beasts, which, in those days, resorted to the natural historians and herbaldists, must have abounded in cities and towns rather more numerous than in the Asiatic deserts and forests. We find scarcely a page of any old writer on these subjects in which their malignant wounds are not referred to, and charms and nostrums for the cure of them propounded, till one would imagine deadly serpents common as frogs in the Pontine Marshes, and scorpions numerous as flies. In all these fabled virtues of the opal no doubt Nechims was a believer; it is even possible that his credulity went the length of investing it with the property, which Nares so gravely assumes for it, and imagined that by wrapping it in the leaves of the tree sacred to Apollo, he could conceal himself in what nobody calls the ardentest of all colours ("for darkness was before the light"); and it is not less probable, from the fact of his coveting possession of it, and the unscrupulous way in which he avowed his appointment, that Mark Antony shared in the same folly. But, as we before said, these superstitions were by no means confined to particular countries or times; the fact of their existence is not more curious than the universality of faith in them, which appears to have spread over the remotest parts of the world, and to have existed full-grown at the earliest period of written history.

It followed the same path by which the arts and sciences arrived in Europe; it was, in some sort, the handmaid to them of the lapidary and graver, and led the way to the exquisite handiworks of the goldsmith and jeweller. The stringing together of bits of precious stones by way of amulet, resulted in the elegant necklace of gems; and the wearing of charms bound on the wrists and arms, in the manufacture of bracelets and amulets, which were first used by the people of Eastern nations to hold these talismans. It is curious that the serpent-form of bracelet, so fashionable in the present age, and the same mixed with the tail of a Rocco, being entirely devoid of any magical power, should have been the first of its kind, and that the serpent was a more efficacious charm to protect the eyelids.

From the period of Pliny's death, the early dawn of the early British empire, we have not a single instance of any talismanic or magical virtue of the opal; but in the early centuries of precious stones as soils to protect the delicate eye, this property we find that opal-stones were chiefly used. In the 13th century, Egil-bronthe, jet, iron, lead, and white, red, and black, by the Danes, talismans in the ancient times of England, and in those of our Anglo-Saxon and Saxon times, were held in high esteem; and in the early days of Christianity, the talismanic property of them, in the jewelled gowns and mantles of the nobles, with which kings and prelates were clad by their vassals, and which, as in the dresses and other ornaments of the kings of France, were sold gratis to the living, and the talismanic property of them, in the belief of the souls' immortality in the men's, improved, indifferent to the meddling habitations it had found, in such years were no longer held in the great world off, dead and unquiescent, faith in their beneficial efficacy of the living by no means faded. On the contrary, during the Middle Ages, and for a long time after, we find all the various fabulous attributes we have enumerated transferred from the text of ancient writers to the nervous lips of the monks, and subsequently to the medical treatises of the reigns of Elizabeth and the Stuarts; while the practice of wearing them as charms and amulets, not only to cure diseases and prevent witchcraft, accidents, and sudden death, but also to bewitch the wearer with omnibifid, dissection, eloquence, invincibility, etc., was continued.

We wonder how the human mind ever gave from materials so lush and beautiful, so thick a tissue of superstition. Truly, Malvoie was not mad but over-informed with wisdom when he exclaimed, "there is no darkness but ignorance."

TOURING IN IRELAND IN 1851.

GALWAY, as we have said, is full of interest. Situated upon the finest Atlantic harbour, and connected by rail with all parts of the kingdom, it is destined to assume a proud position among the ports of the British empire. Of its history, before the arrival of the English, little is known. In 1192, the castle was built by Connor, king of Munster, and again in 1149. In the thirteenth century it was strengthened by walls and towers, and soon after the rival Limerick. In 1399 a charter was granted, and a mint established. It continued to flourish till about the close of the sixteenth century, when its trade appears to have died out. There are many points possessing peculiar attraction for the antiquarian, the historian, the politician, and the artist. Numberless old buildings to interest the first; historical associations to engage the attention of the second; monuments and passing scenes to see on the quadrant; the thinking powers of the third; and ever-changing views, at almost every street-end, to rivet the eye of the fourth. Among the few modern buildings, the most conspicuous is Queen's College, and is distinguished, among many other characteristics, by having, for its librarian the venerable James Hardiman, whose labours in familiarising the reading world with the archaeological glories of the noble old town that claims him as one of its worthiest citizens, have justly endeared him to his countrymen in particular, and to the republic of letters generally. Financially, however, not very much, what Galway evidently was. Looking out upon the Atlantic, from its harbour, a staple and still chief of the Spain, which supplied the wine the Irish lords loved, while Ireland was a principal market for warm climates and the West Indies; and a profitable trade was the consequence. Strength first offered security to merchants, and consequent wealth augmented the capacity to protect. High walls and strong gates forbade the approach of the "fiery O'Flahertys," whom the legends on their portals denounced; and the citizens, who delighted to trudge on their tails the rest of their being "real Englishmen," made a history and a passage for themselves. They often found it more expedient to buy the enemy off than fight them. Athlone, four or five miles distant, the English capital of the province, though more bold, was less fortunate; and its remarkable ruins, some of which have already been noticed in these pages, tell the story of its misdeeds and its fall, as we have seen; while Galway still flourishes, a pleasant town, and a loyal mart of trade. The impress of Spain is still upon the place, for the houses and the customs are Spanish.

It is, I would say, as the headquarters of a continuing plot of terrorism for Conamara and the wild West, that Galway peculiarly offers itself to our notice here. The first district of the province we enter upon after leaving the town is that of Conamara, and still remarkable region known as the Martin property, to which Sir Robert Peel, some seven years ago, drew attention in the House of Commons, as presenting an admirable field for commencing the experiment of really improving Ireland through the dissemination of British capital and skill systematically applied; and in the period of that speech may be dated the commencement of the Irish improvements that have since gone on in a striking manner, nowhere more than here, principally within the walls of the Earl of Seely's estate, its proprietor, Earl Charles Fitzroy Campbell, having a portion of the land under his own management, called Barra, which he divided into small farms, and sold them on a tenancy, and to the promotion of the public good, he has published information papers delivered at the time, and containing in the end of the year it might be said, a complete account of the improvements to be made on the Barra estate, and of the progress of the County Galway, from the commencement of the improvements towards the brute and the people, and the progress of the improvements, who advised that the improvements should be made in the manner which he has described.

The improvements were made in the year 1840, and of Ballinacorney, the improvements were made in the year 1841, and of all the improvements, the improvements were made in the year 1842.

preaching of the Christian faith in Ireland. Here are the remains of an oratory and of a venerable church, and here is pointed out what is credibly asserted to be the tomb of the sister of St. Patrick, who followed him from Tours, where her uncle (the celebrated Martin) held all but regal sway, and where his real or supposed miracles caused him to be regarded in his archdiocese in the light of a prophet or apostle. The remote and isolated position of this little island, and also the absence of anything to reward the spoiler for his trouble, are the principal causes to be assigned for these antiquities being allowed to remain in such a state of preservation.

The view from the remains of the bell-tower is very fine, and as we ascend, all doubt is removed as to the place being used for defence as well as monastic seclusion. A fine view is obtained from the tower. Below us, to the left, lie the snug and pretty residence of Mr. Lambert, the town of Cong and its busy mills, the wide-expanding Corrib, and the mountains of Mayo, surrounding Lough Mask.

Another focus of much legendary interest is that depicted in the annexed little sketch of the castle situate in Lough Mask, beyond Ballinacree, in the County of Mayo. The Castle of Mask is placed

Scarcely inferior in archaeological interest, and still more interesting in a public sense, as being infinitely better known to the generality of travellers and readers, is the celebrated Abbey of Cong, one of the most beautiful ruins anywhere to be met with, the sepulchre of kings, and the centre of an infinite deal of Irish celebrity of all sorts—regal, priestly and popular. How the mind is wont to travel back, as we view its mouldering remains, to the time when the portly abbot and his attendants chanted the funeral service over a departed king! The ruined entrance to the abbey is truly beautiful, as are also the two doors or archways on a bold and projecting promontory, and has the appearance of one of those castellated houses so common in Ireland in the beginning of the sixteenth century, when the residences of the great ones of the land had to combine all the conveniences and comforts of a domestic abode with a fortress. These buildings belong to a period long subsequent to the old baronial castles, and furnish a striking illustration of the insecurity of life and property, as also the formidable character of the marauders of those times. Tradition is anything but a truth-teller if the Castle of Mask did not witness dark deeds.

SCENES FROM AMERICAN HISTORY.

THE result of the war in which General Wolfe perished, left a vast amount of debt as a heavy weight upon England. By disease and by the sword the American colonies had lost about thirty thousand men, and their debt amounted to four millions of money. England was burdened with a debt of £110,000,000, and found it necessary to keep a standing army in the colonies to preserve the conquests she had won. When the noise of the fight was over, when the last report of cannon had died away, when the dead lay asleep in their graves, and the maimed had returned to their homes, when England and America had time to look at what the glorious victory had cost them, they found it had been a very expensive business, and England—very near the eye of bankruptcy—looked for over the Atlantic waves, and called to her colonial settlers for help.

Now during the war the colonial settlers had been fighting bravely. They had showed that they could handle the musket as well as men in the old country; they had become accustomed to soldiering, had begun to have a sort of liking for the trade, and as men will sometimes question great facts of the age, and glorious manifestations of absolute authority, they began to ask how it was that the mother-country should assume so vast a superiority. Their country had been turned into a military college; they knew well enough the power they held in their own hands; they were acquainted with their own resources; and when Englishmen talked of the colonists as children planted by their care, nourished by their indulgence, and protected by their arms, they were apt to retort in the language of their advocate:—"They planted by your care! No, your oppression planted them in America. They nourished by your indulgence! No, they grew up by your neglect of them. They protected by your arms! No, these sons of liberty have taken up arms in your defence." The colonists had begun to entertain such sentiments as these, and they were fast spreading. When the Americans came to the shores of the New World, they were the greater part of them republicans in feeling and in principle; the divinity that hedged a king had no sacredness in their eyes. They had indeed submitted to the rule of home, just as a son might submit to parental authority, but asserts at last the independence of manhood. This was their grand point. In early days they had been coerced and bound, but the simple growth of the giant's limbs was fast bursting the bonds, and every movement but more thoroughly proved their strength and ability.

In England it was felt that the colonies were dependent on the mother-country, and owed her implicit obedience. America was to be regulated in her laws, taxed in her commodities, restricted in her trade by a British parliament. The Navigation Act declared that, for the benefit of English shipping, no merchandise from the English colonies should be imported into England excepting by English vessels; and for the benefit of English manufacturers prohibited exportation from the colonies, and did not allow articles of domestic manufacture to be carried from one colony to another. It was rendered illegal to fell pitch or pine trees unless in enclosed lands; to erect iron works or to prepare steel; to make hats, where beavers abounded; to have more than two apprentices at one time; while sugar, rum, and molasses were subjected to exorbitant duties. In order fully to carry out these restrictions, diligent search was made, and "writs of assistance," as they were called, were issued to the Custom-house officer to examine the premises of suspected persons, for it was well enough known that the law was in very many cases evaded.

In 1764 Lord Granville proposed a new tax, by way of raising a revenue from his majesty's dominions in America. This was the Stamp Act. All pamphlets, almanacks, newspapers, bonds, notes, leases, policies of insurance, and all other legal papers, were compelled to be drawn on stamped paper, to be purchased only from the king's officers appointed for that purpose. The bill was not to be enforced for one year, in order that the feelings of the American colonists might be ascertained upon the subject; the British parliament, however, giving to the plan its entire approbation.

The colonies received the news very ungraciously, nay, with strong indignation. "If we are not represented," they said, "we are slaves." It was no use attempting to prove to them by cunningly-devised pamphlets that obedience was their first duty, and submission their grandest privilege. They stoutly denied the right of parliament to enforce taxation, they spoke out boldly; but King George, described by Charles Townshend as "a very obstinate young man," refused to listen to any appeal; the Stamp Act triumphantly passed both Commons and Lords, and Benjamin Franklin wrote to a friend in Philadelphia, saying:—"The sun of liberty is set; you must light up the candles of industry and economy;"—to which he received this most characteristic reply:—"We shall light up torches of another kind!" But against such torches King George and his ministers supposed they had provided, when they made a new clause in the mutiny act, authorising the sending of any number of troops into the colonies, to be provided by the colonies with "quarters, firewood, bedding, drink, soap, and candles."

Cadwallader Colden, a venerable man, eighty years of age, was then governor of New York, and his councillors were men of the highest character in the province. He was a liberal-minded man; but duty to his sovereign compelled him to discontinue the proceedings of the people, and his name appears in the records as the enemy of civil freedom. The "Sons of Liberty" were organised at this time throughout the colonies, and gave Colden a great deal of trouble. The newspapers spoke out in a quiet, manly strain; but as the fatal first of November approached, the day on which the Stamp Act was to come into force, both press and people became more defiant. On the 31st of October, a general meeting of the citizens was held, when two hundred merchants appended their names to resolutions condemnatory of the act; and a committee was appointed to compel James M'Evors, the appointed stamp distributor, to resign his commission. This meeting was held at the King's Arms, now No. 9, Broadway.

The stamps which had arrived on the 23rd of October had been placed for safety in Fort George, which had been strengthened and fortified against an expected attack. The guns of the fort were levelled upon the town, vessels of war prepared for action rode in the harbour, the city presented the appearance of being under siege; but, notwithstanding every preparation, the people assembled in vast multitudes, and armed with all kinds of weapons, and carrying upon poles the obnoxious act, with the inscription, "England's Folly and America's Ruin." They settled down before Fort St. George, and demanded the stamps; this demand was refused, and they then proceeded to acts of open violence. The whole city was stirred. Bearing an effigy of the governor, Colden, the rioters paraded the streets, uttering shouts of defiance. The effigy had a drum upon its back and a label on its breast, and in one hand a stamped paper—the drum was in allusion to the fact that Colden had been a drummer in the army of the Scotch Pretender—a figure of the devil being, by his side, with a book in its hand, to indicate the hatred the people felt towards the Earl of Bute. Bearing these effigies before them, the people marched to "the Fobbs," and there made merry by hanging the governor's representative; they then returned to the city, broke into the governor's house, made a bonfire of his coach, destroyed his library, furniture, garden—everything. The excitement became so great, that the authorities at length gave up the stamps to the mayor and corporation, which for the time satisfied the people. Shortly after, some stamps which were brought in a bag were disposed of in a far more summary way. Ten boxes were taken to the shipyard and burnt in a tar-barrel. Flags were hoisted half-mast high; bells were muffled and rung a funeral peal; the stamp act, with a death's head affixed, was carried through the streets; day after day the greatest excitement prevailed, not in New York alone, but all over the colonies. Public meetings were held under the shadow of "Liberty Tree." Liberty trees sprang up with marvellous rapidity; inflammatory speeches were made; inflammatory sermons preached; the front of the Stamp Act were hung in effigy; houses were burnt; prisnot take place. The affairs of the dead could not be settled. It seemed as if the old days of interdicts had come back, and that the colonies were under some ecclesiastical ban. The news reached

England of what had occurred. Some were for withdrawing the obnoxious act; some for enforcing it at the point of the bayonet. Pitt pleaded for the colonies. Lord Camden advocated their cause with great eloquence. "My position," said he, "is this—taxation and representation are inseparable. This position is founded on an eternal law of nature, for whatever is a man's own, is absolutely his own; no man has a right to take it from him without his consent. Whoever attempts to do it, attempts an injury; whoever does it, commits a robbery!"

So the Stamp Act was repealed, and the news was received in America with the utmost joy, gratitude and loyalty.

But the good news of repeal was very rapidly followed by the bad news of new taxation. The general burst of loyalty and gratitude was quickly followed by discontent and murmuring. A bill had been brought into the British House for taxing all tea, glass, paper, &c., imported to the colonies. This bill passed both Houses of Legislature. To add to the dissatisfaction of the colonies, a standing army was formed, to be maintained by them, and permanent salaries given to those in authority, thus rendering them independent of the colonial assemblies. These acts, passed in such rapid succession, left no doubt as to the line of policy about to be pursued, and the Americans became indignant and excited. Again the papers, in some cases the pulpits, rang with invectives against the proceedings of the English senate; liberty trees again sprung up plentifully; meetings were held, and declamatory speeches made; the marching of a body of troops into New York with bands playing and colours flying, during divine service on a Sabbath morning—was not calculated to modify the popular resentment; and so, step by step, the colonies and the mother-country were more and more estranged.

On the very day which saw the first blood shed in the struggle—the day of the Boston Massacre—Lord North, then at the head of the British administration, brought in a bill for removing all objectionable imposts except one. That one was the tax on tea. But all conciliatory measures were now out of the question, the matter had proceeded too far, and nothing but a complete exemption from taxes imposed by the British would receive attention from the colonies. They had resolved to deny British control, to cripple British trade; and to effect this, there was a non-consumption of all British importations. The struggle for independence had begun in earnest.

The British ministry then permitted the East India Company to export tea to the American colonies free from English duties, and liable only to a duty of threepence per pound, to be paid by the colonists. So great quantities of tea were shipped off for America. The colonists resolved that it should never be allowed to land.

The people of Providence were among the first to express their disapprobation of this forced importation. On one occasion, the town-crier went through the streets proclaiming that at ten o'clock that night, a bonfire of tea would be made in the market-square, requesting all those who possessed any of the objectionable article to bring it on that occasion to add fuel to the flames. At the appointed time there was a glowing fire in the market, and the "nest of rebels," as the people of Providence were afterwards called, made merry at the burning. Whoever the obnoxious tea was brought, the people resisted its landing as an outrage upon liberty. Sometimes under guard of British firelocks it was brought on shore, and stowed away in warehouse cellars, sometimes in strong forts and other secure places; but it was sure to be discovered, and whenever this was the case there was a redness in the sky, and a obnoxious bonfire in the street or market. At Philadelphia, the pilot were ordered not to conduct their ship into the river, and with their cargoes they returned to England. At New York the tea was landed under a strong military guard, but its sale was prohibited. At Charlestown, also, it was landed, but the sale prohibited, and so it rotted in dump cellars and was destroyed. But at Boston, the greatest and most serious disturbance took place. There the tea being confined to the governor and his friends, it was feared that some extraordinary measures would be adopted for its landing and in order the people thereof resolved upon a most extraordinary remedy. It was on the 16th of December, 1773, that a very large meeting, the largest perhaps that was ever held in Boston, met in the Old South Meeting; there it was unanimously resolved that the tea should not be landed. The meeting was greatly excited, and as twilight approached a call was made for candles. At that moment, a person disguised like a Mohawk Indian raised the war-whoop, which was answered from without, and a cry was raised in the gallery, "Bo—on Harbour a teapot to—night! Hurrah for Griffin's wharf!" The vessels lay in the Boston Harbour upon that calm, still night, and they were suddenly boarded by a large number of "Boston Boys," disguised as Mohawk Indians, and after a short, sharp, vigorous struggle, the tea was seized upon, the chests stowed, and their contents thrown into the sea. Two hundred and thirty-two chests of tea were thus broken and destroyed.

This determined act hastened the catastrophe. When the news reached England, it was resolved "to make such provisions as should secure the just dependence of the colonies, and due obedience to the laws throughout the British dominions." Boston was a doomed city. It was ordered to pay for the whole of the tea destroyed, all commercial intercourse with the port of Boston was interdicted, the landing or shipping of any goods at that place prohibited, while the custom-house and its dependencies were removed to Salem. But the people of Salem were not disposed to be the rivals in trade or commerce of their Boston brethren; all the colonies sympathised; there was a general movement; dissatisfaction, discontent, long-pent-up anger, patriotism, liberty, all united to make them rise as one man. The storm which at the first was but as a cloud no bigger than a man's hand, came at last in all its terrible fury; and in that storm the good ship Columbia parted company with her English convoy, and hoisted strange colours.

Among those who stood out prominently in the efforts of the "Britishers" to subvert the spirit of liberty in the American people, who were both surprised and mortified by the successful resistance of the colonists, stands General Burgoyne. Within the narrow limits of this article it would be impossible even briefly to glance at the tremendous struggle in which the Old and New Countries were engaged, and in which Burgoyne made himself so conspicuous. One incident in his disastrous campaign is represented in our third sketch, namely, his address to the Indians, Onondagas, Tuscaroras, Onondagas and Mohawks. The unsuccessful issue of that address, seeing it was delivered in what was to them an unknown tongue, may be easily guessed. They deserted him in great numbers, and went over to the side of the Republicans.

A few more words about Boston. As the war went on, the city was occupied by the British troops, and Howe felt almost as secure as if he were on the shores of Old England. They had no fear of the "rebels;" they had obtained a plentiful supply of provisions, and the winter was tolerably mild; a theatre had been established, balls were held, and a subscription was opened for a masquerade. They had got up a farce called "Boston Blockaded," in which General Washington was represented with an un-oath-gut, a large wig, a long rusty sword, and attended by a servant—a country bumpkin—with a rusty firelock. On the 8th of January, 1776, while this piece was performing, a sergeant suddenly entered and exclaimed—"The Yankees are attacking our works on Bunker's Hill!" The audience thought it part of the play, and laughed innocently, but they were soon undeceived by the voice of the fiery Howe, shouting "Officers, to your arms—posts!" The Yankees had in truth begun the attack, and the sock and tuckin, the domino and the dancing slippers, had to be put off for the habiliments of war. Everybody knows the result of the attack on Boston—how, after a hard siege, it fell, and the "rebel" army marched into their beautiful city, the metropolis of New England, to find it a city of desolation. Our last sketch represents the entry of Washington into New York after the final cessation of the war. He entered the city by the Bowery, the only road at that time, accompanied by his friends and the citizens, mostly on horseback. The British troops ere they had departed had "knocked off the cleats and slashed the flag-staff," so as to prevent the American colours from being hoisted, but after an hour's hard work in which a sailor boy, with true indomitable yankee courage, particularly distinguished himself, the standard of the States was displayed, and a salute of thirteen rounds was immediately given. Thus America asserted her final triumph.

OTTERS.

In a previous article we described the structure and habits of the seals, carnivorous mammalia in which every part of the body has been modified to suit them for a strictly aquatic life, and which appear scarcely capable of enjoying their existence in any other situation. The otters seem to form a sort of intermediate stage between these and the terrestrial carnivora, their truly quadruped structure fitting them for passing a good deal of their time upon land without inconvenience, whilst their webbed feet and the general form of their bodies enable them to swim with great facility in search of their food, which consists entirely of fish.

This great adaptation for an aquatic life, coupled no doubt with the peculiar, and we should think not very agreeable, flavour communicated to their flesh by fish diet, gave rise in former days, when zoological information was not quite so generally diffused as at present, to considerable disputes as to whether the otter was a fish or a quadruped; and our old friend Sir John Falstaff, in one of his complimentary speeches to Mrs. Quickly, compares that exemplary old lady to the otter, for, says the fat knight, "she's neither fish nor has left us, in his charming pages, a most picturesque description of a chase, at which, we may suppose, he was present. Even in the present day some people keep dogs specially trained to this sport, of which Mr. Bell, in his "History of British Quadrupeds," gives the following animating account. "When the otter is found," says that author, "the scene becomes exceedingly animated. He instantly takes to the water and dives, running a long time underneath it, and rising at a considerable distance from the place at which he dived. Then the anxious watch that is kept for his rising to 'vent,' the steady purpose with which the dogs follow and bait him as he swims, the attempts of the cunning beast to drown his assailant whilst they have fastened on him, the baying of the hounds, the cries of the hunters, and the fierce and dogged resolution with which the poor hopeless quarry holds his pursuers at bay, inflicting severe, sometimes fatal wounds, and holding on with unflinching pertinacity even to the last, must altogether form a scene as animated and exciting as the veriest epicure in hunting could desire."

flesh." We need not refer to the worthy hostess's indignant repudiation of the libel; but the fat knight's comparison shows that in Shakspeare's day the belief in the doubtful nature of the otter was tolerably general. The dispute, however, was of a religious rather than of a scientific nature, and related to the important question, whether or no the otter might be eaten by devout Catholics during Lent. The sages of the church appear to have settled this point in a manner somewhat at variance with modern zoological views, for we find that its flesh was eaten during that period of fasting.

The flesh of the otter does not appear to have been a very favourable article of food at any time, and its destruction was principally regarded as a sport, although sometimes prompted no doubt by the desire of freeing a piece of water from an inhabitant whose existence entailed a considerable loss of fish. As a sport, however, the pursuit of the otter appears to be of a most exciting description. Old Izaak Walton, who did not regard hunting in general as by any means comparable to his favourite diversion, yet seems to have looked upon an otter-hunt with a particularly favourable eye, and

Although a fierce beast in a state of nature, the otter, when taken young, may be easily domesticated, and when thoroughly tamed is said to be almost as good-tempered as a dog. Occasionally the natural propensity of the animal for fishing has been turned to good account, by its being taught to bring the fish which it catches to its owner. Bewick mentions one which brought sometimes as many as eight or ten salmon a day to its master. This use of the otter is, however, very rare in Europe, and seems to be rather a matter of curiosity than anything else; but in some other places, these animals appear to be important aids to the fishermen in the pursuit of their vocation. Thus Bishop Heber, in his "Journal," mentions his passing, on the banks of one of the Indian rivers, a row of nine or ten otters of the Indian species (Lutra nairi), tethered by straw ropes to bamboo stakes, and apparently by no means dispirited by their loss of freedom. "I was told," says the bishop, "that most of the fishermen in this neighbourhood kept one or more of these animals, who were almost as tame as dogs, and of great use in fishing, sometimes driving the shoals into the nets, sometimes bringing out the larger fish with their teeth."

The training of these animals for the latter purpose appears to be attended with some little difficulty. The young animals are to be carefully dieted at first with a mixture of fish and bread and milk, the former being gradually diminished, and the latter increased in quantity, until they are brought to live entirely upon bread and milk. They are then taught to fetch and carry like a dog; and when this lesson is learnt, and they have been accustomed, by carrying a stuffed leather fish, to deny themselves the gratification of their instinctive desires, a dead fish is substituted for the eel, and the otters are severely punished if they attempt to help themselves to a portion of the tempting morsel; their education is then completed, and they may be taken to the water in search of living fish.

Our common otter (Lutra vulgaris), which generally inhabits fresh water, often makes its way, especially in winter, to the sea coasts, where it usually grows to a larger size, and its fur requires a deeper colour. This fur, which is soft and much valued, is formed of long hairs of a fine brown colour, beneath which is a very fine light grey down. The Russians carry on a great trade in these skins with China; they are said to possess some means of giving a golden tint to the longer hairs, by which their value in the Chinese market is greatly increased. But the fur of the common otter yields vastly in importance and commercial value to that of the great sea otter (Entellia lutea), which inhabits the western coasts of North America, and the opposite shores of the Asiatic continent and islands. This animal weighs from seventy to eighty pounds, whilst the weight of a large specimen of the common European species scarcely exceeds twenty pounds. The hind feet of this animal are more distinctly palmated than those of the common otter, and it swims with great celerity in every position—on its back and sides, and sometimes almost upright in the water. The principal trade in the skins of these animals is in the hands of the Russians, who obtain them in vast quantities from the Kamtschadales, and sell them at enormous prices in the Chinese markets.

The common otter (p. 249) usually brings forth four or five young at a birth; these the mother tends with the greatest care and assiduity, guiding them early into the water, and teaching them how to avoid danger by diving and hiding themselves amongst the reeds and bushes which fringe the banks of their native stream. An interesting instance of the care of the female otter for her progeny was exhibited some years since in the gardens of the Zoological Society. A female in the Society's collection had two young ones, which had already begun to eat fish and accompany their parent into the water. One day, according to the account of Jane Hunt, the head keeper, when their pond had been emptied for the purpose of cleaning it, and was only about half-full of water, the whole family got out of their sleeping-places and plunged in. The distance from the surface of the water to the edge of the bank was too great for the young animals to get out without assistance, and "after they had been in the water for some minutes, the mother appeared very anxious to get them out, and made several attempts to reach them from the side of the pond where she was standing; but this she was not able to do, as they were not within her reach. After making several attempts in this manner without success, she plunged into the water to them, and began to play with one of them for a short time, and put her head close to its ears, as if she was making it understand what she meant; the next moment she made a spring out of the pond, with the young one holding on by the turn at the root of the tail with its teeth. Having safely landed it, she got the other out in the same manner; this she did several times during a quarter of an hour," the young ones, with the characteristic indelicacy of youth, persisting in plaguing their affectionate parent by plunging in as soon as she had got them out. When the pond was nearly filled with water, so that she could reach them with ease, she took a more unceremonious course with the unruly youngsters, laying hold of their ears with her teeth, and dragging them out by force. When they were out, according to the keeper's account, "she kept chattering to them, as if she was telling them not to go into the pond again."

All the otters are exceedingly fond of play, and their movements, when thus engaged, especially in the water, are often very graceful. The Canadian otter (Lutra Canadensis) has a very peculiar way of amusing itself during the long winters of that northern latitude. It enjoys what no doubt many of our younger readers are already looking forward to with delight, a regularly lively game at sliding. There is this difference, however, between the "otter slides" and those which would be preferred by our young friends: the former always terminate with a plunge into the water, a consummation which biped sliders generally endeavour to avoid. M. Gosse, who saw several otter slides when travelling in Newfoundland in the winter, tells us that several of these animals select a suitable place, where the steep, snow-covered bank slopes rapidly down to the edge of unfrozen water; "then each in succession, lying flat on his belly on the top of the bank, slides swiftly down over the snow, and plunges into the water. The others follow, while he crawls up the bank at some distance, and running round to the same place, takes his turn again, to perform the same evolution as before. The wetness running from their bodies freezes on the surface of the slide, and so the snow becomes a smooth glitter of ice." The otters keep at this amusement for hours, with all the perseverance and apparent enjoyment of a party of human sliders, and seem thoroughly to appreciate the advantage of what we believe is technically denominated "keepin' the pot a-bilin'."

SELF-DENIAL.

CONCLUSION.

An unexpected blow now damped all our joys. The ——— paper, upon which I almost depended, suddenly ceased to appear. It had not been doing very well, and the proprietor merged it into another, which had its full staff already. It was just after breakfast when the letter came. This was one of those accidents against which I really ought to have been prepared, but I was not. It prostrated me for the moment. My wife quietly asked me to come out for a walk, it would do me good.

It was almost the dusk of evening when we reached home. I lit a candle the first thing, and raised it to show my wife the way. I nearly dropped it as I snatched up a letter of the table.

When Edith entered the room she really must have thought me mad. I acted like a lunatic, for without any explanation I began singing and laughing in a most suspicious manner.

"Edward, dear, what is the matter?" asked Edith, looking at me, and in a way almost comic.

"Hurra! sold my book!" I replied, still running round.

"Oh, Edward, how thankful we ought to be," began the dear little woman.

"Yes!" said I, gravely. "I am very thankful. But the surprise was so great. They say the book is very well spoken of, but considering it is only my first appearance, and my name is not known, they can only afford £25 for the little volume at present, for which sun they schob me a clove, which I am to acknowledge by return of post."

Just as we sat down to tea Charles came in. I was eating with an appetite of an alarming character. Edith was singing with all her heart and soul. He had never seen us look happier, and yet he looked at me in a curious inquiring way. He evidently thought I was under the influence of intoxication.

"Glad to see you, Charles," I said, "I have sold my book."

"This is indeed pleasant and fortunate," he said, "I am delighted at your success. But have you the money?" he asked; his hand mechanically moving to his pocket.

"Because the fact is, you have come up with some," I replied, smiling. "Well, this time, Charles, we cannot accept," and I handed him the letter and the cheque.

One morning—it was about three months after the sale of my book, which had been published about a month—we issued from our humble abode on our way to town. Edith and I walked arm-in-arm, while the girl carried the child to the omnibus for us. We were going to spend the day with Mr. and Mrs. Ellis and Charles. It was early, as we had to dine at two—an hour that did not suit my working habits, but which did very well on a holiday.

We had reached to about twenty yards from our door, when Edith started and looked up in my face.

"What is the matter, Edward?" she said. "How you do tremble!"

There was a bench close at hand; I sank upon it almost insensibly.

"Yes," I faltered; "I feel rather dizzy."

"Don't be alarmed," I continued eagerly; "it is nothing; Charles will explain."

Edith turned sharply round, and saw Charles standing close to us, while behind came a lady and gentleman of some what imposing mien, for he was very tall. She herself trembled violently, for she began to suspect something of the truth.

"It is his father and mother," whispered Charles quickly. "He was much agitated himself. "It is all right."

I at this moment saw the girl, with the child in her arms, stepped by my mother. "I heard her speak distinctly."

"Is this Mr. Mildmay's boy?" she said earnestly.

"Yes, ma'am," replied the awed little nurse.

My mother took it in her arms. "I grant to my fact, and advanced towards my father. He held out his two hands; it was quite evident he did not know what was afoot.

"Why, what a man you have grown!" he remarked, wishing to say something. "I've read your book, boy, and have come to tell you it's a great credit to you."

"You are too kind, my father. I have not deserved this."

"Edward, my boy, let us say nothing about the past just now; we've both been to blame. So this is your wife and child. Up in my word—and my dear father laughed heartily. "Well, this does seem strange, Mary. He was but a boy the other day, and here we find him a husband, a father, and an author!"

I do believe it was this last circumstance that most delighted him. My father had a profound respect for literature, and my book was an historical sketch for students of early English history. The subject was a favourite one with him.

"Where were you going," suddenly asked my father, while my mother and Edith were conversing apart, of course about the child.

"I was going to dine with Edith's father and mother," I replied, rather hesitatingly.

"Come along," said my father; "we have a carriage round the corner. I long to see the parents of your wife. Your friend Charles there," he added in a whisper, "has told me all her virtues."

"Charles is a noble fellow," I began; "but—"

I knew I was about to make some excuse, when Charles interrupted me.

"Excuse me, Mrs. Mildmay," he said, addressing my mother, "if I interrupt you; but you have something yet to learn, as have these young people."

"What is it?" asked my father, gravely. He did not much like surprises.

"My dear sir," said Charles gently, as if well aware of the gravity of his question. "Your wife had a brother—"

"Charles Farnham?" exclaimed my father in an agitated tone.

"Yes."

"Well, what of him?" continued my father, while my mother held the child as if determined nothing that occurred should sever her from it.

"Your son has a right to be called a gentleman," said Charles, gravely. "I know it at present, but he didn't."

"My niece and daughter!" said my father, while my wife held the child. "This is, indeed, a surprise. But let us go; the matter is not so serious. Poor Captain! I have some splendid news for him."

"I think I'll go," said my father in a low tone, "that they are poor, and let Edith rest."

"I understand," said my father; "you will be prepared to dine with me at your hotel. Bring them with you."

Charles thanked my father; and after shaking hands by the hand, hurried away. We walked quietly to the carriage.

My father then told me of my mother's brother. He had not succeeded in the army, and had, in deed, left it rather suddenly and disappeared. He had been to blame himself; but the system, said my worthy parent, was also to blame. It had been the experience of his brother-in-law that had decided him to re-try again in the army.

For several years, however, he had sought the captain, who, I now first learnt, had really no half-pay, but a small annuity. He had sought him in vain. The agent who paid the money refused his address. His friend once did the rest.

"You must feel, my dear boy," said my father, "how this has pained me, when I tell you that your father in law is heir to three hundred acres, like your mother. Why, there are three thousand pounds of accumulation. I am the trustee; and the money he can have this very day."

How my wife brightened up, how she smiled and felt happy! To relieve her father and mother from the drudgery of a London house had been her dream a long time. How brilliantly was the dream realised. Edith, like my self, felt satisfied that we could now manage the captain, and so secure the future, which her misery and outward temptation had drawn him into. A look from her told me this.

We arrived at the hotel and waiting. My mother and wife retired to a bedroom to talk. I was left alone with my father. I confess I felt a degree of nervousness, but I never had experienced in my life.

"Now, my dear boy," said my father, "I have one favour to ask of you. You are a man now, a friend more than a child. Let this case of our partner be ever mentioned."

"My dear sir," I began, "I could not go on so much as I allowed."

But I gave me no time to show much emotion, for he began speaking of my book, which he pulled out of his pocket. With all his good sense and erudition, I verily do believe that he thought it one of the cleverest things in the English language. Love and affection really are, to a certain degree, blind. There were one or two, indeed many passages, which were almost unconscious reflections of lessons he had given me in my youth. He would take these as personal compliments to himself. He had read the book with extreme care, and marked passages after passage. Veritas quod veritas vincit, were to be seen on almost every page.

The scholar and the student had been moved from every thought of anger by his son's book.

Presently the captain and his wife came in. They were much amused. My father received them admirably, though he would even to them show his pride about his son. Then he told them of their unexpected good fortune. Mrs. Farnham merely turned pale and red; but the captain would have fainted but for a glass of water. It carried him back to the days of his youth, when he was a gentleman.

Edith came in at this moment, and at once drew her father on one side. I heard the good soul's words.

"Now, father, you will come and live in the country with us," she began.

"I will, my dear," he replied in a low tone; "and, my blessed girl, I know what that look means—I will be a gentleman, a gentleman, I will be a gentleman, Edith."

Next day I found that the three thousand two hundred pounds of accumulated money was settled on Edith. Her father had insisted on this. A few days later we all moved to the country. Captain and Mrs. Farnham took up their abode near my father's house, and he devoted his leisure to writing. I did not care to disturb my presence, which I readily obeyed, and I still preserve, though no longer drawn to work for immediate benefit.

I saw nothing new or wonderful in the marriage of Charles, Edith, my sister Helen, and the settling up of business of Jack, Prudence, and I went out to London, and to the other letter of them, my dear father, that all my dear friends will have read from your very brilliant servant. THE AUTHOR.

THE WORKS OF EMINENT MASTERS.

JAN STEEN.

Houbraken, who was for a short time the contemporary of Jan Steen, has represented this artist to us as a free drinker, tion of a confirmed drunkard and buffoon. All those who have spoken of Jan Steen, since Houbraken, have, in imitation of his biographer, repeated the jokes of the celebrated painter, so that they have become proverbial, especially in Holland. But, for want of having carefully studied his works, and in consequence of the practice, common to almost all book-makers, of copying one from the other, without making any sort of independent inquiry or research, the biographers have given us a false idea of the Dutch painter, in describing him as a man who was capable of nothing better than drinking and jesting. His private affairs, rather than his art, appear to have engaged their attention—they concerned themselves too much with what took place in his household, and did not rightly comprehend what passed in his mind.

It is, doubtless, quite true that Jan Steen lived at the ale-house, and ended by turning his own dwelling into a tavern. This view of his life should not, however, prevent us from desecrating his real merits, or from allowing, that though a free-liver, he was also a philosopher, a profound and acute observer, and able to raise himself without effort to the conception of beauty. Possessed of much comic power, he was skilful in portraying diversities of character, and in reproving the follies of mankind,—not with bitterness, but gaily, as it becomes a man who laughs both at the great and petty miseries of life.

Among the numerous biographical works of Arnold Houbraken—which are for the most part without interest, detail, or colour,—that of the life of Jan Steen is remarkable. One and relates of him such numerous excesses and ludicrous traits of character as to have given him in history the reputation of a drunkard and buffoon.

feels that this writer, although younger than Jan Steen by twenty-four years, knew the man of whom he speaks, and derived the elements of his biography from a good source. He informs us that Jan Steen was born in 1636 at Leyden, in Holland, and that he was the contemporary and friend of Mieris. His master was Jan Van Goyen, under whose instruction he made great progress. Whilst he excited the admiration of this painter by the rapidity with which his talents developed themselves, he insinuated himself into his good graces, and eventually Van Goyen became so partial to him, that he granted him entire liberty in his house, and allowed him to live there on terms of the greatest intimacy. Van Goyen had a daughter, named Margaret, an indolent and simple, but very pretty girl, who, from being much amused by the continual jokes of Jan Steen, came at last to be far from indifferent to him. The affection of the youthful painter for the damsel being thus reciprocated, they agreed to marry, if the consent of their parents could be obtained. It naturally became the lover's task to communicate with the father of the young lady; and an opportunity was sought to accomplish this object. When he had finished his work in the atelier, he was accustomed to go in the evening to drink beer with Van Goyen. One day, finding the old man in a tolerably good humour, Jan Steen gently accosted him, although not without some hesitation. "I have," said he, "some news to tell you which will surprise you as much as if you were to hear the thunder rumble at Cologne. Your daughter and I, since it must be told, have an affection for each other; and, if you do not consider me unworthy, I shall be much honoured in becoming your son-in-law." Van Goyen, though rather surprised at this speech, for he had never thought of such a thing as his daughter's "falling in love," comprehended at once the force of Steen's argument, and that his resistance would only aggravate his pupil and his daughter. So, like a good father, he acceded with a good grace to the proposition of Jan Steen. But the latter did not find his own father, Hayik Jan Steen, quite so easy to deal with. He was a brewer, established at Delft; a practical man, less sensible to the power of love than to the value of ready money. It was long before he would consent that his son should marry at an age when he was not in a condition to maintain a family by his labour. However, after much entreaty, he at last yielded to the pressing solicitations of Jan, and agreed that the nuptials should be celebrated. But, that his son might be in a fair pecuniary position, he built a brewery at Delft, where he established the newly-married couple, with a capital of 10,000 florins. Steen, finding himself in possession of ready money, and considering it but natural to spend it, thought only of leading a joyous life; and Margaret, on her part, constitutionally indolent, neither attended to her domestic duties nor to her counter.—

Je laisse à penser la vie Que firent nos deux amis.

It may easily be imagined that affairs managed by two persons of this temperament could not long continue in good condition. "Margaret," says Campo Weyerman, "kept no account-book; all the beer that was taken on credit from the house was set down in chalk upon a slate or a wooden board. Now it happened one day that, being accused of having defrauded the rights of the town-due, Jan Steen was summoned by the excise officer to show his books. The slate was produced, but no one could make any thing of it, not even Margaret Steen, who had left it all in confusion, and who was not in the habit of giving any thought to what she had written down. Nevertheless, a heavy fine was exacted, but, as the brewery was on the eve of its ruin, Jan Steen, laughing heartily, reminded the exciseman that, where there is nothing, the devil loses his right and the king too."

The artist-brewer was on the point of being forced to close his house when his father came to his assistance. But this only delayed the ruin of Jan Steen. Margaret confessed one morning to her jovial husband that there was absolutely nothing left in his cellar, neither beer nor casks, and that there was scarcely corn enough to make a cake. It was all over. Jan Steen saw the ruin of his brewery, for a second time, with an undisturbed mind, and was even the first to joke about his disaster. After all, said he to himself, here is a picture all ready; and, remembering that he was a painter, he set to work and depicted in a spirited composition the disorder of his house. This picture represents a room in which every thing is in confusion, the furniture is upset, the dog licks the saucepan, the cat runs off with the bacon, the children are sprawling on the floor, and the mother, seated in an arm-chair, calmly contemplates this delightful scene, whilst Jan Steen stands philosophically holding a glass in his hand.

This was our artist's first picture, and it is not astonishing that he, a painter of what are called conversation pieces, should have taken as his subject the scene which passed before his eyes. Those who have the genius to observe, look first at the objects which immediately surround them. But all biographers are much mistaken in saying that Jan Steen painted himself in all his works; and that almost all his compositions represent ale-house scenes, coarse farees or smoking-rooms, full of toppers. Nothing is further from the truth, as is proved by the works of this painter. Jan Steen has always allowed his sly humour to peep out of his pictures, but it is an exception when he has painted the customs of his life. When will the mania cease for copying from books without inquiring into the truth of their statements? Even in our days, that is to say, in a time in which the spirit of criticism is more than ever developed and exercised, we perceive this fault in some very valuable books, written by regular authors no less than by amateurs. For instance, in Smith's Catalogue, so exact and truthful in all that concerns the description of the pictures of each master, the author, repeating what the biographers have successively said, does not fail to observe that Jan Steen was the painter of his own manners and those of the society in which he lived. And this is even more surprising, because this preliminary notice is followed by a long catalogue of the known works of Jan Steen, and among more than 300 compositions, which are there described, only thirty have drunkenness for the subject, and the ale-house for the scene. This master takes the subjects of his pictures almost entirely from human life; we mean life considered from a comic point of view, from the side which amuses philosophers and good-tempered observers.

Another modern writer, M. Immerzeel,* remarking, doubtless, that the works of Jan Steen had little relation to the circumstances of his life, as Houbraken and Campo Weyerman assert, has resolutely contested the assertions of the historians of his country, without giving any other reason than the startling contrast between the habits of a dissolute man and pictures so delicate, sometimes even so elegant, as those of Jan Steen. But how are we to deny facts which have been repeatedly affirmed and related in detail by a contemporary of Jan Steen, when such a denial is without proof, and really rests only upon a presumption, in itself very contestable? In short, is it inadmissible that a professed drinker may have refinement of mind, delicacy of feeling and the talent of observation? And even if genius were always incompatible with the sad propensity to drunkenness, what becomes of the observation of M. Immerzeel, opposed to the authority of a biographer, who, for more than a century, has not been contradicted, at least on this point?

Yes, Jan Steen was what the world calls a joyous toper, who went through life laughing—not with that coarse laugh which is only the gaiety of fools, but with that delicate, intelligent, and slightly sardonic smile which is the sportiveness of philosophers. He passed his life in observing men for his own amusement, and in painting for theirs. Nobody had a more communicative joviality; and it is impossible to contemplate one of his pictures without feeling one's heart expand. He was the first to laugh at that bottle which he kept continually by his side, and which doubtless sustained his Rabelaisian humour, although continually emptying and refilling it. And it is remarkable that, when he happened to represent drunken people, he never failed to ridicule their drunkenness; thus he seemed to preach temperance with the glass in his hand. Take, as an example of this curious fact, the celebrated picture, which was in the celebrated collection of Mr. Beekford; it is entitled, "The Effects of Intemperance." The artist has there painted himself, with his interesting and pretty wife, in the state of drowsiness which follows too frequent libations. She, dressed in a red jacket edged with ermine, over a silk petticoat, is seated in the middle of the room, as it becomes the mistress of the house. While the husband and wife sleep, others profit by their intoxication. The children are searching in their mother's pocket, and already a little boy has pulled forth a piece of money, which he holds aloft in his hand with a triumphant air; another holds a glass in his hand, which he appears about to dash to the ground and shiver in pieces. The servant of the house hastens to profit by so favourable a moment to declare his passion to a young girl, sliding into her hand some money, which no doubt he had also stolen. The dog seizes upon a pie; the cat breaks a china vase, in endeavouring to spring upon a cage containing a bird; the monkey amuses himself with some parchments and books; on the ground, scattered pell-mell, are silver dishes, broken glasses, a violin, a Bible, a china plate, and, as if the elements themselves must interfere, the fire is burning a goose which is on the spit.

Jan Steen has treated this subject several times, and a different version of it may be found among the valuable pictures in the collection formed by the late Duke of Wellington, at Apsley House. The monkey in this instance plays with the clock, as if, says Dr. Waagen, to show that the happy do not count the hours. But such a lesson given to drunkards has nothing pedantic, thanks to the good humour with which the painter has represented himself. Jan Steen, being a witty man, who wishes to continue amusing, bears on his own back the burden of human caprices and follies.

The picture called the "Young Gallant" (page 4) gives us the whole style and manner of Jan Steen in a single composition. It consists of six figures, sitting or standing round a table, on which are some eggs in a dish. A man in a chair at the left-front of the picture is talking to a dog, while on the opposite side a young fellow comes dancing in from the open doorway, holding a mackerel up by the tail, and carrying a few young onions in the other hand. The mistress of the house looks smilingly up from her seat, and another woman, standing at the table, desists from her household duties, and looks a smiling welcome to the young gallant. A man standing by the bedside points to another going out at the door, probably the "good man" of the establishment. The entire composition—the candle-chandelier, decorated with flowers in token of the summer weather; the pipe stuck in the hat of the sitting figure, in the way our waggoners wear them even in this day; the heavy close-curtained bed, the bare room, the expectant dog looking up to the suspended fish, and the sunlight streaming in from window and garden doorway, bespeak a thoughtfulness for general effect and picturesque arrangement entirely Jan Steen's. This has been considered one of the best of his genre paintings.

In 1669, after his ill success as a brewer, he set up as a tavern-keeper. Old Havik Jan being just dead, Jan Steen came into possession of a house at Leyden. This induced him to leave the town of Delft, and to establish himself under the paternal roof; and there it was that he opened his tavern. He placed a sign-post before his door; and, as if he wished to effect a reconciliation with his creditors, he painted as the sign, a picture representing the figure of Peace, holding an olive-branch. Houbraken tells us he was his own best customer, and that he did not succeed better in this new occupation as brewer and tavern-keeper, though he possessed all the gaiety, all the animation, which attracts customers to an ale-house. He was, probably, better able to induce them to drink than to pay. Most of those who frequented his house were painters as poor as himself. Franz Micris, Ary de Vos, Quiering, Brackelenkamp, and Jan Lievens were among those who resorted there, day and night; for Jan Steen never shut his door, that he might show his friends that he was not afraid, and because, having little to lose, he could laugh in the face of thieves. His cellar being soon emptied, he was obliged to take down his sign. In this extremity the painter came to the help of the tavern-keeper. The wine-merchant not being willing to give him credit any longer, Steen presented him with a little picture in Holland every one likes painting—and the merchant sent a purchase of wine in exchange. The sign re-appeared. Steen's friends re-assembled to listen to his facetious stories, and the band of painters, who had turned out, hastened back, resolved not to leave the place while a drop of liquor remained in Master Jan's taps. But the cask did not last long, and this time it was necessary to close the tavern entirely.

Campo Weyerman, a facetious writer, who has sought out sarcastic expressions, some of which are marked by the grossest triviality, has enlarged upon the life of Jan Steen, and related numerous anecdotes, interspersed with coarse jokes, in which the piquancy especially consists in the unpolished language. After having exhausted his facetiousness, he accuses his predecessor Houbraken of borrowing his anecdotes of Jan Steen from the Almanack of Liège, and of retelling a little story, as dry as sea biscuit at the time, and as probable as the travels of Pinto, about some incredible supply of bread made to the family of the painter. These censures have not prevented Campo Weyerman from relating many anecdotes himself; "A little story," says he, "will show that the kitchen and cellar of Jan Steen were not so abundantly supplied as the hotels on the quay of Y, or the Lion d'or at the Hague. Once, towards midnight, the famous Jan Lievens (pupil and friend of Rembrandt) knocked at Jan Steen's residence, and the door being only latched, according to custom, he entered without ceremony. 'Who's there?' demanded Jan, waking up with a start. 'It is I, dear brother,' said Lievens, 'I am come to bring you a couple of chickens, as fat as strong Brunswick beer, as white as the white of an egg, and as tender as the leg of a pheasant.' 'Are they roasted?' asked Steen. 'No, king of the universe,' replied Lievens, 'they are raw; but I have resided in several courts, and there I learned to cook; I pray you, then, get up, and I will serve you up a dish in my own way.' Jan got up, lighted his lamp, and calling Corneille, his eldest son, who was his waiter, ordered him to prepare every thing for the repast. But some of the ingredients in the worldly pleasures of our two painters, who especially regretted the absence of wine and tobacco, were wanting. In spite of the reluctance of Corneille to ask for credit, Steen sent him to the wine merchant, Gorkens, to beg him, for the last time, to advance some wine, for which he should be paid in paintings. 'That done,' added the father, 'you will go to Gerard Vander Laan, and ask him for a penny-worth of leaf-tobacco, with a couple of little pipes, and you will swear in my name that my gratitude will be eternal.' Whilst Corneille ran through the town to awaken the tradesmen and to execute his commissions, Jan Lievens set to work, without losing a moment, plucked his fowls and placed them on a broken gridiron, which was buried in the peat dust to preserve it from rust; and Jan Steen, on his part, prepared a highly-flavoured sauce with pepper, mustard, vinegar, and butter. When the fowls were scarcely cooked through, the two companions began to devour them with such an appetite, that poor Corneille, returning quite out of breath, with his supply of wine and tobacco, only found, upon the earthenware dish, a head and a-half and three black feet. The wine and the packet of tobacco, which had just arrived, were now all that remained to be consumed, and this did not occupy long. After Steen and Lievens had thus satisfied their appetites, they went to take an airing outside the Porte-aux-Vaches, and walked along talking morality like true disciples of Pythagoras. But Jan Steen paid dearly for the carelessness with which, relying always on Providence, he ventured from home, leaving the door on the latch, as is the custom in the little towns of Westphalia. Whilst he slept, all his clothes, as well as those of his children, were carried off; and, to put the finishing stroke to his misfortunes, the canvas and panels, on which he was employed in painting pictures for his creditors, were also taken. The tavern-keeper, who was accustomed to be awakened by the noise of the children, remained in bed; but finding that the house was silent longer than usual, 'Holloa, you rogues,' cried he, 'get up at last and light the fire.' The children replied by the denial of Adam, complaining that they were naked and could not find their clothes. Steen stretched forth his hand to reach his garments, but, a pirate, and he, being as poor as a church mouse, was the man to rob a painter without much scruple, when occasion prompted. The suspicions of Jan Steen were aroused against the chemist, and when he came expressly to condole with him on the loss of his clothes and his pictures, Steen, no doubt incensed by so much hypocrisy, received Esculapius, knife in hand.—'Race of thieves!' cried he, 'pirate! buccancer! thou shalt see if thou canst carry off the shell after having taken the yoke of the egg!' At this exclamation, the alarmed doctor immediately took flight, and although he was innocent, finding that his whole wardrobe had vanished, he was obliged to send one of the little Adamites to the cook, Goumert Baus, who lent him some clothes till he could tell his misfortune to his nephew Rynsberg, who took the plundered Jan and his featherless chickens to a woollen draper's, where the father and his progeny issued like so many of those birds of the sun, baptized by Pliny by the name of Phœnic. The most ludicrous part of the story is what happened to a doctor, who frequented Jan Steen's alchouse, and sometimes served him as a model. The brother of this doctor had the reputation of being

he left Jan Steen persuaded that the robbery had been committed by the very man who had just expressed so much regret that it had taken place."

Among Jan Steen's companions, and, like him, a determined drinker, was the celebrated painter, Franz Mieris. Judging from his carefully-finished little pictures, and the elegance of his compositions, one would never have suspected that Mieris passed his life in drinking, and in listening to the humorous speeches of Jan Steen, who, by means of his superior intelligence, and the amusing sallies of his inexhaustible wit, exereised an irresistible influence over him. This painter of rich interiors and silk dresses yielded in spite of himself to the ascendancy of Jan Steen, even following him into the midst of taverns, and there passing whole nights in a state of oblivion. Nevertheless, completely as he was ruled by his friend, Mieris had, in his turn, and perhaps without being conscious of it, a decisive influence over the manners of Steen; by this, however, we do not mean his manner of thinking, but his manner of painting. This influence is often perceptible in the larger works of the tavern philosopher. One often meets with a bronze; a guitar hangs from one of the panels; and a beautiful landscape is enclosed in an ebony frame. The repast is composed of delicious fruits, and some ready-opened oysters which glisten temptingly, the sight of which "makes one's mouth water." There are ripe grapes, fine peaches, whose downy skins rival the blush upon a maiden's cheek, and lemons, part of whose golden peel lies beside them. Such was the reciprocal influence which Mieris and Jan Steen possessed over each other; and, in connexion with this subject, we remember, that whilst standing before the pretty

THE PARROT.

"Dutch Repast," a "Game at Backgammon," in which the careful execution and soft, tender touch remind one of Mieris; and the elaborate style is then in harmony with the importance of the subject, and the distinguished appearance of all the personages in the picture. There is no coarse drinking, as in the taverns of Adrian Brauwer. Each one plays his part naturally, and sometimes even gracefully; not one ignoble accessory obtrudes upon the order of the house, and the details of the furniture are all in accordance with the refinement of the guests. For instance, on the mantel-shelf is seen a Cupid in picture, which is called "The Parrot" in the Amsterdam Gallery, an amateur came up who, at first sight, took this Jan Steen for a Mieris. In this picture the figures are elegantly dressed and very good-looking. Three gentlemen, their swords at their sides and their short mantles thrown over the back of the arm-chair, are playing at backgammon; a charming woman, negligently dressed in a silk petticoat, is feeding the parrot. Her arms are raised for this purpose, and, her back being turned towards the spectators, her face is only seen in profile; while the parrot, whose cage, in the shape of a lantern, is hung from the ceiling, is putting out his claw for the tender morsel. A child is feeding a cat, and a matron engaged in cooking some veal on a grilliron, for the gentlemen to eat between the games, completes the charming picture.

"The Aged Invalid" (p. 12) is another of Steen's genre compositions. It is conceived in his happiest spirit, and represents an incident common enough in high life in all countries. A rich hypochondriac is servilely tended by various friends and nurses, who, while they feign great affection and care for his person, are every one of them intent upon making a purse for themselves by favouring his whims and fancies. Here, as in many others of Steen's paintings, the physician and family friends are introduced. The nurse-maid is warming the bed, while on the floor are scattered various tokens of sickness—bottles, candle-pans, cooking utensils, and a chamber candlestick, with which a cat is playing. All is real and life-like, and every figure and object seems to have its place and purpose; and the whole picture is carefully drawn. The colours in the original, which were once bright and transparent, have, however, yielded, says Kügler, to the finger of Time.

But Jan Steen, when he abandons himself to his own fancy, may be easily recognised by the sprightly mirth of his composition. It is almost impossible to find a picture of his in which there is not a sly meaning. He translates popular proverbs with sufficient spirit to relieve their triteness; and, by the appearance of the figures, the appropriateness of their gestures, and the part that each one plays in the comedy of life, according to the character suited to his age, trade, or condition, he gives these proverbs piquancy. Doctors have often called forth the caustic wit of Jan Steen; besides, it was the custom with all the artists of the seventeenth century to turn them to ridicule. Whilst Molière paraded them on the French stage, Jan Steen delighted in painting them, in all the quackery of their gravity, in all the severity of their costume, studied for effect.

The "Dancing Dog," which we give at page 8, may be considered a gem—a complete triumph of artistic arrangement and varied colour. It consists of ten figures, with the dancing dog in the front centre. Jan Steen's whole family are portrayed in this composition. There is the painter himself with his invariably good-natured smile and his violin in his hand—for he was a tolerable musician as well as a good artist—sitting between his wife and mother. The latter offers him a glass of wine,—an offer he was seldom known to refuse,—and the former looks lovingly into his eyes, while she allows his friend to seize her by the hand and invite her to join in the dance. One of his sons plays the flute to the dog, another is dipping water from the vine-decorated water-tub, and a third, a fine plump little fellow, with a whistle in his hand, stands behind in calm contemplation of the joyous scene. Just behind the jovial old lady stands a figure, whom we may suppose to be Franz Mieris, holding a tankard; and in the back centre are a couple of figures with smiling faces, whom the painter probably introduced to fill up the unseemly gap which the disposition of his other figures would have left in the picture. The owl on the wall looks wisely down, as becomes a bird of his staid and solemn nature, while the parrot, released from his cage, seems to listen to the music with quite a critical ear. Trees hang over the garden wall in the extreme distance, and a rich piece of drapery disposed in graceful folds, contrasts admirably with the sameness of the walls before which it is suspended, and gives an air of finish and luxurious refinement to the whole. The accessories are few and simple, and consist—as in most pictures of the Dutch and Flemish schools—of the utensils of the table, and the means of enjoyment—drinking cups, dishes, pipes, and so on. This picture is at the Hague, where it is highly esteemed as a good exemplification of the artist's peculiar humour. The painter's family, grouped in various ways, has often formed the subject of his pictures.

Quite different in style and moral feeling is the elegant little picture called "Le Benedicite" (page 9). Here the sentiment is pure and holy; but even here the painter's comic vein peeps out,—for the dog licks the empty soup-pot, and the toyship and child's ball are made accessory to the action of the picture. Peasant life in Holland is nowhere so fully shown as in the compositions of Jan Steen. While in the pictures of Terburg we have the ease and tranquillity of well-bred society, the noise and riot, the humour and joviality—the high spirits and special license of middle and low life in Holland, is discovered in the paintings of Jan Steen. There is never any difficulty in reading the story which he tells with his eloquent pencil. In the "Dancing Dog," no less than in the "Grace before Meat," we have a simple incident simply expressed. In the one case all is life, fun, and frolic; in the other, an air of tranquil satisfaction and calm prayerful sincerity sits upon all faces; in each the expression is suited to the subject, and a perfect harmony pervades the picture. The whole economy of a Dutch family—their pleasures and their duties, may be discovered in these two pictures.

It is asserted that Jan Steen was related to Metz, who was, like him, originally from the town of Leyden. It is certain that the style of Gabriel Metz may be recognised in some pictures of his compatriot; for example, in the "Nativity of St. John," which was in the Braamecamp collection, in 1771, and was sold for 1,210 florins. It is equally certain that Steen painted the portrait of Metz, and that of his wife: these two portraits appeared in a sale which took place at Paris, in 1771. But that there was the same kind of intimacy between Steen and Metz, as existed between Steen and Mieris, is not likely, on account of the character and quiet habits of Gabriel Metz. Houbraken does not mention their friendship; nevertheless, it is probable that this biographer was personally acquainted with the amusing brewer, whose jests he relates, and from whom he bought more than one picture. However, without drawing the elegant and sedate painter from the rich Dutch boudoir to the tavern, Jan Steen could charm him by his conversation; for no one spoke better of his art than he; and, without having learnt its rules, he seemed to have guessed them by the inspiration of genius. We may confidently assert that the great principles, which he has so well observed in his small pictures, could not have been derived either from the instruction of Kimpfer—who was, it is said, his first master—or from his good father-in-law Van Goyen, who was, nevertheless, a very clever man.

How many intellectual harmonies, which have been overlooked by most of the Dutch painters, has Jan Steen perfectly understood! With him every one plays his part and retains his character throughout. Costume, bearing, physiognomy, gesture—each heightens the force of expression, and contributes something to the unity of the figure. The doctor preserves his professional importance; he is clothed in black from head to foot, and is grave from foot to head. The tooth-drawer adds a cock's feather to the peaked hat of the doctor, and gives a little more depth to the wrinkles of his forehead. The jolly peasant is distinguished from the lively citizen. The attitude of the betrothed is not exactly that of the young lover. The action of the notary is in character with his function and his habits; and, as to the drunkard, he betrays himself in the smallest details of his dress, and in the slightest leanings of his body. In short, Jan Steen could not have called forth the apostrophe of Garrick, the celebrated comedian, who, seeing an actor play the part of a drunken man with much truth, by the indecision of his look, the disfigurement of his features, and the embarrassment of his broken talk, while the action of the rest of his body did not correspond to these expressions, said to him: "My friend, thy head is truly drunk, but thy feet and legs are full of sense."

In a fit of ill-humour against the masters of the Dutch school, M. Paillot de Montabert exclaims, "This good man in black, what does he want here? What is he going to do? This is what one asks one's self in the presence of a Dutch picture; but before those of Jan Steen we do not feel the same uncertainty. The figures are characteristic, he has carried to a very high degree of perfection the delicacy, life, and precision of the character. However, but how many Jan Steens are there in this school!" With all the good qualities indicated in the above criticism, Jan Steen did not make his fortune; indeed, he scarcely succeeded better in his career as a painter, than as a brewer or tavern-keeper. His pictures, so much prized now, were very poorly paid for during his lifetime. They were only to be found then, says Descamps, at wine merchants' houses. He, however, did not trouble himself much about the prices of his pictures, and had neither the talent to value them nor the inclination to take the trouble of doing so. On all occasions he showed a marked contempt for money. It happened one day, that he received some gold as the price of a picture. Immediately, without listening to his wife, who was unwilling to leave any large sum in his hands, he went to the tavern, spent part of the money in drink, and lost the rest in gaming. His wife, seeing him return happy, and in good humour, asked him what he had done with his money? "I have it no longer," said Steen, laughing, "and the best of the joke is, that the companions who have taken it from me think they have duped me, whilst they are dupes themselves. Of all the gold coins which you saw me with to-day, there is not one that is not light. Now, I leave you to imagine how they will look to-morrow, when they discover it!" Light! this word, so amusing in this particular instance, Jan Steen might apply to life—to his own at least. In fact, nothing weighed him down in an existence, passed in observing men, in laughing at their caprices, and depicting their carousals.

Were we to judge from his pictures, we might suppose that not a cloud of sadness had ever come to trouble the serenity of his mind. It was not that he did not see the discouraging side of things, but he did not give himself up to discouragement; and, inaccessible himself to melancholy, it did not throw its shade upon his compositions. There exists a celebrated picture of his, which is the exact representation of human life. It is in the gallery of the Hague, and we should not be able to abstain from giving a description of it here, had we not found one, simple, striking, and brief, in the catalogue raisonné of this valuable gallery, arranged by M. Van Sicengraecht Van Costkapelle. "The subject," says this connoisseur, "seems to point out the different periods of existence. In the foreground some children are playing with a cat; beyond, a woman is courted by a young man; near the hearth an old man is seated, holding a child on his knee; the old man and the child are amusing themselves with a parrot. A servant is cooking some oysters; in the background several persons drink, smoke, and play. A picture, hung upon the wall behind, represents a gibbet, as if to point out the end reserved for those who give themselves up to excess in drinking and gambling. An opening made into the granary beyond, discovers a young man carelessly reclining and blowing soap-bubbles, with a death's head at his side; an impressive allusion to the vanity and emptiness of life. A thick curtain at the top of the picture is suspended above these various personages, and seems to threaten, by its fall, to end this whole scene of human action. There is nothing in painting more ingenious or more striking than the simple idea of this vast curtain, which immediately gives one to understand, that the scene represented is the "Comedy of Life."

Jan Steen had six children by Margaret Van Goyen, who died before him; but, as if not contented with these, he took it into his head to contract a second marriage with a widow named Mariette Herkulens, who had two children of her own. This large family constantly furnished models to the painter; he delighted to represent them with disordered hair and dress, in all the sprightliness of their frolics, observing the variations of age, from the extreme simplicity of the little girl who plays with a rattle or teases the cat, to the comical gaiety of the lad of fourteen, who already assumes the manners of a man. His old parents also figured in his pictures whenever he wished to represent old age, so that, like a true philosopher, Jan Steen observed the whole human family without leaving his own; and there was nothing, even to his spotted dog, which he did not admit to the honours of painting, and consider worthy to represent his whole race. The Dutch have a proverb, which, when translated, runs thus:—"As the old sing, the young whistle." Wishing to illustrate this saying, and to characterise the pleasures of each age, Jan Steen painted the portraits of all his family, in a picture which may be seen in the Museum of the Hague, and which is rendered still more valuable by the artist's having represented himself, between his two wives, Margaret Van Goyen and Mariette Herkulens. These persons were both good-looking, the first especially, if we may rely upon the brush of their husband, who, however, was not a man likely to flatter either them or himself. Mariette Herkulens sold ready-cooked calves' and sheep's heads and feet in the market. Steen's union with her was not exactly a prudent marriage, and the poor painter saw his increased family sink into the deepest misery; but for this he appears to have shown little concern.

The day of St. Nicholas is in Holland the children's fête, and it is known that on that day fathers and mothers are accustomed to fill the shoes of their little ones with all sorts of playthings and sweetmeats, making them believe that St. Nicholas came during the night to throw these bombons down the chimney for them. Jan Steen has treated this subject in several of his works, and it is evident that, like a good father, he often celebrated the fête of St. Nicholas. With the exception, perhaps, of Hogarth and Wilkie, among the modern artists, no painter—certainly no painter of the Dutch school—has carried the expression of human sentiments, as they are discovered in private and familiar life, to so high a degree of perfection as Jan Steen. What variety of physiognomy; how much truth of character! Whilst from a window in the background the grandmother, playing the part of the saint, throws dainties into the fire-place, the children rush to pick up the presents which the good saint sends them. They hurry forward, push against each other, upset the chairs, and tumble on the ground. A little girl holds out her apron, her eye expressive of hope and faith, and a boy, cap in hand, goes a begging among his more fortunate rivals. A baby, with outstretched arms, seems to claim his share; and the servant, animating the competitors with voice and gesture, seems to say, "You see what it is to be good!" We may repeat what M. Burtin has justly said of Jan Steen, that not only can we perceive the thoughts of each person in this picture, but we seem to hear what he says.* The most amusing and comical figure in this composition is that of a boy of nine or ten years of age, who, carelessly leaning against the chimney-piece, smiles, with an intelligent and superior air, at the innocence of his little brothers, and seems quite proud of knowing that St. Nicholas has nothing to do with the matter. Play of feature could scarcely be rendered with greater truth than in the works of Jan Steen, and, except perhaps Chardin, we should scarcely find his equal, in this respect, among the masters of the French school. The Dutchman has thus secured for himself a lasting celebrity. "So long as there is expression in your pictures," wrote Pope (Ganganelli (Clement XIV.) to an artist friend of his, "you may congratulate yourself upon your works. That constitutes the essence, and renders many faults excusable, which one would not pardon in an ordinary artist."

Houbraken relates, that he long possessed and preserved in his house one of Steen's pictures, which was afterwards sold to the Duke of Wolfenbüttele. The subject of this picture was the signing of a marriage contract. The attitudes and gestures of all the figures are so natural and so expressive, that the spectator imagines himself to be present at the ceremony, and even to take part in it. The two fathers-in-law, completely bent upon asserting their respective claims, are explaining them with much earnestness to the notary, who, pen in hand, listens with a grave and attentive ear. The bridegroom, transported with anger, throws his hat upon the ground, together with the wedding presents. He shrugs his shoulders, raises his hands, and looks at his affianced bride, as if to give her to understand that he takes no part in such vulgar calculations. She appears moved, and as a return of tenderness, casts her eyes, full of gratitude and love upon her future husband. "It must be confessed," says Houbraken, "that this picture is admirable for expression.

Amongst the friends of Jan Steen was the Chevalier Karel de Moor, the celebrated painter of Leyden. In one of the frequent visits which he paid to his countryman, hearing that Mariette Steen had long teased her husband to paint her portrait, and that Steen continually promised, but never kept husband, could not help laughing at this joke, and her portrait, thus completed, appeared to her more charming than ever.

Happy the painters who have excelled in expression, in character! They are certain of renown during their lives, and of fame afterwards. If the number of amateurs who appreciate the properties of touch, delicate impasto, purity and felicity of tone—in short, all that constitutes the technical in art, is limited; on the other hand, almost every body of any his word, Karel de Moor offered to pay her the compliment of executing the long-desired picture. She joyfully accepted his offer, and dressed herself in her smartest clothes for the occasion. The picture finished, Mariette immediately carried it to Jan Steen, who highly approved of it. "There is but one thing wanting," said he, "which I will add." Then, taking his palette and brushes, he painted, in a few strokes, a large basket hanging on her arm, filled with sheep's heads and feet. "You understand," said Steen, "that without this basket you would not be known." The wife, as philosophical as her enlightenment is able to understand the thoughts which an artist has translated by his brush, and is solicitous at least to appear interested in them. We do not mean to say that ingenious turn of thought can compensate, in painting, for feebleness of execution; but, when the execution is sufficiently vigorous to please the eye, it is a great advantage to the popularity of the artist to awaken in us sentiments and ideas, the effectiveness of which is independent of the prejudices of schools and of national and local customs. By working upon the human mind, which has always points of resemblance, one may suit the taste of the most opposite people. Such has been the fortune of Jan Steen, one of the masters of the Dutch school, whose works command the highest prices even in our day. Holland and England, especially, contend for his pictures, which, however, do not always need the indulgence that the comic humour of the painter might fairly claim for them. In fact, if there is a want of uniformity in his painting, if it is sometimes poor, inconsistent, and blame-tures—as, for instance, in the “Sick Young Woman;” but he certainly had two manners. Sometimes his composition is hurried, careless, too uniformly brown in tone, and his colouring seems harsh and inharmonious; sometimes he painted with a clear and exquisite colouring, in the elaborate style of Mieris, but with more liveliness than that master. This latter style is especially marked in Jan Steen’s “Country Wedding,” in the museum of Amsterdam. It is a little chef-d’œuvre, in able, on account of the carelessness of execution; on the other hand, his pictures are often carefully finished and executed with firmness, in the style of Gabriel Metz. They are rendered piquant by a touch of humour, and their tints are charmingly fresh and clear. We do not know whether it is true that all the drunken and disorderly habits, to which Jan Steen abandoned himself, were the cause of the extreme negligence which is observable in certain portions of his pictures, which the light is as well managed, and the execution as rich, as in a Van Ostade. Jan Steen has occasionally the vigour and depth of Peter Van Hooghe, and his painting proves that execution is subordinate to intellect, and that the mind guides the brush at least as much as the hand.

The interiors of Jan Steen, like those of Ostade, are taken from a raised point of view, so that the figures which are in the further part of the room are not hidden by those in the foreground. A second window is generally introduced in his backgrounds, to throw light on the distant figures and objects. Then the number of utensils is less than with the other Dutch painters: Jan Steen had too much sense to multiply them uselessly and without measure. No superfluity is found in his pictures, and if the painter introduce some kettles, a frying-pan, a pestle, or other utensils, it is only to recal the familiarities of domestic life. Like Metzu, Steen liked to paint framed pictures to adorn the walls of his "Repasts," his "Joyous Meetings;" and it is remarkable that these frames are always filled with noble subjects—engagements of the cavalry, heroic landscapes, and fabulous scenes, as, for instance, the conflict between the Centaurs and the Lapithæ.

Jan Steen died, in 1689, at the age of fifty-three. He left nine children, concerning whose future he never troubled himself. The son he had by his second wife was named Thierry, and practised sculpture at the court of a German prince. Of the other children nothing is known.

Dr. Franz Kugler, a most friendly and judicious critic, thus speaks of the character of Jan Steen as an artist:—"His works imply a free and cheerful view of common life, and he treats it with a careless humour, such as seems to deal with all its daily occurrences, high and low, as a laughable masquerade, and a mere scene of perverse absurdity. His treatment of subjects differed essentially from that adopted by other artists. Frequently, indeed, they are the same jolly drinking parties, or the meetings of boozers; but in other masters the object is, for the most part, to depict a certain situation, either quiet or animated, whilst in Jan Steen is generally to be found action, more or less developed, together with all the reciprocal relations and interests between the characters which spring from it. This is accompanied by great force and variety of individual expression, such as evinces the sharpest observation. He is almost the only artist of the Netherlands who has thus, with true genius, brought into full play all these elements of comedy. His technical execution suits his design; it is carefully finished, and notwithstanding the closest attention to minute details, is as firm and correct as it is free and light."

This artist, who never painted for the mere pleasure of painting, has had the honour of being cited by Sir Joshua Reynolds as one of the most eminent masters. He says of him, that if with his genius he had had better models, in point of taste, he might have ranged with the greatest pillars of art. His lasting renown is not to be accounted for by the numerous anecdotes which the Dutch historians have related of his life, and which are all more or less ridiculous, but arises from the fact that his pictures, being full of sense and sly humour, remarkable for expression, and amusing from their comic meaning, delight all those who, not wishing to have their minds uninterested in the admiration of works of art, look for something else in painting than the representation of a carpet, the execution of a silk dress, or the delicacy of a tone.

Jan Steen, perhaps the most jovial and lively of Dutch masters, has treated every kind of subject, domestic, grotesque, and bacchanalian scenes, conversation pieces, landscapes, history, and religion. By his hand are "The Continence of Scipio;" "Jesus Preaching in the Wilderness;" "The Marriage of Cana," &c. &c.; but let us observe that the comic sentiment of the artist penetrates even these compositions.

At any rate, the superintendents of public museums, as well as amateurs, endeavour, with a very justifiable earnestness, to obtain the works of the celebrated Dutchman.

In the royal collection of Windsor Castle there is a fine specimen of Jan Steen's best period. It is the interior of a Dutch cottage, with the inmates preparing for a meal. Although a small picture, being only fifteen inches in height and twelve in breadth, it is full of evidences of Steen's peculiar method of treatment, and homely, though forcible style. It consists of eight figures in all: in the front is a man with a pipe, playing with three children, while a woman is laying a cloth on a table behind, and others are engaged in the processes of cooking at the fire. It is hung in the apartment called the King's closet, between a picture attributed to Andrea del Sarto and a Holy Family of Teniers.

Neither at the National Gallery nor at the collection at Dulwich, which is rather famous for Dutch and Flemish pictures, is there a single specimen from our painter's easel.

In the private galleries of English noblemen and gentlemen, however, there are many pictures illustrative of what may be called low life in the Netherlands. Thus, besides the seven pictures of Jan Steen's in the Queen's private collection, there are several examples of our master's best manner in the possession of Sir Robert Peel, Lord Francis Egerton, Lord Ashburton, the Duke of Wellington, the Earl of Shrewsbury, Mr. Hope, Mr. Munro, the late Mr. Beckford, the Earl of Scarsdale, and the Marquis of Bute, besides numerous genuine Steens in the houses of amateurs of art.

The Queen's private collection at Buckingham Palace contains by far the most rare and excellent examples of the Dutch masters in England. This collection was originally formed by George the Fourth, whose predilection for Flemish and Dutch pictures is well known. Through the agency of Lord Farnborough, many of the most precious specimens of Jan Steen's pencil were secured to this country. Of the seven pictures by this master, the most celebrated in this collection is "A Family Party," in which the painter has introduced himself playing on the violin. The group consists of eleven persons, all of whom are amusing themselves in various ways—card-playing, singing, and laughing. There is a vast deal of humour in this composition, and the treatment is more than commonly careful; but the tone of the colour is considered by artists rather too dark in some parts—an accident which may possibly be the work of time and the picture cleaner. "Twelfth Night," a group of twelve persons, with the king of the revels in the centre. "A Company of Country People indulging in riotous mirth before the door of a Public-house;" "The Card Party," a small composition, consisting of four figures; "The Village Feast," which represents the interior of a tavern, with a number of country people eating, drinking, and dancing; a nameless picture, having for its subject a young lady at the toilet; and one other completes the list. Of the last in our list, Dr. Waagen* does not presume to offer an opinion, though of the "Village Feast," and the "Maiden's Toilet," he speaks in high terms. The one he pronounces to be "full of the happiest and merriest thoughts, but at the same time delicately finished;" and of the other, he says, "that in admirable impasto and spirited execution it rivals the finest Metzu;" and that the "bright masterly graduated light and the cool harmony of the colours, in which blue and purple prevail, make this one of the choicest pictures of the master."

Lord Francis Egerton's collection of paintings—known as the Bridgewater Gallery, from its founder, the duke—is famous also for its examples of the Dutch and Flemish masters. The Village School of Jan Steen, a picture which cost its owner no less a sum than £1,500, and one or two smaller specimens of the same master are deservedly esteemed.

Lord Ashburton's collection of paintings at his house in Piccadilly—permission to view being easily obtainable—is one of the lions of the metropolis. The two specimens of Jan Steen—which hang beside other worthy examples of art from the Netherlands—are especially commendable for "the care and delicacy of their finish, the humour of their incidents, and the warmth of their tones." These quoted words are those of a most learned art-critic; but as one of the finest of these paintings has been selected by our artist for illustration, we may be excused if we dwell a little longer upon its peculiarities. THE GAME OF SKITTLES (p. 13), is one of Jan Steen's most successful pictures; and not its least merit is its entire originality and genuineness—its history, from the celebrated Poulain collection to that of Prince Talleyrand—through seven cabinets, in fact,—having been clearly traced. It is a composition of nine figures, and is painted on panel, 13½ inches in height, and 10¾ inches in width—a size not uncommon with the best of the Dutch masters. Two men are playing at skittles in the foreground, with a couple of boys watching the game; while, on the grass to the left, are seated a young man and woman, the latter drinking from a long Flemish glass, and a man smoking a pipe with a pitcher of liquor before him. A horse belonging to one of the company stands patiently by the fence, an old fellow appears in the field beyond, and looks longingly over at the group upon the grass, and a woman is seen in the background, as if trudging homewards. This picture has been pronounced a "model of picturesque arrangement;" but we may go farther than that, and say, that for careful finish, delicacy of tone, cheerful humour, and freedom from coarseness and vulgarity, this picture of Jan Steen's is superior to many attributed to him. Indeed, the spirited execution of the landscape, in which the effect of a bright evening sunlight is well and feelingly represented, and the minute touches of nature everywhere observable, stamp this as one of the most successful of the Dutchman's pictorial efforts. "Worthy of Cuyp," was the late Mr. Turner's exclamation on looking at this picture when it was first placed in its present position; and worthy indeed it is of all praise, as an incomparable specimen of careful finish and brilliant execution. How different are the manner and moral of the little engraving under the portrait—a reduced copy of a large engraving in the Munich gallery.

In the Duke of Wellington's collection, at Apsley House, are several fine examples of Jan Steen. One of the most striking is that to which we have already referred—"The Topsy Mother." This is really quite a moral lesson. The mother, sleeping off the fumes of the liquor, sits stupidly in the centre of the room, while one of her sons empties her pockets, and two others assist in conveying away the purloined property. The eldest daughter is engaged in an evidently interesting conversation with her lover, while a fiddler romps with the servant-girl. Confusion and riot reign supreme; but with all this, and over and above the humour and truth of the delineation, "this picture has the merit of careful execution and clear colouring."

Mr. Hope's gallery contains three good pictures—"The Glutton," and its companion, "The Christening;" and another of a large company singing and dancing before an ale-house. Of the first, Dr. Waagen says:—"The expression of boundless thoughtlessness and total absorption in transitory sensual pleasure was perhaps never represented in such a masterly manner as in this jolly fellow, who, with his whole face laughing, looks with the most wanton complacency at a pretty girl, who presents a glass of wine to him, while an old woman is opening oysters for him. In the foreground is a dog, and in a back room two gentlemen playing backgammon. The picture of Fortune over the mantel-piece, with the inscription, 'Lightly come, lightly go,' is like similar allusions in Hogarth's pictures. Marked with the artist's name and 1661. The careful execution is at the same time as spirited and free as the conception, the colouring glowing and powerful, the light and shade equal in clearness and depth to De Hooge."

In the collection, formed by the late Mr. Beckford, the author of "Vathek," at Fonthill Abbey, near Bath, was a famous picture, called the "Progress of Intemperance," of which we have already spoken, in page 3. This picture—which is two feet nine inches in height by three feet in width—may be traced through the well-known collections of Danser, Hyman, Smeth, Van Alpen, Sereville, and Dalberg. The sum of 220 guineas, for which it was sold at the dispersion of Mr. Watson Taylor's collection, proves that, even in England, the best pictures are sometimes sold at prices which, compared to those obtained on the continent occasionally, are not considered very high.

Lord Northwick's collection contains the "Marriage of Cana," not a very successful painting; and in the Marquis of Bute's gallery, at Luton, are three pictures by Jan Steen, which are thus described by Dr. Waagen: "1. A Cock-fight. A composition of twelve figures, full of happy thoughts. An old Man holds out his hand to a young Man, to receive payment of a bet, at which another laughs. In clearness of colouring too, in spirited, and, at the same time, careful execution, it is one of the finest works of the master. Two feet ten inches high, three feet nine inches wide.—2. Stragglers plundering a Farm. Most powerfully impressive by its dramatic truth! The desperation of the farmer, who would attack the soldiers with a pitchfork, but is held back by his wife and child; the insolence of the soldiers, one of whom cocks his musket, and another fires at some pigeons, form a striking contrast with two monks, who, enjoying themselves in eating and drinking, endeavour to make peace. Likewise very carefully executed. One foot eight and a-half inches high, one foot eight inches wide.—3. A Girl in white silk, and otherwise elegantly dressed, listens with pleasure to a richly-dressed young man, playing on the lute. An old man, behind a pillar, is watching them. In such pictures, which he rarely painted, Steen is very nearly equal to Metzou in clearness, force, and delicacy, but in general excels him in dramatic interest. One foot three inches high, one foot wide."

The Louvre possesses only one, but it is of a superior quality, although Mr. Smith, and the surveyors of the museum, who, in 1816, valued it at £32, do not consider it a good specimen of the painter's talent. This picture is worth £1,200. It represents a "Village Banquet."

The Belvidere Gallery, at Vienna, contains two, a "Village Wedding," and a "Dutch Family," a capital picture, dated 1663. The figures are one-third the size of life.

At the Pinacothek, at Munich, there are also two, "Some Boors quarrelling;" and "A Doctor feeling the pulse of a Sick Woman."

The Royal Gallery at Dresden contains only one, which represents a "Woman feeding her little Child."

The Royal Museum at Amsterdam is rich in this master's productions, it contains as many as eight. "The Portrait of the artist;" "Villagers returning from a Fête;" "A Scourer;" "The Baker;" "A Quack;" "St. Nicholas' Day, an excellent picture, with a very lively composition;" "The Backgammon Party;" and a "Country Wedding."

At the Hague are six pictures by Jan Steen, "The Family of the Painter;" "Representation of Human Life;" "A Doctor feeling the pulse of a Young Girl;" "A Dentist;" "A Poultry-yard;" and lastly, "A Doctor going to pay a visit to a Sick Person."

The Hermitage, St. Petersburg, "The Sick Girl and the Doctor."

In the Royal Museum of Berlin is found, "A Familiar Scene."

The Frankfort Museum includes "The Interior of a Room;" and a "Doctor dressing a Man's Wounds."

In the Florence Gallery, "Peasants seated at Table in an Arbour;" and "The Young Violinist;" are the only examples of Jan Steen.

In the museums of the departments of France, there are some beautiful works of this master.

At Montpellier are the "Repose of the Traveller;" and "A Familiar Scene." They both bear the signature of the master, and were bequeathed by M. Valdeau to the museum of this town.

At Nantes, there is a single picture of Steen's, called "Topers seated at Table."

Rouen possesses a gem, known as "The Loves of Jan Steen."

In the private collections of noblemen and gentlemen are to be found the most beautiful productions of our lively artist.

At M. Delesserts, in Paris, "The Interior of a Kitchen," and "St. Nicholas' Day."

It was not till lately that Jan Steen's pictures became known in the public sales of France, where their number has never been considerable.

At the Gagnat sale, in 1768, "A Dutch Interior" sold for £18.

At the Duc de Choiseul's sale, 1772, "A Sick Old Man," of which we here give an engraving, fetched £32 10s. "The Interior of an Alehouse," which heads this biography, realized £699 10s.

At the Prince of Conti's sale, 1777, "A Topsy Woman," who is being carried away in a wheelbarrow, while a little boy squirts water at her with a syringe, produced £64.

At the sale of Randon de Boisset, 1777, "The Skittle Players" went for £64.—"The Lesson on the Harpsichord" for £1,200 6s.

At the Calonne sale, 1788, "The Villagers' Dance" fetched

At the Van Leyden sale, 1801, "La Fiancée Précoce" went for £79.

At the Lampérière sale, 1817, "The Doctor and his Young Patient" reached £162, after a smart competition. This is a picture admirable for finish, firmness of touch, and brilliancy of colour. It contains three figures: the sick girl, her mother, and the doctor.

At the Rouge sale, 1818, "The Village Wedding" sold for £72; "La Danse de l'Œuf" for £120; "The Lesson on the Harpsichord" for £281 10s.

THE AGED INVALID.

£81 10s. This picture came from M. de Montriblon's collection.

At the Duc de Praslin's sale, 1792, "The Lesson on the Harpsichord," from Randon de Boisset's collection, produced £52.

At the Robit sale, 1801, "The Dancing Dog," which we here give (p. 8.), was purchased for £112. This picture came from the rich collection of M. Nogaret.

At the Lanjeac sale, 1802, "The Skittle Players," from the cabinet of Randon de Boisset, was knocked down for £116, and "The Betrothal," for £70.

At the Lampérière sale, 1823, "A Familiar Scene" was purchased for £60; and "The Comic Concert" for £19.

At M. Erard's sale, 1832, "The Village Wedding" brought £196; "The Pleasures of the Kermess" £75.

At the sale of the Duc de Berri, 1837, "The Marriage of Cana" sold for £540. This picture has been added to Van Leyden's celebrated collection; it was the delight of the dowager, to whom it was brought every day, as a powerful specific against ennui, thoughts of sorrow, and of her approaching end!

At the Heris' sale, 1841, the picture called "Indisposition" went for £224; and "The Wedding" for £112.

At the sale of the Count Perreux, 1841, "The Servant Girl dressed in a red Boddice" fetched £398.

At Paul Perrier's sale, in 1843, "The Marriage of Cana," from the collection of Duc de Berri, was purchased for £660.

£182 10s. The painting in this last picture seems to bid defiance to Terburg, Gerard Douw, or Metzua, on account of its elaborate finish and the beauty of the touch.

The drawings of Jan Steen are, like his paintings, full of animation and wit. We have seen a charming one, containing thirteen figures, amongst which is that of a little boy, who is beating a drum before the door of a house.

THE SKITTLE PLAYERS.

At the Vasserot sale, in 1845, the well-known picture "Resistance," and its companion, "The lost Bird," sold together for £90.

At the Meffre sale, in 1845, the "Fête des Seigneurs," sold for £268.

At Cardinal Fesch's sale, at Rome, in 1845, "The jovial Repast" went for £328, and "The after-dinner Nap" for SALE OF MR. WOODBURN'S PICTURES.

The late Mr. Woodburn was well known as a collector of paintings, and often employed in that capacity, not merely by noblemen and gentlemen, but also by government. His collection of pictures, including works of the Italian, Flemish, Dutch, and German schools, was recently put up for sale by public auction. As might be expected from the position he occupied, many of them are productions of a high order, and the large sums for which they were sold showed the estimation in which they are held by connoisseurs. Of the Italian school, three were described as Raffaelles, several as specimens of Leonardo da Vinci, and one as the work of Buonarroti. Doubts have been expressed as to the authenticity of some of these, particularly that of "Christ bearing a Cross," by Da Vinci, and the "Saint John," by Raffaele. These doubts are founded partly on the anatomical modelling of the figures, and partly on the elaborate foldings of the drapery. That they were pretty generally entertained, is proved by the prices at which these pictures were knocked down. The total proceeds of the sale were £7,500. Among the paintings which sold best were the following:—"The Madonna of the Immaculate Conception," which was painted by Murillo for the Royal Family of Spain, and once belonged to the Infante Don Gabriel, was purchased by Mr. Farrar for 1,000 guineas. It is described in the catalogue as "the finest in England." Mr. Uwins bought "The Adoration of the Virgin," by Giorgione, for 500 guineas, in the name of the government. This picture represents the Virgin sitting with the infant Jesus, St. Joseph by her side, and a Venetian general in armour kneeling before her, while his horse is held by a page. A convent is seen in the distance. The composition of the picture is strange, but the colouring is very rich and the treatment majestic, especially that of the Holy Mother, whose attitude and features display great spirituality. "The Magdalen," by Titian, fetched 210 guineas. "A Spacious Landscape, with a Village on a River and Figures," painted by Wouvermans, and bearing date 1699, formerly in the Duchess de Berri's gallery, realised 405 guineas. "The Virgin Weeping over the Body of Christ," by Guercino, produced 250 guineas; "The Holy Family," by Vaga, 370 guineas; "The Marriage of Saint Catherine," by Poussin, 175 guineas; "The Virgin and Saint Joseph kneeling over the infant Jesus," by Perugino, 153 guineas; "The Tribute Money," a composition of twelve figures, by Rembrandt, engraved by M'Ardehll, 380 guineas; "The Virgin," by Raffaellini, 145 guineas; "Saint John, in a Landscape, Preaching," by Raffaele, 135 guineas. Other lots were—"Bacchus and Ariadne on the Shore of the Island of Naxos, with Nymphs and Satyrs," by Guido, for 145 guineas; "The Virgin," by Hemling, for 121 guineas; two paintings of rural scenes, by Cuypp, for 115 guineas each; "A Landscape," by Wouvermans, for 181 guineas; "An Italian Landscape," by Wilson, for 150 guineas; "A Classical Landscape," by Claude, for 101 guineas; "A Frozen River, with a Village," by Van der Neer, for 100 guineas; "An Interior," by Terburg, for 93 guineas; and "The Duke of Urbino receiving the Order of the Garter," by Francesca, for 80 guineas. This last was purchased by Colonel Phipps.

THE WATERFALL, BY RUYSDAEL.

THE works of Jacob Ruysdael—who was born in Haarlem in 1636, the same year as Jan Steen, and died in 1681, a few years before his comic contemporary—present a great and astonishing contrast to those we have just had under review. If Steen was well known for his genre and conversation pieces, Ruysdael was as famous for his shadowy landscapes, and exquisite, because natural, sea-pieces. This painter, says Sir Edmund Head, is the master whose pictures form the proper type and centre of the whole school of Dutch landscape. In his works, as in those of the great painter of ideal landscape, Claude Lorraine, natural objects are treated in a manner which appears to manifest the influence of a higher spirit; but the means adopted by these two artists were very different. Ruysdael did not need to decorate the ordinary forms of nature, or dress her up in a holiday garb, in order to bring her nearer to something which was divine. Each single object, however homely and familiar, provided it had not been cramped and regulated by the hand of man—the green meadows, the silent sweep of the clouds, the murmuring trees or brook—all breathe the pure and lofty feeling of that higher spirit. His paintings are in fact a renewal of that old worship of the spirit of nature which the Roman historian has ascribed to the ancient Germans. Yet there is in his pictures much that relates to the busy toil of man, but such features in general stand in feeble opposition to the overwhelming mass of natural objects, and the traces of human works often appear as mere ruins which have long yielded to the powerful operation of the elements. Thus it is that the pictures of Ruysdael form the strongest possible contrast to those of Waterloos and other painters.

Ruysdael's subjects are taken from the scenery of the north, although the tunc form of nature which he saw in his immediate neighbourhood rarely satisfied him; or when he did adopt it for his model, he generally impressed on it a feeling of mournful solitude. A simple picture in the Berlin Museum is a good example. It represents an old peasant's hut, behind which are leafy oaks; a little stream runs close by at the foot of a wooded hill, bubbling over bushes and stones; lowering shadows from the clouds are cast over the picture; a bright gleam of sun falls on the stem of an old willow, which stretches itself upwards like a spectre in the foreground; the scenery is secluded and inhospitable; we feel the desolation in which the inhabitants of the cottage must dream away their existence. Other compositions of this kind bring before us the solitude of shady canals, or the depths of a thick wood, enlivened by the passing bustle of a stag-hunt. In some the works of man form the point of interest, but decayed and ruined by the elements. Of this class is the celebrated "Monastery" of the Dresden Gallery—a picture of a deep and peculiar poetic character—but above all his "Churchyard," in the same collection. In this last we see in the background the ruins of a once mighty church, obscured by a passing storm of rain; the whole scene around is wild and desolate, partly covered with bushes and brambles or with aged and decayed trees. This wildness extends even to the churchyard, in which monuments of varied forms give evidence of its former importance. A foaming stream in the foreground finds its way into the waste, even through the tombs, whilst a gleam of sun lights up its eddies and the adjoining graves.

Ruysdael more frequently delineated nature in her grander forms, such as rocky heights surrounded by woods, and torrents rushing between cliffs; sometimes he added a lonely dwelling, which, by its contrast, strengthens rather than softens the horror of the scene, or a shepherd who silently passes on his way over the light bridge. Frequently the scene is perfect solitude, in which the voice of the waters seems to be unbroken by any other sound; on a distant height, perhaps, is a solitary chapel, with the moon behind it, whose beams play upon the foaming waves and dart their single rays of light into the darkness. Pictures such as these are most widely dispersed, and the galleries of Munich, Dresden, Vienna, and the Hague, possess a great number of them. They all display the silent power of Nature, who opposes with her mighty hand the petty activity of man, and with a solemn warning, as it were, repels his encroachments.

In Ruysdael's admirable representations of the sea we find the same grand repose, and the same thorough life and motion of the element. In this line of art also he has executed first-rate works. A large and most excellent sea-piece, with a brisk swell and rain-clouds clearing off, is in the Gallery of the Berlin Museum.

Her Majesty's private gallery contains one picture by Ruysdael; that of Lord Francis Egerton no less than six; and Professor Waagen ascribes to this master another work in the same collection, which usually bears the name of Hobbema. Sir Robert Peel has three fine Ruysdaels: Lord Ashburton's are still more numerous. Besides these, the collections of Sir Abraham Hume, Mr. Wells, and Mr. Hope, must be specially referred to. Waagen speaks with peculiar admiration of a large picture belonging to Mr. Sanderson, and mentions the Ruysdaels at Burligh and at Luton; more particularly a rare specimen in the latter collection, of the interior of a church, with figures by Philip Wouverman. The small but exquisite picture called "Les Petits Canards," which Smith, in 1834, valued at 150 guineas, sold in 1844 for 360 guineas, at Harman's sale. It should be added that the Louvre, as well as the Gallery of the Hermitage, contains some very fine Ruysdaels.

The exquisite picture on the next page may be considered a good specimen of Ruysdael's most popular manner. In it rock and water, cloud and verdure, action and repose, are blended together in a manner at once natural and magnificent. The name of Ruysdael is said to signify roaring or foaming water; "and thus," says Descamps, "he seemed predestined by his name to be the painter of Cascades." Houbraken, too, makes no reservation when he praises the transparency and brilliancy of the water in Ruysdael's pictures. "Where is the traveller familiar with the impressive beauties of mountainous countries who cannot find them in the pictures of this great master? At the foot of those steep rocks, how the water falls, foams, and writhes round the ruins it has brought down! It dashes forward from the right, from the left, and from the background of the picture towards the gulf which draws it in; it rushes down, we were about to say, with a hollow noise, for in fact we imagine we can almost hear it. We see it gliding down the slippery rocks, dashing against the rough bark of the trees, and gushing down the rugged bottom of the ravine. We fancy we feel the cold and humid spray falling on our faces. To the left, upon one of the rocks which bound the torrent, is perched a frail cottage, close upon the noisy abyss; and the fragility of this edifice, erected there by the bold hand of some hermit, excites an apprehension as we approach it of some violent assault of the waters that so closely besiege the feeble dwelling. The sky is cloudy, the air oppressed with fog, and great birds are soaring through the loftiest regions of space. The trees are motionless, because the winds have no access to this narrow and confined retreat. The vegetation around it is in admirable vigour. On every rocky point that contains a little earth a tree has taken root. But such is the power of genius, that after having seen in all its magnificent reality the spectacle which the artist has reproduced on a piece of canvas of some few inches in magnitude, nature herself seems to us less grand and less startling than the work of Ruysdael!"

While on the subject of so celebrated a landscape painter, a question of high importance occurs, which had already been raised by the study of Claude Lorraine. Is not the beautiful in art only an imitation of the beautiful in nature? We are of opinion that it is not, and for this reason—but here we must quote the words of a man of taste and genius, an amiable writer, a painter with the pen, who will give our reason better than we could ourselves. "I have here upon my right a fine tree; a vigorous oak, young, leafy, even that of which—

'Le front au Caucase pareil,
Non content d'arrêter les rayons du soleil,
Brave l'effort de la tempête.'

"Ruysdael, approach! and with those dark mysterious touches peculiar to thy sombre colouring, with those transparent shadows wherein thou knowest how to plunge the branches, paint us this colossus in all its beauty. Forget not, we pray thee, the harmonious figures of this unstained bark;

nor, higher up towards the north, those few leaves which, chilled and tardy in blowing, shelter beneath the stems of their elders their still fragile stalks and tender verdure. On the other hand, I have here upon my left an oak lopped and thick set, recently mutilated by the wood-cutters; it is nothing more than a knotty and twisted trunk, which from its base to its summit has sprouted forth in unequal twigs; on this side the ants have built their granaries in its gaping flanks, and we can see from its oozing and rotten caverns, black and slimy, the sap exuding from the diseased wood. Approach, in thy turn, Karel Dujardin, and with that charm of simplicity, that unaffected feeling, which breathe in thine artless execution, paint for us this pollard stump amidst all its sickly poverty. Forget not, I pray thee, those distorted swellings, those warts which surmount, like downy hair, the tufts of abortive stems, nor those humid black spots which hang like beads of soot upon the hollow channel of the pith.

"Our two pictures being finished, let the amateur enter, and let us observe him. He is ravished, transported. But this seems absurd, for he has certainly seen, many a time, upon the plain or the hill side, without even noticing them, as beautiful oaks as the one, and still more mutilated pollards than the other. How comes it to pass, then, that, on being thus reproduced upon canvas, these two trees yield him so much pleasure? How is it that already they seem not to be trees he is contemplating, but objects which give him pleasure, which affect him, which speak to him; words and language in which he reads some charming thought, expressed with grace and poetry that transport him? It is already clear that this oak, the production of Ruysdael, says things which our oak, the production of the acorn, does not say, and that if fine oaks do spring from the earth, it is nevertheless, in reality, this fine production of Ruysdael's art, and not this fine produce of the earth, which ravishes and transports the amateur."

Amateurs, who above all look at the painting, that is, the execution of a picture, remark in Ruysdael nothing of his touch (for it is blended and but slightly visible, in comparison especially with the impasto style of Hobbema) but those warm and bituminous grounds which give so much vigour to his tones, and serve as a basis to their harmony; then the cleverness with which he could render this preparation cold again by a general tint of a bluish and pearly-gray, which is more in accordance with the cast of his reveries; they admire the perfection of his foliage, which, instead of being rounded and a peu près, like that of many painters, is rendered with a precision and a tremulous touch imitating the cut-out leaf of parsley; but what they admire above all, are the transparency, the lightness, and depth of his skies. In Ruysdael's clouds are found at once the most beautiful forms of nature and its finest colours and movements. Sometimes they are seen floating rapidly through space, and casting their fleeting shadows over the country; sometimes they are sailing through the firmament with a majestic slowness. The illusion is always complete; the eye follows them, and expects at every instant to see them disappear. In the representation of clouds, Ruysdael has never been surpassed, or even equalled, unless by Guillaume van de Velde and Karel Dujardin; he excels especially in the art of representing those bursts of light when the sun suddenly disperses the rainy clouds and banishes them to the extremity of the horizon. This glimpse of the sky between two storms, this pale and fugitive smile of nature, have been cheering to the artist; they have at least soothed for an instant the morbid melancholy of his heart, and he has therefore rendered them with all the power of his genius. Nothing can be more wonderful in this way than the "Coup de Soleil," at the Louvre, known amongst artists as the "Thicket of Ruysdael." To attempt a description would be useless: how is it possible to describe a picture which is simply composed of a large dark thicket and a sandy road gilded by a sunbeam?

Grandeur is a quality of the mind. Thus we see how Ruysdael, in his landscapes of two or three feet square, has succeeded in producing the illusion of profound solitude and infinite space. To produce such great effects, he employed very few means. Trees, water, and sky,—these are all his machinery: men and animals seldom intervene, or they are monuments of man. Passion, then, was the genius of Ruysdael. What renders his pictures inestimable is, that he has, so to speak, enclosed under their glaze his most intimate and secret sentiments; and on seeing so rare a mixture of ineffable poetry and strict precision, it may be said that he painted his landscapes in the obscure chamber of his soul.

Like a true poet, this great painter lived poor, and died young on the 16th of November, 1681.

CASCADE DE TERNI. FROM A PAINTING BY THE LATE J. M. W. TURNER, R.A.

TURNER.

WE purpose presenting to the reader two or three specimens of the works of the masters of modern times, for the purpose of supplying him with a few random recollections of the men and their works.

The name of the late J. M. W. Turner has for years been the war cry of one of the great art factions in England, and his pictures have served much the same purpose as the famous shield, about the colour of which two knights-errant belaboured each other all day long, though neither had seen more than one side. He never exhibited a picture in the Academy that did not give rise to the fiercest disputes and recrimination, which were often carried far beyond their legitimate sphere or object. Since his death, however, his works have gradually been assuming their proper rank, and there is hardly a doubt that at the present moment they stand as high in the estimation of all competent judges as those of any artist, either of ancient or of modern times.

We shall now endeavour to put the reader in possession of those points in which he is considered to excel, and those in which he is said to be deficient by those who have devoted most time to the study of his works, and their comparison with the productions of "the great masters."

Before Turner's time landscape painting in England partook very much of the character of young ladies' drawings, or the steel engravings in annuals, at least so far as regarded the subjects chosen. These were generally moonlight scenes, calm sunsets with clear skies, shady valleys, and river banks at summer noon-day. Little change was ever seen in the character of the atmosphere or hue of the sky. People were beginning to get tired of this, when Turner appeared to supply them with a change of fare.

Turner, strange to say, is the only painter who has ever represented the surface of calm, or the force of agitated, water with precision and fidelity. He has obtained this expression of force in falling or running water by fearless and full rendering of its forms. He goes down with the stream or cataract, but never loses himself and his subject in the splash of the fall, or forgets to follow out the details. He does not blind us with spray, or veil the countenance of his fall in its own drapery. It is easy to give the appearance of indiscriminate foam; but nature gives more than foam, she shows beneath and through a distinct outline and character for each wave, and bend, and jet—in short, throws a character of definiteness over the whole. Now Turner is remarkable, above all things, for his dislike of generalities, and for his love of definiteness, and he accordingly discards every thing that conceals or overloads it. In the "Cascade of Terni," one of his Italian views, the whole basin of the fall is blue and dim with rising vapour, and is arched by a rainbow; but, nevertheless, the attention of the spectator is mainly directed to the concentric zones and delicate curves of the falling water itself. The great mistake of most other painters has been that they have given the water a springing parabolic descent, as if it were an enraged prisoner springing eagerly from his bonds: they give it an appearance of activity. Now falling water is in reality, to all appearance, helpless and lifeless, a heavy falling body. Water may hop over a stone, but it tumbles over a fall, abandons itself wholly to the air, and the descent becomes a dead weight. It is the expression of this hopeless abandonment, this utter prostration—if we may so speak—for which Turner is famous. There is no muscle, or sinew, or wiriness, or self-control in his cataracts.

He displays the same wonderful powers of perspective in his treatment of the water as it flows among the rocks after its descent. Water, when once it finds itself in the bed of the river, and commences its onward course, when it meets with any obstructions, does not rush madly onward after surmounting them, but rests awhile in the hollow on the other side, and so it goes on, alternately gurgling round the stones in its way, and then resting again. But if it be going down a steep descent, so that its motion is much accelerated by flowing down a steep incline, it leaps manfully over the first obstacle in its way; and instead of resting now, it leaps again over the next with increased momentum; and so on in a succession of leaps, until its surface becomes a series of undulations. Turner seizes on these curved lines of torrent, not only as being among the most beautiful forms of nature, but because they are a constant expression of power and velocity, and tell us how the torrent has been flowing before we see it. The leap and splash may occasionally be seen in any quiet lowland scene, but the undulating line is the peculiar attribute of the mountain torrent which has been rushing mid foam and fury, for miles, over rock and fall.

His "Rising Squall, Hot Wells," from St. Vincent's Rock, Bristol, was the first of his works in which he displayed the wonderful mastery of effect for which he afterwards became so famous. He displayed at the very outset one of his chief characteristics, his intense and invariable nationality. The works upon which his fame will longest rest are those in which he has drawn his materials from English life and scenery, and all his foreign scenes, though crowded with surpassing excellences, are still faulty and immeasurably inferior. The author of "Modern Painters" has made the choice of home subjects an essential requisite to success in any department of art, and asserts that no one who has lost sight of this has ever achieved anything striking or original. The Madonna of Raphael is a girl of the Urbino mountains, where he himself was born and reared; Gherlandago's is a Florentine, Bellini's a Venetian. This is a position which it is hard to dispute. No scenery can ever make, or ever leave, the same impression in our minds as that amidst which our childhood has been passed, and with which our eye from the earliest dawn of observation has grown fondly familiar. To him who has been born amongst the Yorkshire hills and moors, or the downs and slopes of Sussex, no Alpine heights can ever form so striking a picture as to displace from his memory still earlier and far tenderer recollections. Sublimity, grandeur, magnificence, beauty—all give way before the force of habit, for habit it is which trains us to love places or features of scenery which are hallowed by their associations, and so to love them, that, after years of absence, it needs no second visit to enable us to describe them as if they lay before us. It is very much with painting as with language. A man's mother tongue is the only one he can ever speak with grace, force, and precision. He may discourse in foreign languages with fluency and correctness, but every one perceives he is speaking stiffly and by rule, or "speaking like a book," to use a common but most expressive phrase.

This rule is, perhaps, better exemplified in Turner's case than that of any artist in modern times; because his labours embraced a wider range of subjects than those of any other. In his earlier drawings the influence of Yorkshire scenery may be traced unmistakably—the rounded forms of his hills, and the singular massiveness in his mountain drawings, from which they derive so much of their grandeur—the disregard of effect, the strong love of place, and the intense appreciation of local minutiae. The sale of his drawings supplied him, at a comparatively early period, with the means of travelling, an advantage of which he fully availed himself, and the sketches which he made while on the continent were combined with a large number of drawings of English scenes, in the "Liber Studiorum," a work which he published in imitation of Claude's "Liber Veritatis," but on a much larger scale. The proportion of English subjects to foreign was, however, as two to one, and though the latter comprised some of the grandest and most striking scenes of the Alps, which were peculiarly adapted to the nature of his genius, the former were of a kind peculiarly simple and of everyday occurrence, such as the "Pembury Mill," the "Farm Yard," "Composition," with the White Horse, that with the Cocks and Pigs, "Hedging and Ditching," "Watercress Gatherers," a "Scene at Twickenham," and a very fine drawing called the "Water Mill." The architectural subjects, too, instead of being taken from some of the immense buildings of the French, are almost exclusively English, many of them taken from spots entirely unknown to fame, Rivaulx, Holy Island, Dunblain, Dunstanborough, Chepstow, St. Katharine's, Greenwich Hospital, an English Parish Church, a Saxon Ruin, and an English lowland Castle, with a Brook, Wooden Bridge, and Wild Duck. The foreign architectural subjects are three in number, and these displaying but little merit. The same remarkable contrast is observed in his execution of the trees, the flowers, the rocks, and even the figures and the costume. English trees, the monarch oak, the horse chestnut, the beach, the ash, the elm, are the only ones he can portray with truth and grace. English faces and dress are the only ones that he can handle easily and familiarly. All these are so many proofs, not so much that he lost his power of perception when he set foot on foreign soil, as that his intense nationality never lost hold of him so as to enable him to divest his mind sufficiently of his home impressions.

After England, he appears to have handled the scenery of France with most success, because, of all the countries of the continent, it is that which in its leading characteristics most resembles England. For grace of stem and perfection of foliage, the French hills are altogether unmatched, and for the study of grace no country in Europe can equal France; so that an artist who wishes to perfect himself on this point can find no better ground. This is true, not merely of the mountainous districts about which tourists rove, and which untravelling readers long to visit—Provence, Auvergne, or the Vosges, but Lowland France, Picardy, Normandy, and the pleasant valleys of the Seine and the Loire. Turner seems to have been the first artist, at least in England, who found this out, and he is consequently the only Englishman who has painted French landscapes with truth, effect, and feeling—some will say the only man of any nation; for many people, amongst others, Mr. Ruskin, deny French landscape painters all power of achieving anything better than wasting good canvas, and wearing out good brushes.

In Switzerland he achieved some brilliant successes; the atmospheric phenomena in the high regions, the wild mountain scenery, accorded well with his taste and genius. But in most of his attempts he failed signally to give an effectual rendering of Italian scenery. He seems never to have been able to enter into the spirit of it, and whenever he made an effort to produce a classical subject, he showed clearly that he neither possessed the knowledge nor the feeling necessary for the task. He drew some vignettes, however, for Rogers' beautiful poem "Italy," and in them he has displayed excellence of the highest order, and seems for the first and only time really to have entered into the spirit of the Italian scenery; but his success is owing chiefly to the simplicity of most of the views and the smallness of their size. His larger pictures are full of inaccuracies, of mistakes, and misconceptions. The chief cause of these failures was, no doubt, his attempt to spread an air of joyousness and brilliancy over scenes that are peculiarly pensive, if not melancholy, to substitute radiance for serenity and fixity of light, and to give the broad, open, and free character of English downs and Scotch moors to a country cabin'd and cribb'd by walls, convents, and terraces. In his earliest works, Turner showed, amidst his many defects, that he was constantly in the habit of referring to nature, and thus atoned for numerous faults that might otherwise have been considered inexcusable. But he gave evidence that, if he but fulfilled the promise that his productions already afforded, he would effect a total change in the received system of art, and he did effect this change.

He had not laboured very long in his vocation when he began to feel that the real colour of nature had never been faithfully rendered by any school of art. It was impossible that this should escape a man whose devotion to nature was so intense, and whose perceptions were so acute. The Venetians, it is true, had given conventional representations of sunlight and twilight, by making the whites golden and the blues green; but no one had ever given an adequate idea of the brilliant, joyous, all-pervading light of the sun, and the million varying hues which external objects assume under its influence. The finish of nature, too, and the grandeur of nature with regard to particular objects, had been given by many masters; but her fulness, space, and mystery, by none.

To show what changes he effected regarding colour, we must digress a little, in order to explain. Most people have heard the word "tone" used in reference to pictures by connoisseurs, but few really know what is meant by it, and probably many of the connoisseurs are as ignorant as any. Tone has two meanings:—First, "the exact relief and relation of objects against and to each other in substance and in darkness, according as they are nearer or more distant, and the perfect relation of the shades of all of them to the chief light of the picture, whether that be sky, water, or anything else. Secondly, the exact relation of the colours of the shadows to the colours of the lights, so that they may be felt to be merely different degrees of the same light; and the accurate relation among the illuminated parts themselves with respect to the degree in which they are influenced by the colour of light itself, whether warm or cold; so that the whole of the picture, or where several tones are united, the parts which are under each may be felt to be in one climate, under one kind of light, and in one kind of atmosphere; this being chiefly dependent upon that peculiar and inexplicable quality of each colour laid on, which makes the eye feel both what is the actual colour of the object represented, and that it is raised to its apparent pitch by illumination."

The old masters were all considered great in tone, but they, nevertheless, committed a great mistake in giving the dark objects in the middle distance precisely the same relation to the light of the sky which they have in nature; the light being necessarily infinitely lowered, and the shadow deepened in the same degree. But we must remember that nature surpasses us in her power of producing light, just as much as the sun does white paper; and surpasses us also infinitely in her power of producing shade. So if we start with our best white for the brightest light, and go down our scale, tint for tint, step by step, against nature, we very soon get to our deepest black—lamp-black, which, let it be ever so black, still reflects light from its surface. But nature can give shades still darker, down to total vacuity, from which no ray of light is ever reflected. What, then, becomes of all our intermediate degrees? If we give the same quantity of distance in pitch of shade that nature does, we must pay for this expenditure of our means by totally missing half-a-dozen distances no less important, and in nature no less marked. But this the old masters did. "They chose," says Mr. Ruskin, "those steps of distance which are most conspicuous and noticeable—that, for instance, from sky to foliage, or from clouds to hills, and they gave these their precise pitch of difference in shade with exquisite accuracy of imitation. Their means were then exhausted, and they were obliged to leave their trees flat masses of mere filled-up outline. Turner starts from the beginning with a totally different principle. He boldly takes pure white (and justly, for it is the sign of the most intense sunbeams) for his highest light, and lamp-black for his deepest shade, and between these he makes every degree of shade indicative of a separate degree of distance, giving each step of approach, not the exact difference in pitch which it would have in nature, but a difference bearing the same proportion to that which his sum of possible shade bears to the sum of nature's shade; so that an object half-way between his horizon and the foreground will be in exactly of half tint force, and every minute division of intermediate space will have just its proportionate share of the lesser sum and no more. Hence, where the old master expressed one distance, he expresses a hundred, and where they said furlongs, he says leagues."

This was a bold step for a modern artist to take, and it failed not to bring down on him a load of obloquy; but the man's total indifference either to praise or censure rendered him careless of any unpleasant remark that might be handed about regarding the artist. His innovations in colour were as great as those in tone. He surpassed, not only the old masters, but all painters of modern times, in brilliancy. But there can be no question that he was right, and they wrong. When we remember the intense light which nature throws over every object in the external world, so intense and so brilliant, that were a scarlet flower or a blade of grass placed beside any landscape painting, the grandest tints that were ever placed on canvas would seem faint and faded in comparison. If a window were suddenly opened in a room in the Royal Academy, for instance, and the full light of a tropical sunset poured in, how dim and dark and unnatural would every painting on the walls look in comparison with the gorgeous hues of nature. If Turner merely attempted to bring the colouring of painting up to the standard of the great originals, he was certainly not deserving of censure.

an existence. Hence, the deep and intense feeling which is displayed in most of the works of the old masters—in the "Crucifixions;" the "Descents from the Cross;" the "Adorations of the Magi;" the "Transfigurations;" the "Assumptions," the "Flights into Egypt," the "Last Suppers," of Da Vinci, Raffaele, Rubens, Titian, and Michael Angelo. What they sorrowed over and wept over as a personal grief, we believe as historical facts. They were all that the imagination had to dwell upon. The great and almost boundless field for thought which modern science has since opened up, the great chronicles of the ancient world, which were then unknown, but are now familiar in every mouth, the "wide, wide world of fancy," which modern literature has laid before

SCENE FROM THE FOUR STAGES OF CRUELTY, BY WILLIAM HOOARTH.

The extent to which authors are at the present day aided in the utterance of their thoughts by illustrations, is one of the most wonderful phenomena of the age. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, when the romance of religion, if we may so speak, had possession of the public mind, artists endeavoured to give expression to the general sentiment, by painting subjects drawn from the early history of Christianity. The whole intellectual life of their day lay in the records of the sufferings and triumphs of the Saviour, his Mother, and his Apostles. The passion which was then thrown into faith and worship, was such as we, in our cold reasoning belief, can form no conception of. That artists should not only partake of this enthusiasm but should give it utterance, is what might have been expected when literature, properly so called, had scarcely us, the rich store of incident and adventure, with which modern history has furnished us, and all the glorious light of beauty and value which modern research has thrown on a thousand objects which, in the middle ages, were spurned as useless or vile—all these were then unknown. The mind had nothing to dwell upon but sacred history, and in the study and delineation of this all its passions, and hopes, its ardour, its intensity of feeling, its power of execution, and its keenness of perception, were lavished with an open and ready hand. In this there is nothing for us to regret. We can walk through no gallery in Europe without feeling thankful that this outpouring of genius and enthusiasm was confined to so narrow a channel. Had it been shallowed by running over a wider space it might have produced greater variety, but not half so great excellence. The tendencies of modern art, so far as regards the choice of subjects, have been widely different. History has supplied a rich store of stirring incident for the display on canvas of the noblest as well as basest passions of the human heart. There have been few grand self-sacrifices, few instances of deep devotion, of lofty resignation, few hair-breadth escapes or valorous exploits which have not had their painter as well as their chronicler. Goodness knows; some of them are only too familiar. We have been present at too many interviews between Richard Cœur de Lion and the archer who shot him; we have too often watched the meeting of Henry and Francis on the Field of the Cloth of Gold; the unconstitutional act of Cromwell in turning the Long Parliament out of doors has been so often repeated in our presence, that we are ashamed to confess we have lost that abhorrence for it, which, as a free born Englishman, we are bound to feel; Thomas à Beckett has been so often murdered before our eyes that our notions of right and wrong have become, in reference to this particular occurrence, somewhat confused, and losing possess talents of no common order to save him from the ordinary fate of bores.

It is the less excusable when the literature of fiction offers so boundless a field for illustration. Many a man, whose mind is not sufficiently imbued with the spirit, feelings, and manners of past ages to give to an historical scene all its force, and brilliancy, and precision, may body forth the conceptions of a poet or novelist with passing grace and fidelity. It is easier to seize upon the idea of one man and reproduce it, than to give form and colouring to the thoughts of an age, or the acts of a whole people. We can imagine no more grateful task for a man of taste and sensibility than giving to the airy nothings of the writer a local habitation and a name, reproducing, with all the tints and lines, the form, and features, and expression of life—what had entered in at the ear as but a vague and fleeting image. Let words sketch ever so well, — let a written description be ever so minute, ever so precise, ever so forcible and brilliant, it will fall far short of leaving on the memory an impression so distinct as a picture. The all sympathy for the unhappy prelate, we have been tempted to consign, not only his assassins, but himself to the charge of a person who shall be nameless. History is certainly a field broad enough to prevent this travelling in the beaten track, and any artist who persists in inflicting upon the public his version of stories that have been often told already, must eye is ever a more faithful servant than the ear. But for the canvas of Kneller, Macaulay might have sketched the personal appearance of many of the heroes of the English revolution in vain: gorgeous as is his description of the trial of Hastings, until we see it painted, our impressions of it must be feeble and fleeting.

HOGARTH.

WILLIAM HOGARTH was one of the great humourists of the eighteenth century. He filled the place in English art which Fielding and Smollett filled in English literature. Though often considered a mere caricaturist, he was, in reality, a powerful preacher of great truths, a rebuker of folly, and an enforcer and commender of virtue and morality. He knew well the truth of Horace's maxim—and he made ridicule his vocation. There was nothing cold, harsh, or misanthropic in it. It was not the ridicule of Voltaire—sneering hatred or contempt—but the ridicule of Addison—smiling, kindly rebuking of faults which it half excused.

Hogarth first saw the light in the parish of St. Bartholomew the Great, London, on the 10th of December, 1697. The epoch of fashionable folly, town scandal, wits, coffee-houses, and theatres, had just set in, after the stormy political struggles by which English society had been convulsed, during the beginning and the middle of the seventeenth century. Vice and prodigality had taken the place of the stern simplicity and virtue of the Round-heads. He was the son of a man who wrote school-books, and acted as a general hack to the London booksellers; and the privations and suffering which he underwent were quite sufficient to warn William not to follow in his footsteps. The latter, therefore, abandoned the idea of becoming a classical scholar, and served his apprenticeship with a silver plate engraver. He had, however, acquired knowledge enough to save him from the charge of being an uneducated man, and to enable him to pursue his studies, whenever occasion served, with pleasure and effect. His principal employment in his new sphere of labour was that of engraving the devices of heraldry upon plate and other articles of luxury, and he appears to have displayed diligence and application enough not only to satisfy, but materially to assist his master. He soon grew tired of heraldry, and as soon as his indentures had expired abandoned it. But practice had made him a skilful draughtsman as well as a careful and accurate engraver—no trifling advantages in any walk of art which he might choose to follow. From his earliest attempts in drawing, except designs, he had studiously refrained from copying anything but nature. Copying other men's works he thought resembled pouring water out of one vessel into another. He therefore exercised his memory and imagination as much as lay in his power. After preparation such as this, it was natural to expect something striking and original, and Hogarth made his debut as a satirist. The incident which revealed the bent of his talents was amusing enough. He went one Sunday to Highgate with two of his companions, during his apprenticeship. The weather was warm, and they went into a roadside alehouse, and called for beer. Some persons, who had previously entered, were already waxing quarrelsome in their cups. One of them received so sharp a blow of a quart pot upon the head, that he put on an awfully rueful countenance, which Hogarth sketched on his thumb-nail on the spot. The result was a most amusing caricature, which, when handed round the room, restored all parties to good humour. Upon another occasion, a woman who was quarrelling with one of her companions in a cellar, filled her mouth with brandy, and dexterously squirted it into her antagonist's eye, in the presence of Hogarth and Hammore, the printer, the former of whom sketched the scene. The cleverness with which he turned these incidents to account, sufficiently indicated the line of art in which he was likely to be successful; but some time elapsed either before he became aware of it, or the world seemed inclined to patronise efforts of this kind.

Hogarth was never much of a reader, and knew little of book learning. His great aim was to acquire all his knowledge from the study of nature and of mankind, and he had no hesitation in diving for that knowledge to the lowest depths of vice and prodigality. The images he brought back with him were not always very graceful or pleasing, to be sure, but they were none the less instructive and faithful for that.

Hogarth was thirty before he could do much more than maintain himself. This was owing to his being obliged for a long while to divide his time between two very different occupations. Art at that period, for a young beginner, was not a very profitable calling, and the total absence of all protection for the copyright of prints and engravings enabled knavish publishers to pirate such of his plates as displayed any great degree of merit. He was obliged to support his mother and sisters, and, in doing this, he found the griffins, and lions couchant and rampant of heraldry more valuable aids than high art. By degrees, however, he worked himself into such a position as to enable him to abandon heraldry altogether, and devote his whole attention to painting and engraving. His skill in the latter was a material assistance, and placed him far above most others of his profession, at least, in a pecuniary point of view, as it enabled him to multiply his own works to any extent he pleased. His first work of any merit proved incontestably that his forte lay in satire. He was, in fact, the Juvenal of art. It was a piece engraved in 1721, and entitled the "Taste of the Town," and afterwards, "The Small Masquerade Ticket," or "Burlington Gate." Its object was much the same as that of Mr. Thackeray's "Vanity Fair," to ridicule the follies of the "quality" of the day—their frivolity, idleness, and corruption.

This appears to have stamped his reputation, for, after this, booksellers began to employ him to embellish books with cuts and frontispieces. This was the first real opening of a field of art which has since supplied the public with unnumbered delights. Even Hogarth's attempts in this way were rude enough, were passed unnoticed by most people, and mentioned by Walpole with condemnation only. Still, as a commencement, they are full of interest, above all, as a commencement which has led to all the charming creations of the artist's and the poet's fancy, which now lie on the tables of the humblest in the land.

It was in illustrating Butler's "Hudibras," that he first gave a real foretaste of his genius, though even in this he did not by any means do all that might have been done. Of all the poets of the seventeenth century, probably, Butler is the one hardest to illustrate. His wit is often so keen, and his touches so delicate, that it is not always easy for the reader to catch their full force, much less for the artist to give them shape and hue on paper; and it was probably in this that Hogarth found his memory and imagination, for the first time, fail him. There are, nevertheless, countless charms in his drawings, but, as Allan Cunningham well remarks, they appear rather where he has departed from the text, than where he has literally adhered to it. We feel pleasure in presenting our readers with one of these illustrations, and to enable those who are not familiar with Butler's great masterpiece to understand it more clearly, we subjoin an extract from the portion of the text to which it refers:—

Hudibras has an esquire with him—Ralpho.

The "argument" will give an idea of what precedes the extract in this canto.

PART II. CANTO III.

Argument.

The knight (i.e. Hudibras), with various doubts possess'd,
To win the lady goes in quest,
Of Sidrophel, the Rosy-Crucian,
To know the destinies' resolution;
With whom, b'ing met, they both chop logic,
About the science astrologic;
Till falling from dispute to fight,
The conjur'er's worsted by the knight.

[Sidrophel, in the course of the dispute, has called Hudibras "a braggartain huffer."]]

"Huffer! (quoth Hudibras) this sword
Shall down thy false throat cram that word.
Ralpho, make haste, and call an officer,
To apprehend this Stygian sophister:
Meanwhile I'll hold 'em at a day,
Lest he and Whackum run away.

But Sidrophel, who from th' aspect
Of Hudibras, did now erect
Than that of most malignant star,
Believed it now the fittest moment,
To shun the danger that might come on't,
While Hudibras was all alone,
And he and Whackum, two to one,
This being resolved, he spy'd by chance,
Behind the door an iron lance,
That many a sturdy limb had gor'd,
And legs, and loins, and shoulders hor'd:
He snatch'd it up, and made a pass,
To make his way thro' Hudibras.
Whackum had got a fire-fork,
With which he vow'd to do his work.
But Hudibras was well prepar'd,
And stoutly stood upon his guard:
He put by Sidrophello's thrust,
And in right manfully he rush'd;

The weapon from his gripe he wrung,
 And laid him on the earth along.
 Whachum, his sea-coal prong threw by
 And basely turn'd his back to fly ;
 But Hudibras gave him a twitch,
 As quick as lightning in the breach ;
 Just in the place where honour's lodg'd,
 As wise philosophers have judg'd,
 Because a kick in that part more
 Hurts honour, than deep wounds before.

Hogarth's biography brings out one of the laughable, and yet saddest features in the history of English art. Some of his plates were positively sold by the weight of the copper—at so much a pound! and, what is more extraordinary, the practice seems to have been so common at that time as to have excited little or no surprise. The price, in Hogarth's case, was half-a-crown a pound avoirdupois. Thornhill, a painter of no small celebrity in that day, sold paintings to the government at two guineas a Flemish ell. Fancy the state of public feeling and taste with regard to works of art, when such an idea could ever enter any one's head as that of purchasing the conceptions of skill, genius, and intellect by the weight and density of the materials employed in recording them; and fancy, what is more marvellous still, the estimate which artists must have had of the dignity of their profession or the value of their labours, when they could even listen to such a proposal without laughter and contempt!

A better proof of the general want of taste and the stupidity of the times could not be given than the result of an action which Hogarth brought for the recovery of a just and lawful debt. We may reasonably suppose the judge and jury to have been fair exponents of the knowledge as well as of the opinions of the general public. A certain Morris, an upholsterer by trade, engaged Hogarth, attracted, no doubt, by the fame of his plates, to make a design for tapestry. There appears to have been no doubt whatever of his competency to execute the task assigned to him, and the work was proceeding very favourably, when the worthy upholsterer discovered, to his horror, that Hogarth was not a painter, but simply an engraver. He accordingly sent one of his servants to him in all haste, to state his apprehensions. The design was, however, completed and sent home; but on being presented to the workmen, most of whom were foreigners, they, as in duty bound, declared that tapestry could not be executed by it, rather, we suspect, however, because it was an engraver who designed it, than because the design was bad. Morris refused to pay first, and Hogarth brought his action for thirty pounds—ten for materials, and twenty for workmanship—and the jury gave a verdict against him, for the simple reason that he was not a painter.

There was a man named Kent in existence at that day, who called himself not only a painter, but an architect, ornamental gardener, sculptor, and general designer and decorator. He was ready for anything, from the leg of a chair to a hero's monument. He encumbered Westminster Abbey with some of the most grotesque, outlandish, and unmeaning blocks of marble ever hewn by a chisel; people consulted him about the make of their furniture, their picture and looking-glass frames, their plate, their barges, their cradles. Two ladies of high rank prevailed on him to make designs for the dresses which they were to wear at court on the birthday. The consequence was, that one appeared in a petticoat decorated with columns of the five orders of architecture, and the other like a bronze, in a copper-coloured satin with ornaments of gold. That the man was an ass there was not a particle of doubt; all that was wanted was some one to make this fact known to the world, which had not discrimination enough to perceive it itself. This task Hogarth very properly took upon himself, and executed it very effectually, by a caricature ridiculing a picture which Kent had presented as an altar-piece for St. Clement's church. The print put the whole parish in roars of laughter, and the next time the bishop visited the church he ordered it to be taken down. He followed up his success with vigour, and at length had the satisfaction of seeing the ignorant pretender thrown from his pedestal.

Hogarth had by this time gained for himself an acknowledged place amongst the artists of the day; and as portrait painting was a much more honourable, as well as more profitable occupation than caricaturing, he betook himself to it, mainly for the sake of his wife, a daughter of Sir James Thornhill, who had braved the anger of her father in marrying him. He did not succeed well, however, in this department. His best efforts had been made in the display of the busiest and most bustling scenes of town life, the rage of unbridled passion, the abject meanness of low vice, the brutal ferocity of crime and dissipation, the leer of the roue, and simper of the hypocrite, and he could not in a minute train his pencil to the delineation of graceful repose, of aristocratic hauteur. He who had gained all the celebrity he then could boast by the fidelity with which he had portrayed the types of every folly, passion, and eccentricity under heaven, could not easily bring himself to flatter the vanity of the great by smoothing down deformities, filling up wrinkles, and obliterating moles and warts, turning a grin into a smile, or a squint into a glance. His portrait painting, therefore, though he made some money by it, was decidedly a failure. In noticing his want of success in this department of art, it is pleasant to be compelled to notice a fine trait in his character also: the ability to discern when he had mistaken his vocation, and the resolution to rectify his error. If every one possessed this in an equal degree, we feel certain we should hear less complaints of the wrongs and injustice of the world.

Hogarth, before abandoning portraits, painted two or three which have derived most of their celebrity from the fame of the originals. One was Garrick, the prince of players; another the gentle, good-hearted Captain Coram, the founder of the Foundling Hospital, whose proudest boast was that the savings of his youth and manhood were spent in one of the noblest works of charity, and that in his old age he was poor; the other was that of a man who, though one of the vilest of his race, was instrumental in effecting as great reforms in the British constitution as many a patriot and martyr whom none mention without honour and reverence. Each of these is remarkable for its fidelity; but in the last a little of Hogarth's satirical spirit appears, and makes the fiendish part of Wilkes's nature shine out through his face, and obscure altogether, whatever of humanity there was in his expression. It was certainly a caricature, but the likeness was undeniable.

He made a good income by his portrait painting, as it then formed the only lucrative branch of art; and during the whole time he was engaged in it, he was silently laying up materials for the works on which his real and lasting fame rests, those whose manner is satirical, and whose object was moral warning or instruction. The haunts of London vice and folly supplied him with abundance of subjects—which none could have turned to better account. His reasons for turning his thoughts to painting and engraving subjects of a modern kind and moral nature—a field not broken up in any country or age, were, to use his own words, that he thought critics and painters had in the historical style quite overlooked that intermediate species of subjects which may be placed between the sublime and the grotesque. He therefore wished to compose pictures on canvas, similar to representations on the stage, and further hoped that they would be tried by the same test, and criticised by the same criterion. "Let it be observed, that I mean to speak only of those scenes where the human species are actors, and these, I think, have not often been delineated in a way of which they are worthy and capable."

We quote the above, rather as giving Hogarth's own notion of his work, than as being by any means a true statement of the comparative merits of comedy and tragedy, or, in fact, giving anything like a correct idea of such teachings as appeal to the passions and senses for the effect, as pictures, and the drama, &c. To enable the reader to judge for himself, we shall conclude this notice by a sketch of the works to which he refers. The first of the series was the "Harlot's Progress," which was commenced in 1731, and appeared in a series of six plates, in 1734. Their success was rapid and decisive. "The boldness of the attempt," says Allan Cunningham, "the fascinating originality and liveliness of the conception, together with the rough and ready vigour of the engraving, were felt and enjoyed by all. The public saw with wholly serious nor wholly comic, in which fashionable follies and moral corruptions had their beginning, their middle, and their end. Painters had been employed hitherto in investing adies of loose reputation with the hues of heaven, and tuning their paramours into Adonises; here was one who dipt both in the lake of darkness, and held them up together to the scorn and derision of mankind."

The subject of the "Harlot's Progress" was the history of one of the unfortunates who atone for the folly of an hour by an eternity of remorse; her arrival in London, fresh from the country, pure and innocent as her mother's tears and prayers and anxious care have made her—her first turning aside from the beaten path of duty—in which women

This to Lady Amelia that, vice, provided it were surrounded by speaking mirrors, gorgeous coaches, Turkey carpets, and all other appliances of wealth and luxury, might seem to the poor and lowly-born, whose pleasure even partook of the hardness and coarseness of their existence, a proud, stately, dignified, and admirable thing; but, as Hogarth represented it, no coalheaver could look on it without blessing God that he knew nothing of it, and without feeling proud that he was neither a polished rom, nor a fallen beauty. What rendered the satire more effective, was, that many of the prin-find their only safety, her deception and ruin, her deceiving of others in her turn, her rise to guilty splendour, and her fall to guilty woe, and her final exit from the world amongst wretches as vile and degraded as herself. The work, independently of its artistic excellence, was of signal importance, because it tore away the veil from vice which a corrupt and sensual society had thrown over it, and revealed it in its naked, filthy, and hideous deformity. As the court poets then wrote of it, as the "wits" about town talked of it, as it was retailed in scandal over "dishes of tea" by Lady Betty principal personages were portraits from living originals, of men about town, famous, or rather infamous, for their licentiousness, and of women who were tossed like a shuttlecock from one "protector" to another, as fast as their appetites became pallid, of parsons who in their cups forgot the gravity becoming their cloth, and judges the sanctity of their ermine, so that the town laughed, and the culprits winced like galled jades.

The "Harlot's Progress" was followed up by the "Rake's Progress," as a sort of counterpart or pendant. This was scarcely so successful as its prototype, however, inasmuch as it had not novelty and curiosity on its side. It consisted of eight scenes, illustrative of the folly of a young man, who has just succeeded to a large fortune by the death of a sordid miser. He spends it in London, in cock-fighting, gambling, horse-racing, and every possible species of debauchery, and at last beggared, penniless, forsaken by his fair-weather friends, who fawned on him and robbed him in his prosperity, and broken down in constitution through his excesses, he finds refuge in a lunatic asylum, where he ends his days. "The curtain," says Walpole, "was now drawn aside, and his genius stood displayed in its full lustre. From time to time he continued to give these works, which should be immortal, if the nature of his work will allow it."

Both these were printed by knavish booksellers, and published, with a slight alteration in the title, for their own special benefit. The chagrin and indignation which this dishonesty caused Hogarth to feel, led to the first recognition by the legislature of the absolute property of the designer or engraver in the productions of his genius and industry. By his efforts an act was passed in 1735, for recognizing a legal copyright in designs and engravings, and restraining copies of such works from being made without the consent of the owners. The phraseology of the act was, however, as is too often the case, a model of verbiage and obscurity, and within a very short time after its passing, decisions were pronounced under it which were opposed to the common sense of every man who heard them, as well as of the judge who pronounced them, though in strict accordance with the meaning of the legislature, at least as nearly as it could be ascertained.

To commemorate this achievement, Hogarth engraved a small print with emblematic devices. On the top of the plate was a royal crown shedding rays on mitres and coronets, —on the great seal, on the speaker's hat, and other symbols, indicating the united wisdom of king, lords, and commons. Underneath was a complimentary inscription.

Most of his other pieces are representations of scenes in low life in London. Their names, such as "Southwark Fair," "Modern Midnight Conversation," a scene in a cyder cellar or tavern, sufficiently indicate their nature, with several others not so coarse, but equally ludicrous and clever. His next piece, which contained a serious moral, was "Marriage à la Mode." It consisted of a series of six scenes. The daughter of a rich citizen is married to the son of a proud but poor peer. One desires a title, the other wealth, and they get them. The husband is an affected fop, and even on their wedding-day the bride seems more than half-disgusted with him, and is observed listening with an attention ill suited the occasion to the words of a wily lawyer, Mr. Silvertongue. The result is such as might have been expected. My lord wastes his substance in riotous living, spends his money amongst gamblers, boxers, harlots, winebibbers, and blacklegs of every description. The lady listens to the lawyer still, and frequents houses where large sums are lost by means of "quiet rubbers." Scandal, at last, begins to make free with her name,—and her reputation is finally gone. She consents to a meeting at a masked ball, and after this, we see her no more till the last scene but one, in which the artist displays dramatic power of the highest order. In a bagnio, in her night dress, in an agony of remorse, over the body of her dying and injured husband, who has just received a mortal wound from the sword of her seducer, kneels the unfortunate woman, now, at last, fully awake to her shame and ruin and disgrace. In the closing scene, she again appears in the house of her father, the dying speech of her paramour, who has been hanged for the murder of her husband, lying at her feet. She puts an end to her misery by draining a phial of laudanum. Her infant, who twines its arms round her neck, is the only one left to love her, for her sordid father disturbs her last moments by tearing a costly ring from her finger.

These sketches met with a decided success, so much humour, mingled with so much pathos, so much deep and heart-rending tragedy from a hand trained, as it were, to comedy, the world had never seen on canvas before, and it evinced its appreciation of the work by the purchase of a large number of the engravings.

He followed it up by another and corresponding series, representing a "Happy Marriage," but this, for what reason is not known, he never carried to completion. In his next production, the moral purpose was more plainly manifested than in any of the others, though the artistic execution was not such as to attract any great amount of attention. In the present day, when education is more extended because its advantages are better known, and when boys are not so prone to run wild as in "the good old times," we question much whether they would attract any share whatever of public notice. But the great scapegoats of those days, the wild hairbrained portion of the population of the metropolis were the apprentices, and many of the losses and trials of the worthy tradesmen were due to their wildness and folly. When Hogarth, therefore—who had himself been an apprentice, and knew the temptations to which young men in the great world of London, far from their parents, were exposed—took up his pencil to paint the miseries of vice and idleness, and the rewards and happiness attendant on industry and good conduct; the merchants and shopkeepers hailed his efforts with delight, and hung up the engravings in their shops and parlours, to be at once a warning and an example. He executed twelve alternate scenes, of Industry and Idleness, in 1747, and published them. The following is his own account of their nature and object:—"Industry and Idleness exemplified in the conduct of two fellow apprentices, where one, by taking good courses, and pursuing points for which he was apprenticed, becomes a valuable man and an ornament to his country; the other, by giving way to idleness, naturally falls into poverty, and ends fatally as expressed in the last print." It is but right to add, however, that there was more to be commended in the moral of the prints than in their execution.

A visit which our artist paid to France, soon after the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, was the means of rousing in him that holy hatred of Frenchmen which formed so large a part of the nationality of every Englishman of the old school, and which led to the belief, not yet extinct amongst the lower classes, that every Frenchman wore wooden shoes, used brass money, and lived upon frogs. Hogarth no sooner found himself in Calais, than he launched out into unmeasured abuse of everything he saw, and at last began to sketch one of the gates of the town. This caused him to be apprehended as a spy, carried on board a returning packet, and there rudely whirled round on the deck. Indignities less aggravating than these have led to bloody wars, but happily Hogarth was not one of the great ones of the earth, and was thus compelled to avenge himself merely by a caricature, entitled "The Roast Beef of Old England," in which English good cheer and the meagreness of French fare were contrasted, in the way that displayed neither much wit nor imagination.

Passing over a painting, "The Presentation of young Moses to the Daughter of Pharaoh," we come to his next moral and satirical performance, "The Four Stages of Cruelty," representing the career of a savage boy, who commences his career by gross cruelty to the lower animals, and ends it by an atrocious murder, for which he is hanged, and in due course dissected. They displayed great skill in grouping and the delineation of character, and their moral was on the surface; but the unpleasant nature of the subject, and the revolting minuteness with which all the details are given in the last scene, render the work by no means so pleasing as many others of his which display, perhaps, less talent. We insert an engraving of one of these scenes. "The March of the Guards to Finchley," in which he ridiculed the royal guards when advancing against the Scotch rebels in 1745, was a performance displaying the highest wit and humour. The whole body are represented in Tottenham Court-road, in a state of lamentable confusion and disorder, drunken, and surrounded by a horde of wives, sutlers, and lovers, all shouting, drinking, and swearing, their baggage waggons upset, and all discipline at an end. Its appearance set the town in a roar; but poor George II., a heavy, fat, lumbering German, alike devoid of humour and incapable of comprehending or appreciating it, was sadly enraged by it. A copy was sent to him by Hogarth, who doubtless thought he would enjoy the joke; and on hearing the title, the king was rather pleased than otherwise, supposing it was some tribute to the valour and discipline of the guards who had marched so cheerfully to overthrow the Pretender. Great was his indignation and astonishment when he saw it.

"Who is this Hogarth?" said he to a lord in waiting.

"The painter, my liege."

"Bainter!—I hate bainting and boetry too; neither of them ever did any good. Does the fellow mean to laugh at my guards?"

"The picture, an't please your majesty, must undoubtedly be regarded as a burlesque."

"What, a bainter burlesque a soldier!—he deserves to be picketed for his insolence. Take his trumpery out of my sight!"

So much for his Majesty's taste. Frederick of Prussia proved that he knew better what was due to genius when he received the picture as a present, and sent the artist a handsome acknowledgment.

To enumerate, even, all the other works of Hogarth would require a much larger space than we have at our disposal. We have already said enough to give the reader a general idea of their nature; we must, therefore, conclude this very imperfect sketch by a brief reference to the only book he ever wrote. He had, when he painted his own portrait, etched on the palette a waving line, underneath which was written "Line of Beauty and Grace." Nobody knew what this meant, though every one wondered. The mystery was solved in 1753, by the appearance of a work from the artist's pen, entitled "Analysis of Beauty." "No Egyptian hieroglyphic," says he, "ever amused more than my line of beauty did for a fine. Painters and sculptors came to me to know the meaning of it, being as much puzzled with it as other people, till I explained it by publishing my analysis. Then, indeed, and not till then, some found it out to be an old acquaintance of theirs, though the account they could give of its properties was very near as satisfactory as that which a day-labourer, who constantly uses a lever, could give of that machine as a mechanical power."

The explanation contained in the Analysis, however, did not by any means make matters pleasant. No book ever drew down such a storm of obloquy upon the author. Every available instrument of satire, ridicule, and abuse was put in force against him—verse as well as prose. His opinions, his language, and even his person and his family fell equally under the lash. The literati were indignant that a man who was self-educated, who could not spell, nor even always write grammatically, should take upon himself to write a book; and at last they declared that he could not write it, and that it was not his at all. None joined in this clamour with a louder voice than the immortal patriot John Wilkes, who now showed as little regard to truth as he had always shown to decency. There can be no doubt that the work was entirely Hogarth's own, but he confessed, with becoming modesty, that he had submitted his language and arrangement to the revision of a friend, as was natural, when he himself was not practised in composition. With regard to the opinions advanced in the work, they are at least ingenious, but they had many opponents among men who owed Hogarth a grudge, and they would probably now have more than ever. He points to the leaves which clothe the trees, and the flowers which cover the ground, and all that buds and blooms as formed of waving lines. The line of grace is found in the varied outline of the hills, in the grandeur of mountains, in everything however minute or magnificent. The beasts, the birds, the insects, and the fishes, and the shells which strew the shore, are all cited as examples of the truth of the theory; and the topstone of the argument is found in the grounded lines of womanly beauty. He thus proclaims himself the discoverer of a great and universal principle, in the full spirit of which the great artists of Italy and Greece wrought, probably, more from instinct than from knowledge. In all their works is found the line of beauty such as he described it, and nowhere stiff, rigid, or angular forms. "Michael Angelo," he thought, "had some notion of the existence of this principle when he advised his scholar, Marcus de Siena, to make a figure pyramidal, serpentlike, and multiplied by one, two and three, in which precept the whole mystery of art consisteth; for the greatest grace and life that a picture can have, is that it expresseth motion, which painters call the spirit of a picture."

LESLIE'S SANCHO PANZA.

There never was an author worthier of an artist's attention than Cervantes, in his inimitable "Don Quixote." It is one of those books which belong to no age and no clime, which can be read everywhere, for ever, and by everybody, with equal delight. In "Don Quixote" we have the broadest farce, without a particle of coarseness, mingled with the keenest satire and deep love for humanity, indulgence for its errors and follies, and belief in his innate goodness. These are qualities that find favour everywhere, and call forth as hearty admiration from the Englishman as the Spaniard. One of the most amusing characters in the work, Sancho—that happy personification of primitive instincts, of popular good sense, of matter-of-fact practicality—that charming contrast with the man of dreams, Don Quixote, his master—has been ably rendered by Mr. Leslie, in one of his most laughable situations—while "governor of the island of Barataria." The honours of royalty never sat so heavily on him as at table. We shall let Cervantes describe the scene.

The court doctor stands over the worthy governor, and prevents his tasting any of the delicacies which his attendants place before him. Hear the doctor's apology, when called to account:—

"My lord," said the wand-bearer, "your lordship's fool must here be watched with the same care as is customary with the governors of other islands. I am a doctor of physic, sir, and my duty, for which I receive a salary, is to attend to the governor's health, whereof I am more careful than of my own. I study his constitution night and day, that I may know how to restore him when sick; and, therefore, think it incumbent on me to pay special regard to his meals, at which I constantly preside, to see that he eats what is good and salutary, and prevent his touching whatever I imagine may be prejudicial to his health or offensive to his stomach. It is for that reason, my lord, I ordered the dish of fruit to be taken away, as being too watery, and that other dish as being too hot and over-seasoned with spices, which are apt to provoke thirst; and he that drinks much destroys and consumes the radical moisture, which is the fuel of life." "Well then," quoth Sancho, "that plate of roasted partridges, which seem to me to be very well seasoned, I suppose will do me no manner of harm." "Hold," said the doctor, "my lord governor shall not eat them, while I live to prevent it." "Pray, why not?" quoth Sancho. "Because," answered the doctor, "our great master, Hippocrates, says in one of his aphorisms, 'Omnis saturatio mala, perditis autem pessima.' All repletion is bad, but that from partridges the worst." "If it be so," quoth Sancho, "pray cast your eye, senior doctor, over all these dishes here on the table, and see which will do me the most good or the least harm, and let me eat of it, without whisking it away with your conjuring stick; for, by my soul, and as

God shall give me life to enjoy this government, I am dying with hunger; and to deny me food—let senior doctor say what he will—is not the way to lengthen my life, but to cut it short." "Your worship is in the right, my lord governor," answered the physician; "and, therefore, I am of opinion, you should not eat of those stewed rabbits, as being a food that is tough and acute; of that veal, indeed, you might feeders at country weddings; but let them not be seen on the tables of governors, where nothing contrary to health and delicacy should be tolerated. Simple medicines are always more estimable and safe, for in them there can be no mistake; whereas in such as are compounded all is hazard and uncertainty. Therefore, what I would at present advise my lord governor to eat, in order to corroborate and preserve his have taken a little, had it been neither roasted nor stewed, but as it is, not a morsel." "What think you, then," said Sancho, "of that huge dish there smoking hot, which I take to be an olla podrida; for among the many things contained in it I surely may light upon something both wholesome and toothsome." "Absit," quoth the doctor, "far be such a thought from us. Olla podrida! there is no worse dish in the world; leave them to the prebends and rectors of colleges, or lusty health, is about one hundred small rolled up wafers, with some thin slices of marmalade, that may sit easy upon the stomach and help digestion." See the incredulous air which his countenance wears as he listens to the doctor's sophistries, the gradual dawning on him of their flimsiness, mingled with a dash of unusual longing for the good cheer before him. This is a decided success, as Alexander Dumas would say.

LANDSEER'S "TWA DOGS."

SINCE the time of Snyders no man has depicted animal life with such force, precision, and acuteness of observation, as Edwin Landseer. The difficulties in the way of becoming a landscape painter are, ceteris paribus, no greater than in that of becoming a great animal painter, for the simple reason that the field of observation is necessarily more limited, and much harder to be got at. Nature never conceals herself—is never absent from him who loves her and seeks her diligently. The landscape always remains open for study, the green of the fields, the hues of the flowers, the light and shade amongst the foliage, the glitter of the sunlight on the water, and the gorgeous tints of the occidental sky, are everywhere to be seen. To render them truly, to be sure, is difficult enough, but it is the artist's fault if he does not sucwithin the reach of any man who chooses to bestow on them the necessary time and labour. They are to painting much what style and fluency are in writing, the result of practice merely, aided of course in some degree by natural adaptability. But Landseer has shown himself a man of the highest order of mind. His two great pictures of "Peace" and "War" display great intellectual power. A mere painter, if called upon to give us an idea of peace, would place before us a cottage, surrounded by flowers, with children playing in the garden, and reapers cutting down the corn close at hand; his "War" would exhibit an array of hostile forces engaged in deadly encounter—ceed, and not that of the materials with which he has to deal. Not so the painter of animals. He has to haunt their retreats, to be content with hasty and imperfect observation, to wait patiently, it may be, for months before he can satisfy himself as to a certain attitude, a certain expression, or a peculiar habit. Any one whom reflection has made aware of these difficulties, must, in gazing on Landseer's works, feel lost in admiration at the marvellous perfection to which he has attained—the singularly minute knowledge of every trait of character, and every instinct of the lower animals, above all, of deer and dogs, which his pictures display—at the patience, the diligence, the industry, and perseverance which must have been expended in their acquisition. Nor is it his imitative powers merely that call forth our commendation. These are should have seen what he meant, but nothing more. There is nothing suggestive, nothing for the mind to dwell on, any more than a sentence in a copy-book which tells us that procrastination is the thief of time—or that modesty is a quality which highly adorns a woman. But Landseer does not rest satisfied with stating the fact. He makes it suggestive of other facts—expresses a great deal, and leaves twice as much to be inferred, sets us off in imagination through a wide field of causes and consequences. His works are but symbols, but how much do they symbolise! This is the highest triumph of genius—this is truth in painting. His "Peace" is a grass-covered cliff at Dover, with a few children playing on it, surrounded by sheep, some lazily chewing the cud, and a lamb cropping the green herbage which grows within the mouth of a dismounted piece of cannon, while the sea lies below, calm as a lake, and dotted here and there by the white sails of pleasure-boats, and the coast of France looms dimly through the summer haze. How little there is here, but how much meaning lies behind it—our long wars with our "natural enemy," the bloody conflicts for naval supremacy of which that channel has been the scene, the bristling ordnance which in other days have crowned those heights, and the watch and ward which armed men kept in hatred, and wrath, and passion, where innocence and purity now bask happily and carelessly in the sunlight.

* The politeness of Mr. Gambart, the eminent print-seller of Berner's-street, enables us to lay before the public a representation of one of Sir Edwin Landseer's most popular subjects. This is, we believe, the only instance of the expensive steel engraving of Landseer's "Twa Dogs" being rendered on wood; and the extreme fidelity with which our artist has copied the peculiarities of the original cannot be too highly commended.

"War" is simply a ruined cottage, half concealed by the smoke of battle—the trampled flower-beds, wrecked windows, and devastated garden, tell fearfully of the conflict which has just ended, and a single horseman lies dead beneath his steed.

The scenes of Highland sport which Landseer has depicted are known to all our readers. In the last exhibition of the Royal Academy, two large pictures, "Night" and "Morning," have excited general admiration. Any description of them would give but a poor idea of their merits and beauty. His delineations of canine character are the most interesting of all his works. He has represented dogs in every possible situation, likely and unlikely, and in every one with marvellous fidelity, force, and precision. Our engraving may be taken as an apt illustration of one of Æsop's best fables, the tame and wild dog engaged in conversation. The fierce independence with which the latter asserts his full liberty to go and do as he likes, but acknowledges the hardships and dangers to which his situation exposes him; and the calm dignity with which the latter points out the ease, comfort and safety which he enjoys by a trifling sacrifice of his independence, are admirably contrasted.

THE PROSCRIBED ROYALIST. BY MILLAIS.

WE have already remarked upon the singular disposition displayed by the artists of the present day to dwell upon hackneyed historical themes. To paint history, whether with the pen or pencil, it is not necessary to describe events like a court newsman, or a penny-a-liner, telling us who was present, how it began, who took part in it, what they wore, how they looked, and how it ended. This, after all, is but a higher kind of imitation—a faithful rendering of costume, and of features as far as any thing is known of them, if the event be of remote occurrence, certainly joined with talents of a still higher order, which come into play in the grouping, expression, &c. But this alone does not impress one with the ideas of the time, does not give one a vivid picture of the state of society, of the prevailing notions and tendency of the popular mind, of the position of parties, and their prejudices and passions. These are things which historians should place in their foreground, but which, unfortunately, they do not—things which every student of history should know, but with which few students are thoroughly familiar. History, as at present written, barring the improvements it has received from Mr. Macaulay and Augustin Thierry, is a collection of dry facts, useful enough to the politician or statesman, but pictorially and æsthetically of hardly any value whatever. The first man in Great Britain who looked at history with the eye of an artist, grasped all its leading features, and without generalising them, though without dwelling painfully upon minutiae, and yet with marvellous truth, blended them into a picture of surpassing beauty, was Sir Walter Scott. Who would ever have so clear and ineffaceable an idea of the condition of the English people after the conquest,—of the peculiar relations existing between the victor and the vanquished for the first two centuries after the landing of the Normans, if in his youthful days he had not held his breath while Ivanhoe jostled in the lists at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, wept over the sorrows of Rebecca, and been merry with Friar Tuck in the merry greenwood? What idea would any Englishman have of the state of society in Scotland, particularly amongst the Highland clans, or of the rebellion of 1745—that marvellous enterprise, tinged with so much romance and frustrated by so much folly—if he had not followed the adventures of Waverley? In the whole of this there is hardly a single scene historically accurate; but still it is all historical painting of the highest order; and if the great object of history be to diffuse amongst the people a vivid notion of the daily lives of their forefathers, of their trials, their struggles, their grievances, their virtues, and their misfortunes, she owes more to the graceful pen of the Wizard of the North than to the ponderous labours of Hume.

Now we want some one to do for history with the pencil what Scott has done for it with the pen, to give the idea of truth, and not ideas of imitation. There is no lack of interesting subjects in the course of our national history, if the artist have but the requisite amount of knowledge and taste to turn them to account. A still wider field is open for the exercise of his art, if he chooses to extend his views to the history of other nations. In the "Proscribed Royalist," Mr. Millais has made a step in the right direction, and a very long step. In this scene there is as much meaning as Smollett would have taken ten pages to express, the triumphs of the Roundheads, the utter discomfiture of the Royalists, the ranging of godly soldiers up and down the land, smiting the men of Belial, hip and thigh, wherever they met with them; troopers in the churches, troopers in the old mansion-houses of the squires, Cromwell in the royal palaces, the fierce denunciation and longwinded expoundings of the serjeant, in places that had for centuries echoed to the mildly spiritual, but withal rapid discourses of the parson; the cavaliers, beggars in foreign lands, of foreign bounty—their pride humbled, their boasting brought to nought—their prowess held in no more esteem than the blows of a child's flail on sturdy sheaves, heirs of proud families lurking in woods and fastnesses, with no hope and no refuge, save in the instinctive kindness of human nature—the love, the pity, the fidelity of those who knew them in better days. Do you mark the look of broken pride, of disappointed hope, of crushed ambition, the utter despair and prostration which dwells in the poor fugitive's face, as shipwrecked, worn-out, shorn of his fiery recklessness and ardour, he lurks in fear and trembling in this hollow trunk, in a park, it may be, where he once was the gayest of the gay, the glass of fashion and the mould of form, with his slashed doublet, his neat hose, his clanking spurs, his long hair, and waving feather, and jaunty swaggering air? This girl was a belle, no doubt, in peaceful times, a gay coquette, who broke hearts by the score, and ran men through with a single glance; fickle, coy, and hard to please. The storm of war has rolled across the land, rousing a thousand bad passions, but it has swept with it all her frivolity and vanity, and left her in the native dignity and simplicity of pure womanhood, a ministering angel, visiting the captive in his affliction, and cheering his heart with her gentle sympathy. This is what a picture ought to be, telling many things and suggesting a thousand more; plucking from history its flowers of romance, setting them in a vase before us to perfume our rooms and delight our senses.

All that we have said here applies in an equal degree to a picture entitled the "Order of Release," a touching scene in 1745, exhibited in the Academy this year.

WILSON'S "MORNING."

WILSON, like most artists of his day, commenced his career by portrait painting; but, unlike most of them, early abandoned it for landscapes, and pursued the new branch with a success attained by none of his contemporaries, except Gainsborough. A sketch scratched on the window-pane, while waiting one morning for Zaccarelli the artist, to beguile the time, revealed his talent and fixed his vocation. He was a native of Wales, and had his memory filled with images of the glens, waterfalls, and wild mountains amongst which his youth had been passed. He thus possessed, if Mr. Ruskin's theory be true, one essential qualification of a great landscape painter,—a store of childish impressions, and a mind imbued from infancy with the love of nature.

He had, however, terrible difficulties to contend against. The taste for landscape painting, like too many other good tastes in England, had still to be created. Previously, portraits were all the rage. Education of any kind, or even ordinary refinement, was not much diffused amongst the middle and lower classes, and those whose wealth and position made them patrons of art, desired paintings of faces rather than of scenes, partly because the former flattered their vanity, and partly because they were too artificial for nature to come in for much share of their admiration. Wilson had not, therefore, merely to minister to tastes already formed, as is the case with most artists, but to create one. The task was indeed difficult, and no man was ever worse adapted for it than he. Rose-water was then a commodity fully as highly prized as at present. If the beau monde would be taught by any one, it should be by a man of courtly manners, in whom no trace of the estriar should offend the eye. Poor Wilson was anything but this,—coarse, slovenly, a haunter of taverns, a lover of boisterous mirth, and brusque in his manners, landscape painting did not grow fashionable in his hands. A residence of six years abroad enabled him to study the works of the great masters, and imbue his mind with the peculiar characteristics of their style. On his return to England he was fully prepared and fully competent to do justice to the beauties of English scenery. He had a poet's feeling and a poet's eye, selected his scenes with skill and judgment, and infused into them that tender ideality which is technically called "the sentiment of the scene." His conceptions were noble—his execution vigorous and forcible. There was never anything tame or insipid in any of his works. He entered fully into the spirit of nature, grew great with her grandeur, sublime with her sublimity, pathetic with her tender beauty. "Wilson," says Fuseli, in his Discourses, "observed nature in all her appearances, and had a characteristic touch for all her forms. But though in effects of dewy freshness, and silent evening lights, few have equalled, and fewer excelled him, his grandeur is oftener allied to terror, bustle, and convulsion, than to calmness and tranquillity. He is now numbered with the classics of the art, though little more than the fifth part of a century has elapsed since death relieved him from the apathy of cognoscenti; the envy of rivals, and the neglect of a tasteless public; for Wilson, whose works will soon command prices as proud as those of Claude, Poussin, or Elzheimer, resembled the last most in his fate, and lived and died nearer to indigence than ease."

His scenes are mostly fanciful, a few only being representations of existing reality, and they are scattered, as they should be, through private galleries and public rooms. They were so little admired during his lifetime, that they were not bought up by the connoisseurs; so that a greater number of them are thus open to public inspection than if this had been the case. The mention of the names of some of those upon which his fame principally rests may be useful:—"The Death of Niobe," "Phaeton," "Morning," "View of Rome," "Villa of Mæcenas at Tivoli," "Celadon and Amelia," "View on the River Po," "Apollo and the Seasons," "Meleager and Atalanta," "Cicero at his Villa," "Lake Narni," "View on the Coast of Bâle," "The Tiber near Rome," "Temple of Bacchus," "Adrian's Villa," and "Morning," of which we give an engraving, &c.

Wilson was only saved from dying in complete destitution by an unexpected legacy, which he did not long survive to enjoy—a standing reproach to the taste and humanity of the age.

ART AS IT IS.

ONE of the many advantages of peace undoubtedly is, that it recalls men to the study of all that is elevated and refined in art, and the result is, humanity becomes elevated and refined, not merely is "A thing of beauty is a joy for ever."

Not merely is the eye delighted and the taste gratified, but the heart of man is softened, his creed becomes more catholic, his life more pure, and thus the cause of human progress is advanced. It is, therefore, not for idle purposes we propose to glance at the artistic world as it at present appears. It concerns the happiness of the human race; its prosperity is connected with our own. If it declines, it speaks ill for us; if it flourishes, the reverse is denoted. We shall find it active and full of life.

In the way of painting we may state that Mr. E. M. Ward has received authority from her Majesty's Fine Art Commissioners, to commence at once on a second illustration of English history for the New Houses of Parliament, as a companion to the "Execution of Montrose," which delighted so many at the Royal Academy exhibition this year. The story which Mr. Ward is to tell, is the "Sleep of Argyll," and has been painted before. It rests on the authority of Woodrow, and has been copied and commented on by Fox, in his noble fragment of English history. The subject of Mr. Ward's piece is the Argyll who was executed in the reign of James II. It is said that a few hours before his execution, he was found sleeping as a child, by one of the lords of the council, his bitter, and unscrupulous enemy. The sight made a strong impression upon him, and the incident is one well fitted for the canvas. It will make a noble picture for the stately palace it is to adorn. From new pictures the transition to the restoration of old ones is very natural. We take it most of our readers are acquainted with the "Bear Hunt" by Velasquez. A few years ago, Mr. Lance, the eminent fruit painter, was instructed by Mr. Keyser, of the National Gallery, to restore this picture. Mr. Lance, before a committee of the House of Commons, thus described the injuries in the picture of the "Bear Hunt," which he was commissioned to repair. "One portion of the picture on the right hand, as large as a sheet of foolscap, was entirely bare; in fact, more than half the picture had to be restored." Mr. Lance confessed that he had not seen the picture before it was damaged, and that he had no plate to aid him in his restoration. It is clear that this attempt was most injudicious and absurd. Yet Mr. Lance is scarcely to be blamed; he was instructed by the keeper of the National Gallery. If he had not done it, some one else would. The artist's pot must boil as well as that of other men.

Mr. Windus, of Tottenham, has lately been fortunate enough to realise no less than 3,350 guineas for five moderate-sized pictures by Turner, which are pronounced by critics to be far from the most successful productions of that artist. Very different was the sale of the Standish, Spanish, and other pictures, where monks, and nuns, and martyrs, were sold "as cheap as stinking mackerel." The gem of the collection was the portrait of the infant "Don Balthasar," which was knocked down amid the applause of the room for 1,000 guineas. The portrait was painted about the year 1655, not long after the return of Velasquez from Italy, and in his best manner—the delicate flesh and curly auburn hair are truly infantine; the picture is in excellent condition. By some it was said to be purchased for the National Gallery; by others, for Baron Rothschild; by others, and we believe correctly, for Lord Normanton. Large as the sum is, the picture is worth it; for, after all, the real value of a painting is what it will bring at Messrs. Christie's, and the fortu-sion, for its power of submitting to those who could see and feel, but not read, a faithful matter-of-fact impersonation of the Spanish faith—of the monk and the saint—the legend and the gospel, which the church deemed fit for the nation's belief." One other thing has also been taught us—the grave and masculine character of Spanish art. It sought not to please or

It was destined not for the drawing-room, but the altar—not for man's pleasure, but for God's glory—to build up men for the life that is to come—not to make pleasant to them, or deck with flowers the life that now is—that soon shall have past away.

PAUL BRIL.

It has been for a long time believed, that those immortal artists, whose names preside over an epoch in history, were brought forth, all at once, from the womb of humanity, without ancestors, without filiation, if we may so speak—like Venus issuing from the agitated waves. Never was belief more widely diffused of old, and yet never was belief more able painters, who needed but to have been born two centuries later to have earned also the surname of divine.

In landscape, as in historical painting, we find the same sequence, the same phenomena; to prepare for the coming of a Claude, or a Poussin, many generations of artists had to toil, if we may so speak, at the foot of the pedestal on which they were to mount; a crowd of painters from Germany and Holland had to learn how to combine the simple love of nature, innate in the people of the north, with the ideal sentiment of the beautiful bestowed on the Italians. From the mystic marriage of northern and southern Europe, the great Poussin was born.

Amongst those artists who thus paved the way for the great landscape painters of the seventeenth century, there is one whose name and works have been handed down to posterity—Paul Bril. The Venetian and Flemish schools dispute, it is true, the honour of having originated landscape painting. Although history seems to certify that Giorgione and Titian were the first who thought of treating the landscape as the principal part of a picture, and thus to justify the pretensions of the Venetians, it is, nevertheless, allowable to believe that Flanders was the cradle of the most ancient landscape painters. Such, in fact, is the opinion of the Italian Baldinucci himself. We must also add, that the grave and sentimental character of the northerners leads them to the contemplation of the external world. At the time when Europe emerged from the long barbarism of the middle ages, they were the first to awaken to a sense of the beautiful in nature. Besides all this, light, which plays so prominent a part in all landscapes, nowhere exhibits effects so striking as in the stormy countries of the north. There the sun tears open the clouds in the twinkling of an eye, and inundates one half of the landscape with his rays, while the other half remains plunged in silent shade; there the clouds assume tints so varied that the painter may study in them the most curious gradations of tone.

One thing is certain—the first painter, to cultivate land-false. Humanity, productive and powerful as she is, cannot improvise a great man. A long gestation, a series of progressive transformations, are necessary to produce one of those brilliant geniuses whose glory effaces the remembrance of the slow and successive efforts which had been made before their time. Between Giotto and Raphael there appeared a long line of scape painting exclusively, who afterwards attained to any celebrity, was Paul Bril the Fleming. It ought to be remarked, that this painter lived constantly in Italy; and we shall see, by the history of his life, that his genius was developed under the two-fold influence of the instincts which he brought with him from his native country, and of the great models which he found in the country of his adoption. He was born at Antwerp, in 1556.* He studied when very young under Daniel Wortelmans, painter, unknown to fame. If we are to believe Karl Van Mander, he shewed at first but little docility in learning his art, and at the age of fourteen had given no sign of the possession of genius. As he was obliged to support himself by his labour, he painted in water colours harpsichords and those three-stringed lyres that were called pandoras. Painting was then chiefly employed for purposes of ornamentation. All the furniture in Italy, towards the end of the fifteenth century and the beginning of the sixteenth, were adorned with paintings. Desco, a Florentine, and Starnina in Spain, excelled in this branch of art.† Gaddi Oregua and Grotto himself painted cassoni—little boxes for containing wedding presents. Although Paul Bril performed this sort of work with great facility, he had great difficulty in making out a livelihood. Necessity, and the desire of seeing new countries, and natural restlessness of disposition, made him leave Antwerp early; he set out for Breda. His parents, who were already suffering from the absence of their eldest son, Mathew, soon recalled him to his native town. The reports which reached him, however, of the success which had attended his brother Mathew in Italy, revived his desire to follow him, and he took flight one fine morning, when scarcely twenty years of age, to realise his dream of Italy. He stopped, however, some months at Lyons before crossing the Alps. D'Argenville informs us that Paul Bril studied there under an unknown master, but that the instructions he received were not by any means useless. His colouring was improved, and he acquired a firmer and more vigorous style.

On his arrival at Rome, he found his brother, who had been resident there for many years, engaged in executing the great works at the Vatican, which had been committed to him by Gregory XIII. During the life of the latter, Paul laboured with his brother, and assisted him in finishing the paintings and decoration upon which he was engaged in the great gallery and apartments of the pontifical palace. He then showed so much ability, that, on the death of Mathew, which took place in 1584, Pope Sixtus V., the successor of Gregory XIII., confided to him the task of completing what his brother had begun.‡ From this moment, Paul Bril's reputation was established, and ever after continued to increase during the whole course of a long and laborious life. Popes Sixtus V., Clement VIII., Paul V., &c., employed him in a great number of important works. There is still at Rome a large composition which he painted in 1602, in the splendid dining-hall constructed by Clement VIII., in which St. Clement, the patron of this pope, may be seen bound to an anchor and cast into the sea. The picture contains an area of not less than sixty-eight Roman palms, or about fifty-nine feet. The ceilings of the two staircases, beside the Scala Santa, near St. John of Lateran, were also adorned by two large frescoes, the work of his pencil. The one represents Jonas being swallowed by the whale, and in the other the prophet appears lying on the shore after issuing from the fish's belly. The mere enumeration of all the landscapes which he painted for the pontifical palace, and the various convents and churches at Rome, would of itself form a catalogue of some length. Baldinucci informs us, that immediately after Mathew's death, Paul Bril was employed by the greatest artists of the day to paint the scenery in the background of their pictures, because none knew how so well as he to set off a historical fact by the addition of a beautiful landscape.

* Baldinucci gives 1584 as the date of his birth; but this is an error, as he himself shows, by informing us that Paul Bril followed up the labours of his brother, who died in this very year. Van Mander and Sandrart both fix the birth of Paul Bril in the year 1556.

† "Lanzi's Lives of the Painters," Vol I., p. 50.

‡ If it be true that Paul Bril owed his selection to succeed his brother to Sixtus V., a year must be added to the date of Mathew's death, for Sixtus V. did not ascend the pontifical throne till 1585. If, on the contrary, Mathew died in 1584, it is Gregory III. who must have accorded to Paul the favours which had been bestowed upon his brother.

Paul Bril far surpassed his brother Mathew. The latter retained to the last the hard and stiff Flemish manner of the sixteenth century; Paul, on the other hand, was distinguished by the harmony of his colouring, the lightness of his touch, and the great simplicity and grandeur of all his compositions. These qualities, however, did not show themselves until the second period of his artistic career. In fact, there appears so wide a difference between his earlier works and those executed in his manhood and old age, that it has been generally supposed that he altered his style after having seen the works of Titian and Annibal Carrachi. That he was improved by the study of these great masters is quite possible; but if a profound sentiment of reality, and the genius with which heaven had gifted him, had not taught him faithfully to represent nature, the example of other painters would never have given him originality. Before he saw Titian and Carrachi, he had seen the country, he had seen the Alps—these were his masters. "The Alps," says Hagedorn, "taught Paul Bril and his brother Mathew how to treat landscape. They awakened in the mind of the ultramontane artists the taste for choosing beautiful countries, and of looking at the rich points of view, as the chief objects of the painting." In the series of sixty engravings of the works of his master, Paul Bril, which Nieuwand has left us, it is easy to perceive the justice of this observation. The grandeur of the lines, the depth of the horizon, the vivid appearance of the atmosphere, and the various accidents of the ground, all remind us of a mountainous region.

There are few subjects in landscape which Paul Bril has not touched. In his works we meet at one time with rural scenes, clear rivers whose water turns the wheel of a mill overshadowed by huge trees, shepherds driving their flocks down hollow and picturesque declivities; at another, cascades and torrents flowing between high mountains covered with firs, and sweeping away trees and rocks in their impetuous course (in this way he traces the route to Everdingen and Ruysdael); at another, a sandy beach, on which the sea is breaking gently, as in a picture of Van de Velde; and sometimes rays of the sun gleaming across clouds—a phenomenon which the great Ruysdael knew how to render with so much feeling. Bril's animals are in general coarse and rude looking, and display few traces of painstaking or elaboration. It is evident that he had not studied their anatomy, and had not acquired the art of rendering correctly either the wool and hair which forms their covering, or the grace and simplicity of their attitudes. The living beings of his landscape, his figures, were those trees—of which he knew so well how to contrast the profiles, to round off the tufted heads, to vary the forms, the masses, and the outline, indicating by this variety the diversity of the species. His favourite tree was the oak with knotted trunk, the foliage strongly emphasized, and the colour dark green. He never fails to surround it with ivy: this graceful parasite creeps from the base of the trunk, which it covers with verdure, till it entwines itself amongst the highest branches, and then falls back amongst the leaves in loose and flexible lianes. By this alone a picture of Paul, Bril's may always be recognised. He never paints an oak which does not bear the sacred mistletoe in its knotty arms. His water is beautiful and transparent; his rocks firm, well broken, wild, and abrupt.

This painter, who had, in a great degree, to create the art of landscape painting, and who was the first, according to Hagedorn, to think of lowering the horizon, to which his predecessors had given too great elevation, and who thus gave truth to the landscape by presenting us with the spectacle of nature such as she appears to us from the ground on which we stand, and not as we see her from the top of a high mountain or the ear of a balloon,—this painter of genius was able, when his talents had reached their height, to execute works which will bear comparison with those of the greatest masters of the seventeenth century. "Pan and Syrinx," "Duck Shooting," "Diana followed by her Nymphs," "Diana discovering the weakness of Calisto," are some of his chefs-d'œuvre. If you want to have the idea of profound solitude—of virgin nature, where the vegetation is as luxuriant as in the forests of America—where the penetrating odour of the verdure intoxicates you—stand for a moment before the picture which represents "Duck Shooting." No one has better understood or better translated the exact force and beauty of the Latin word frondosus. To the right, two enormous oaks, covered with ivy, as Paul Bril loved to depict them, serve as a set-off to the background of the picture, in which we perceive a river overshadowed by trees which the light caresses, the farthest off being put in their place by the interposition of a light vapour. How skilfully they are grouped! Their position betrays all the undulations of the soil on which they flourish; their summits are reflected in the water. Grass, reeds, plants of every kind, grow on these charming banks; the lazy cattle plunge into the midst of them, and there, up to their shoulders, remain immovable. What pure air, what freshness, what silence, under that arch formed by the young trees to the right! And, nevertheless, two hunters have made their way into this quiet retreat; already one of them is taking aim at the ducks that are disporting themselves upon the banks of the river. An unexpected report will soon awaken the sleeping echoes, and destruction mark the presence of man. These figures are said to be the work of Annibal Carracci.

The most admirable feature in this painting, as in most of Paul Bril's landscapes, is his distances. The lightness of his touch in the backgrounds is marvellous; that transparent and bluish gauze, that the atmosphere seems to spread over distant objects, particularly in mountainous regions, is found in all his paintings. It floats on the top of the trees, on the summit of the hills, on the azure of the sky, and covers every object with a poetic indistinctness, and all the while the objects in the foreground are rendered with a readiness, liveliness, and freedom often verging on crudity. Paul Bril devotes his whole genius to the representation of this wonderful effect of nature. In the foreground of his compositions, he usually places to the right or left large trees plunged in shade, which make his horizons retreat out of sight bathed in vaporous light. Paul Bril had dimly foreseen those admirable perspectives which Claude Lorrain has flooded with golden sunlight. The former had less brilliancy and less life. It is Alpine nature; it is landscape seen between high mountains, whose shadows maintain perpetual freshness. On the contrary, it was under the burning sun of Italy that Claude received the splendid revelation of his genius. Nevertheless, we are far from asserting that Paul Bril was equal to Lorrain; but still the elder master has sometimes attained to such perfection, that mistakes have been made, and the works of the Fleming attributed to the Frenchman. M. Waagen found at Bleenheim House a small landscape attributed to Claude, which he took for a Paul Bril. He was not far mistaken after all, for Claude was the pupil of Augustin Tassi, who was the disciple of Bril.

In those works in which Bril has risen to the full height of his genius, there is a remarkable mixture of Italian style and Flemish simplicity. In "Diana and Calisto," "Pan and Syrinx," appear already the splendid arrangement, the broad and harmonious lines, and the choice of trees and sites, peculiar to the historic landscape. In other compositions Paul Bril has given us triumphal arches, temples, edifices, marked by reminiscences of Roman and Athenian architecture. The ideal of beauty, which antiquity had handed down to the Italy of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and which inspired the painting and sculpture of that period, then commenced to exercise some influence upon landscapes also. As soon as the Greek temple or the Roman aqueduct makes its appearance in the scene, it seems as if nature should assimilate herself to the calm regularity of these rows of elegant columns, to the stern boldness displayed by these arches. Paul Bril was the first to seek in nature this antique ideal, and it was his finger which pointed out to Poussin the road to immortality. But if Paul Bril had some presentiment of the heroic landscape, he did not altogether lose the simple and true sentiment of nature, by which the Flemish painters have been generally distinguished—the more modern idea of reality, by which man does not seek to arrange nature according to his views or philosophy, but is content with the humble contemplation of her beauties, surrenders himself wholly to her influence, and asks in exchange the secret of her mysterious poetry. Although Bril's remembrance of his native land grew fainter the longer his stay in Italy and the older he became, there is, nevertheless, not one of his works in which some traces of it are not to be found. He always manages, even in those paintings which bear most marks of attention to style, to introduce some quiet nook, some arch of verdure, some spring bubbling up through broken rocks, in which nature is revealed in her chaste and graceful nudity. It may safely be affirmed, not only that Claude and Poussin descend from Paul Bril, but that the naturalist school—if we may use the phrase—of the Low Countries ought to recognise him, if not as a master, at least as a precursor.

Such was the reputation which Paul Bril enjoyed at Rome, that the cardinals and Roman nobles disputed with the popes for the time which he spent in adibus vaticanis. It would be impossible to enumerate all the frescoes, all the paintings on canvas and copper, which he executed for the different churches, chapels, and monuments of Rome, or sold to private individuals. No one thought of decorating his palace or gallery with a landscape from the pencil of this master, who was not prepared to spend more than one hundred ducats in acquiring it. This was the price of his smallest works, and it was not every one who could obtain them even at this price. His contemporaries with justice placed the greatest value upon those of his landscapes which represented scenes in the country round Rome, in which the nobility extolled the exact fidelity with which the artist rendered the monuments, the trees, and the fading outline of the hills; but they admired above all his truth in detail, and the breadth in the masses of his foliage. In the latter, in particular, he surpassed all his predecessors—and we might almost add that he has never been equalled since. His predecessors have been able to give more grace and naturalness—if we may use the word—to their trees; but none knew so well as he how to indicate, by the drawing of the leaves and the touch of the trunks, the difference of species; by the undulations of the top, or the inclination of the stem, the nature of the ground concealed beneath. Woods, when seen from on high, from the summit of a mountain which overlooks them, have the appearance of a sea of verdure, which the breeze skims over or raises like the waves of the ocean. Paul Bril noticed and painted this phenomenon with surprising ability.

He died at Rome, on the 7th of October, 1626, in his seventy-second year, and was buried in the Church of the Anima. His last works show great finish, and perhaps the example of Adam Elsheimer, who was at Rome about this period, had some influence upon the last efforts of his genius. Among the chefs-d'œuvre of this period of his career is a small landscape on marble, possessing the utmost mellowness of touch. It seems that his hand, instead of growing heavy as he grew older, became lighter and firmer; so that he was able to etch (a process just then coming into use), a few years before his death, several landscapes, in which he gave full scope to his imagination.

Bril's reputation caused disciples to resort to him from all parts of Europe. He had many pupils, among whom were William Niewland and Augustin Tassi, of whom we have already spoken, Spierings, Balthasar Louvers, and Cornelius Vroom. Augustin Tassi and Niewland bore, one to Italy and France, and the other to Holland, the tradition of Bril's genius. We have already mentioned that Claude Lorrain was the pupil of Tassi.

Paul Bril, then, was the head of that generation of great landscape painters who immortalized the art of the seventeenth century. This is no doubtful title to glory; but he has others, and nothing proves it better than to see his name shining at the side of the illustrious names of so many immortal disciples. How was it that the light of his genius was not eclipsed by such a blaze of splendour as is reflected from Sandrart makes mention, also, of a large engraving composed of ruins and figures.

Many able artists have engraved Paul Bril's works, amongst others, the Sadlers, C. Gulle, Hollar, D. Custos, A. J. Prenner, Vorstermann, Hondius, Madeleine de Pass, and Nieutheirs? Because his was truly original—because with extraordinary good fortune he united the strong and simple powers of observation of the Flemings with the elegance and nobility of the Italians—because his works possess at the same time ingenuity and grandeur, that is not found, in the same degree, at least, in those who have followed and surpassed him. Bril has etched several of his own drawings with great skill.

1. "A Landscape," adorned with ruins and buildings, in which is represented the parable of the Good Samaritan.

2. "The Angel ordering young Tobias to take the fish from the water."

3. "A Marine view." Shepherds in the foreground; in the middle a town in the distance, and beyond it the sea with ships.

4. Another "Marine view;" in the foreground a large vessel lying in the roadstead at anchor, and in the background a rock, crowned by a fortress.

These four are found in the series engraved by William Niewland.

land, who has engraved a series of sixty. Nearly all the public galleries of Europe contain some of his works. In the Louvre there are seven—"Duck Shooting," with figures by Annibal Carracci, of which we give an engraving; "Diana and her Nymphs," which we also reproduce, and four other landscapes. These paintings have been valued, the first at £80; the second at £120; and the others at £60, £40, £32 respectively. Munich possesses two; Dresden the same number; Amsterdam, one only; Berlin, three or four; the Museo del Rey, at Madrid, four also.

In Blenheim House, there is a very fine one, which long passed for a Claude. The "Tower of Babel" is at Corsam House, in the possession of the Methuen family. There is, also, a very fine landscape at Castle Howard, the seat of the Earl of Carlisle.

At Rome, in one of the halls of the Pope's palace, there is a large landscape in fresco, more than sixty feet long, representing St. Clement fastened to an anchor and cast into the sea; in another, six landscapes, representing the finest convents in the papal states. Bril also painted on the ceilings of the two staircases, beside the Scala Santa, near St. John of Lateran, the story of Jonas; the "Landscape representing the Creation of the World," is at Monte Cavallo; at St. Vitae there are ten landscapes, and at St. Cecilia one on the ceiling.

There are a great number of Brill's paintings at the palace of Fontainebleau. The artists who have painted the figures in most of his works are, A. Carrachi, Josepin, Rottenhamer, &c. He has left behind him some drawings very ably executed with the pen and a wash of bistre or Indian ink, upon which he passed hatchings in every direction.

Brill's works have rarely made their appearance at public sales, but whenever they have done so, they have fetched tolerably good prices. We have found neither marks nor signature upon any of them. His etchings are marked thus—

DUCK SHOOTING.—FROM A PAINTING BY PAUL BRILL.

ALBERT DURER.

"Here, when art was still religion, with a simple, reverent heart, Lived and laboured Albrecht Durer, the evangelist of art;
Here, in silence and in sorrow, toiling still with busy hand,
Like an emigrant he wandered, seeking for the Better Land.
Emigravit is the inscription on the tombstone where he lies;
Dead he is not, but departed,—for the artist never dies.
Fairer seems the ancient city, and the sunshine seems more fair,
That he once has trod its pavement, that he once has breathed its air!"

Thus sings the poet of a great nation, which, when Albert Durer was living and labouring, was not in existence. In what he says he but echoes the sentiments of all Europe. There is none who does not reverence Germany for having produced such a man—none who does not love art more because he was one of her disciples. The mere mention of his name awakens in our minds the strangest ideas, and opens to our view the perspective of a new world. It is, as it were, a calling up of all the dreams of Germany. Mysterious shapes appear to us at first indistinctly, looming through a mist. Here, an unknown cavalier makes his way among rocks and leafless trees, followed by a demon with outstretched claws, and accompanied by the figure of Death mounted on his white horse. He advances with a firm step, regardless of the monsters which surround him, and the reptiles which crawl at his feet. There, a knight, who, like Perseus, has wings attached to his heels, and a helmet in the shape of a gigantic butterfly, has checked his horse near a ruined arch, and knocks at the portal of a deserted mansion, as though he expects the spirits of the dead to rise and come forth. Yonder an immense bat, spreading its hideous wings in the clouds, hovers over a woman seated on the sea-shore, in an attitude of dejection, her name is Melancholy. In these obscure regions fabulous heroes and nameless beings are strangely intermingled with the characters of sacred history and the executioners of Jesus Christ. It might be said, that whole legions pass before us. But we are surprised to find those symbolical figures, which inspire us with a secret terror—we know not wherefore—ranged side by side with known and familiar objects; peasants dancing on the green, and carrying baskets of fruit; the smiling faces of young girls, shaded by the simple lace cap, such as are seen at the village church or by the quiet fireside. Domestic scenes and common-place things are singularly intermingled with the spectres of the Black Forest, or the strange phantoms of German superstition—the most familiar of which is the shaggy and horned demon. This elegant gallant, who is walking in the country with his richly-dressed and smiling lady, is evidently in happy ignorance, that close to him, concealed by the trunk of a tree, is grim Death, in the shape of a living skeleton. Oh! strange and mysterious world, in which the most ideal poetry is confounded with the simplest realities! Such a world is presented to us in the works of Albert Durer. But if studied more minutely and patiently, another medley, not less surprising than the former, engages our attention. Those visions, at first so indistinct, have assumed bodily shapes, whose outlines are clearly defined; those phantoms have taken precise forms, and their draperies fall in stiff metallic-looking folds. We might even count the hairs of their heads, those of the manes of their couriers, the rivets in their cuirasses, the blades of grass which they tread under foot, the smallest stones in the house which they inhabit, and the most minute of the leaves of the trees which shelter it. And when we turn to the man whose labours have produced these images, so lifelike and yet so imaginary, we acknowledge this strange visionary to be the most skilful goldsmith, the most indefatigable engraver, the most inimitable painter; that he loved to carve on the brass the chimeras of the Apocalypse, and to chisel his own dreams on steel. We find that this lover of the marvellous and fantastic pursued the study of the positive sciences; that this imaginative poet was a consummate mathematician; that this visionary was also a skilful geometer.

Albert Durer is rightfully acknowledged as the father of the German school. He was the living personification of the genius and talent of Germany. Historical events, consequent upon the grand struggle for the reformation of the Church, the peasant war, and the thirty years' war, retarded the progress of art in Germany from the time of its foundation by the great Nuremberg painter. It remained in stagnation for nearly two centuries, so that the works of Albert Durer continued to be the highest expression of German art, and, so to speak, her best struck medal.

One of Durer's earliest works, which bears the same date as his first celebrated picture, 1498, is a series of wood-engravings representing "The Apocalypse." It was certainly a strange beginning. To measure his strength in the outset against a subject at once so whimsical, terrible and sublime, of which it even seems impossible to form a conception; to mount, for his coup d'essai "Death's Pale Horse," and to plunge into the boundless regions of the imaginary world,—none but a German would have dared such an enterprise. The spectres which had terrified the recluse of Patmos were represented by Durer in a set of fifteen engravings. A wild and mystic poetry pervades them, the artist at once transports us into the realms of another world. He there shows us ominous horsemen, one bearing a bow, another a naked sword, the third a pair of scales, and the fourth the scythe of Death, the destroyer of whole nations. With what fury do they rush onwards! See how their panting and ungovernable chargers bound through the regions of space! These are no earthly steeds; steeds, such as these, require the gigantic riders, who have seized their manes and press their flanks. In what dream did this chain of phantoms appear to Durer? Into what sleep did he fall to see pass before him visions created by the brain of an old man of a hundred, those terrible symbols of which the signification is to us unknown!

One of the most remarkable amongst these engravings is the eighth. There are seen the angels of the Euphrates let loose by the anger of heaven, and massacring the third of the human race. Their gleaming swords fall with indescribable fury on all sides indiscriminately. In the heavens are seen the aerial riders mounted on beasts possessing the bodies of horses, and the heads of lions; this is the flying host destined for the annihilation of the rest of the human race. Already the emperor, the bishop, the nun, and the monk, have fallen victims to their fury; here the Protestant artist has betrayed his thoughts in attempting to explain the inexplicable vision of the Evangelist, for, in the ruin of these hooded and mitred personages, we recognise that the graver has been guided by a friend of Melancthon and a disciple of Luther.

There is something most singular and original in Albert Durer's paintings and engravings, they are impregnated by the most misty spiritualism, and at the same time characterised by a patient and minute execution brought to the very highest finish. One would say that the artist observed this accuracy in order to prevent his poetic ideas from becoming indistinct. The more fanciful and obscure the subject, the greater pains did he take to render the figures plain and decisive; if we cannot fathom the profundity of his meaning, we can at least catch the reality of the figures which express it. Take, for example, his celebrated engraving known under the name of the "Great Horse," you will be astonished at first by the extreme delicacy of the work, you will admire the distinctness of the outline, the exactness with which the accessories are rendered, and the incredible patience of the engraver; but if you seek to penetrate the sense of the composition, you will be at a loss to know what motive actuates this fierce-looking warrior, who, holding his horse by the bridle, stops at the portal of a ruinous castle. It will only inspire you with an undefinable feeling of terror, and, in endeavouring to catch the meaning of the artist, you are lost in a bewildering maze of conjecture.

The love of the extravagant and fantastic, observable from the first in the works of the great German painter, never abandoned him. In that dreamer "Melancholy," who, seated on the sea-shore, seems seeking to penetrate with her gaze into infinite space, he has apparently expressed the inspiration of his own soul. For my own part, I have this picture always before me. How is it possible ever to forget an engraving of Albert Durer's, even though seen but once! I ever see her, her proud and noble head thoughtfully resting upon one hand, her long hair falling in dishevelled tresses upon her shoulders. Her folded wings, emblematic of that impotent aspiration, which directs her gaze towards heaven, whilst a hook, closed and useless as her wings, rests upon her knee. No, nothing can be more gloomy, more penetrating, than the expression of this figure. From the peculiarity of the folds of her dress, one would say, that she was enveloped in iron draperies. Near her is a symbolical sun-dial, with the bell which marks the hours as they glide away. The sun is sinking into the ocean, and darkness will soon envelop the earth. Above hovers a strange-looking bat, which, spreading its ominous wings, bears a pennon, on which is written the word—"Melencolia."

All is symbolical in this composition, of which the sentiment is sublime. Melancholy holds in her right hand a pair of compasses and a circle, the emblem of that eternity in which her thoughts are lost. Various instruments appertaining to the arts and sciences lie scattered around her; after having made use of them, she has laid them aside, and has fallen into a profound reverie. As a type of the mistrust which has crept into her heart, with avarice and doubt, a bunch of keys is suspended at her girdle; above her is an hour-glass, the acknowledged emblem of her transitory existence. But nothing is more admirable than the face of Melancholy, both in the severe beauty of her features and the depth of her gaze, in which may be recognised a likeness to Agnes,—a remarkable fact, which I do not think has before been noticed! In 1514 Albert Durer conceived the type of Dr. Faust, which illustrates that state of mind in which the result of science is but doubt, the result of experience but bitter and disheartening disappointment. Three centuries before the age of Goethe, an artist depicted the grief which in our days torments the minds of choice spirits; but the painter was not so well understood as the poet, although the poet was evidently inspired by the painter. Neither the sentiment of melancholy nor the word which expresses it had appeared in art before the time of Albert Durer.

We will now speak of the celebrated engraving called "Death's Horse." It is said that Albert Durer intended to represent Franz Von Sickingen, whose name was dreaded throughout Germany, thus giving him a terrible warning. An S traced on the picture goes far to corroborate this supposition. But, setting aside the possibility of this allusion, and also the idea that the artist intended to represent his own journey through life, this great work obtains a more lasting importance and a more general application. An old ballad has moreover suggested another signification. It thus presents to us the model of the Christian, sans peur et sans reproche. "Let Death and the Devil attack me, says the knight, I will conquer both the Devil and Death." Such was Durer's love of the marvellous and the fantastic, that many subjects for pictures and engravings were furnished him by his dreams. Among them is one of the most singular water-colour paintings which has ever been exhibited; this picture is in the Ambrasian collection at Vienna. There is seen a large sheet of water which washes the shores of a plain, upon which are several houses. Over this water hangs a huge black cloud, which is discharging itself in torrents of rain. On every side the air is filled with vapour. Albert Durer wrote these words beneath this painting:—

"On Thursday night, the eve of the Pentecost, in the year 1525, I had this vision in my sleep. What torrents of water fell from the heavens! This water struck the earth about four miles from me with such force, such reverberation and noise, the whole country was flooded, and such a mortal dread seized me, that I awoke: I again fell asleep. Then the remainder of the water fell nearly as abundantly as before, some at a greater distance, some nearer. It seemed to fall from such a height, that to my mind the descent occupied a long time. But as the flood approached nearer and nearer, the deluge became so rapid and resounding, that fear seized me, and I again awoke. My whole body trembled, and it was long before I could recover myself; but in the morning when I rose I painted what I had seen. May God order all for the best!"

"ALBERT DURER."

This is certainly a most artless description. However, Joseph Heller, an eminent German writer, the author of the best life of Albert Durer which has yet appeared, would not allow his ingenuity to be vanquished. He spends much time in explaining this water-colour painting otherwise so incomprehensible. He gives with the utmost care the most minute details, is even so scrupulous in his examination as to take note of the manufacturer's mark on the piece of paper used by Albert Durer. Moreover, the learned commentator had this mark engraved and joined to his text.

Notwithstanding the generally abstract character of German genius, the serious and thoughtful habits of Albert Durer did not always keep him aloof from the world of realities. He sometimes abandoned the region of chimeras and phantoms, to work at the grandest and noblest religious subjects. "The Martyrs of the Christian Legion," which is to be seen in the Austrian Belvedere gallery; "The Adoration of the Magi," which is preserved in the gallery of the Uffizzi at Florence; "The Trinity," surrounded by the angelic host; these and many other pictures prove that this great master respected the limits which separate the imaginary from the visible. Some out of this class are his chefs-d'œuvre, but the most perfect of all adorns the Pinakothek at Munich. It is divided into two compartments, one of which contains the apostles St. John and St. Peter, the other St. Mark and St. Paul. It was the last important production of the great artist. He had the satisfaction of ending his career by a happy and eminently successful effort towards the sublime. He painted these figures of the Apostles with the intention of leaving them in his will to be placed in the Town Hall at Nuremberg, in order to preserve there, by the memory of his genius, the religious fervour of the Lutherans; for Durer had embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, and the questions to which they gave rise constantly occupied his thoughts. He painted beneath "The Apostles," long inscriptions gathered from their epistles and gospels, recommending us not to neglect the study of the scriptures, or to believe in the doctrines of false prophets. He has given to each one of these figures a distinct and well-defined character. The exile of Patmos is represented as possessing a passionate, enthusiastic, and melancholy temperament; St. Peter, with his gray hairs and calm deportment, expresses contemplative repose; St. Mark bears the aspect of a hopeful man and a zealous propagator of the faith; the figure of St. Paul, armed with a naked sword, and carrying the bible, is the symbol of action, energy, and imperious will; he casts a severe and searching glance around him, as if to discover all blasphemers, in order to destroy them with the sword of the living God.

We must not suppose that Durer never relaxed from his severe gravity. His familiar letters sometimes discover an inclination to gaiety, at times even an approach to harmless raillery. It is true that they were written at Venice, away from his wife. He writes thus to his friend Willibald Pirckheimer:—

"I should judge from what you have written me, that you are anxious to do the amiable, but that becomes you as perfume does a lansquinet. You think that when you have decked yourself out in silks, and made yourself agreeable to the women, that you have done all that you as modest should not be anxious to do. "ALBERT DURER."

Many of Albert Durer's paintings and engravings belong to the class called genre. He dealt with fanciful subjects as well as familiar and rural scenes. Sometimes two lovers are represented walking affectionately together in the country; sometimes the villagers enjoying their evening dance; sometimes a peasant attempting to win a young girl by his deceitful promises. Durer understood the Flemish style, the peaceful charm of every-day life, the poetry to be found in realities. Albert Durer was not only a painter of the first order, and a wonderful engraver, but he had also learnt to handle the tool of the goldsmith and the chisel of the sculptor. In nearly all the German towns, works in alto-relievo, as well as medallions, are shown to the traveller as his productions.

Sculptor, painter, engraver, this great man has also written learned works. Had he been known merely as an author, he would still have borne an illustrious name. His most celebrated work is a "Treatise on the Proportions of the Human Body," in four books.

Having mentioned so celebrated a work, perhaps we may be permitted to express our full opinion. This book has been little read, which is partly the fault of the author. Unintelligible and without animation, it disconcerts and discourages the reader in the outset. For instance, there is no order in his arrangement, he does not set to work as a methodical mind would have done, "commencing with the large divisions and ending with the small." Before learning the position of the fourteenth part of the human body, we ought to know something about the half. This disagreeable impression, which is produced by the diffuse character of an ill-arranged book, sufficiently explains why those authors who are fond of clearness have only glanced at Albert Durer's, and im-diately pronounced it incomprehensible; sometimes, however, we may gather from it beautiful ideas. Albert Durer seems to have believed that nature has arranged even her deformities with a certain regularity, that even ugliness is harmowhich is common to all countries and ages, and which exerts a universal influence. It is true, that occasionally, especially in his picture of "The Apostles," he approaches sublimity. As no painter has expressed grief with so much nious,—an idea which has been very cleverly developed by Diderot.

Albert Durer's exclusively German taste prevented him from attaining that true beauty, that harmonious perfection, depth and force as he in his painting of "The Passion," which he began three times, so none has displayed more grace and tenderness than is shown in his "Life of the Virgin." A zealous Lutheran, from nothing did Durer gather greater inspiration than from Holy Writ, and filled with that Christian sentiment which obtained such influence in the middle ages, he allowed his Protestant thoughts to betray themselves in his works. Judging from his later productions, it seems limited sense of the word—that is to say, his works are not only remarkable for their national character, but the greater part of them only suit the taste of the population of the Upper Rhine. One is struck with astonishment at his probable that he contemplated at one time the union of Gothic and Italian art. Whilst Luther broke with Rome, Dürer held out the hand of brotherhood to Raphael. Nevertheless, the painter of the "Death's Head" is too German, in the strange symbols, his thoughtful and singular attitudes, and his draperies are not less surprising than his figures. He disposes them in large masses, and breaks them into a multitude of little angular folds, which often gives them the appearance of metal. His colouring is clear and delicate, and too brilliant to be natural; it is very like that used for the illumination of ancient manuscripts, and of an intensity which quite offends the eye. His chiaroscuro has also a fanciful appearance; in it the light and shadow play, as in one of those powerful visions by which his sleep was troubled. In short, all Albert Durer's works, bearing so strongly the impress of German genius, betray the man of the North, who, combining in his life the simplest prose with the most ideal poetry, loves to rise above the world of realities into the realm of dreams.

GERICAULT.

GERICAULT was the son of an advocate of Rouen, and was born in that town in 1791. Unfortunately for him, his birth was as premature as his death; had he come into the world five years later, he would have enjoyed while living the glory which his works merited. But he died at the early age of thirty-three, as yet badly appreciated, understood only by a small number, and despised by those who, in his day, were the oracles of taste. Now the differences to which his works gave rise have disappeared and are forgotten, and there is no personal feeling to influence the judgment which the public may form of them.

He was originally destined to receive a careful and literary education. When fifteen, his father entered him in the Lycée Imperial. What then took place was what might have been expected to take place in the case of a youth of more than ordinary energy. His predominating tastes and tendencies revealed themselves with extraordinary rapidity; and so impatient did he grow to become an artist, and above all a painter of horses, that to pursue his classical studies was out of the question; for horses were his passion even from infancy. Whenever he had a holiday, he spent it in the riding-school, and at Franconi's, whom he thought the greatest of men. He often hung about the doors of the nobility, for the purpose of watching their horses being driven off in their carriages, and often ran after them like the street gamins. When seventeen years of age, he was placed in the studio of Carlo Vernet. After leaving him, he placed himself under Guérin, to whom his peculiar mode of colouring appeared ridiculous in the extreme. Géricault had studied in the Museum, and had there commenced to copy Rubens at the very outset—a piece of audacity till then unheard of—so that he brought with him racy tones, the mannerized forms, and a good deal of boldness. He now found his position most uncomfortable. He thought that he would one day become a great painter; his master thought not, and in fact advised him to give up thoughts of painting altogether. This hurt him greatly, but did not by any means dishearten him. On leaving Guérin he completed his education by reading the English poets, and by the study of Italian, music, and by diligent attention to the antique. He also spent much of his time in copying the old masters.

Géricault was then a fine young man, above the middle height, well proportioned, and elegant in his manners, a great admirer of the women, and greatly admired by them, and quite a lion on the Champs de Mars. Now-a-days, he would have been merely a member of the jockey club, and an exquisite; but the gaieties, and frivolities, and rascalities of the turf had no bad effect on Géricault. On the contrary, they furnished him with a rich store of materials for study and observation. It was not the fop or "fast man," who went a hunting and rode steeple-chases; it was the artist. His father, however, and his family were so opposed to his following the vocation he had chosen, that they did not even allow him funds to provide himself with a studio, and he was compelled to make use of those of his friends. He continued his course with success, barring a foolish, but temporary abandonment of his profession for the purpose of entering the royalist garde du corps, after the restoration in 1814. He was soon disgusted, as was every man of mind in France, by the feeble and ridiculous attempts of the Bourbons to restore the old régime, and returned to his first love. He now resolved to conform to the old and time-honoured custom of artists spending some time in Italy, and set out thither in 1817. He was not long in Rome before his style became greatly modified. He studied the frescoes of Michael Angelo, and of many others; the subdued tones of the paintings in the churches, from which age and the smoke of the candles had taken all their brilliancy, quite captivated him. Impressionable and excitable, he began to doubt his own force, and ask himself what was he in the presence of these giants, whom lapse of time had only made greater, and, he set about painting gray and brown purposely. On his return from Italy, he already began to throw slight upon colour, and speak of all colourists with disdain. So it is true, after all, that Italy is not useful to everybody. Some run the risk of losing their originality, by coming in contact with the works of these illustrious dead. With them it is impossible to enter into discussion.

At last an opportunity presented itself for Géricault to undertake a great work, which should place him amongst the masters. He chose for his subject the "Shipwreck of the Medusa," the frightful details of which then occupied all minds. It was a terrible one, which perfectly suited the peculiar character of his genius. He prepared for it by severe study and assiduous labour. He familiarised himself with the aspect of death in every possible form, frequented the hospitals for the purpose of watching all the alternations of hope, despair, terror, and anguish in the human countenance. Whoever has visited the Louvre must have observed the "Shipwreck of the Medusa." Those who have not may form some idea of it from Reynolds's engraving. It is a scene of horror, lighted by one ray of hope. Fifteen unfortunates, with livid faces, half naked, with hollow eyes and ferocious aspect, are represented clustered in groups on a raft, badly tied together, and swept by every passing wave. Of the forty-eight who had entrusted themselves to this frail structure, these fifteen only had survived, and for the preceding eight days had been living on the flesh of the dead, who had perished of hunger, or been killed by the sabre, in a mutiny which had broken out, as if to add fresh horrors to the scene. Suddenly one of them perceives a sail in the horizon, has uttered a loud cry, and the others starting up, like galvanised corpses, raise themselves, and stretch out their arms in the direction in which the succour appears. Those who have any strength remaining, seek to climb upon the casks, in order to wave their handkerchiefs in sign of distress; in such a way that all the figures of the painting follow the general movement of ascent, towards the highest point, the point of hope. Some of them, however, in whom only a breath of life still lingers, remain stretched upon the planks of the raft, half floating on the waves. Here a young man rolls wildly about, and tears his hair in despair; there an old man, holding his dead son across his knees, remains mute and immoveable, as if thunderstruck. Deaf to the voice of his comrades, who announce their approaching deliverance, his heart seared by suffering, and indifferent whether he lives or dies, he gazes vacantly upon the waves, which so soon shall prove the burying-place of his child.

The painter should rather be congratulated than otherwise upon having made those about to die of the same tone as the dead, and for having given uniformity of colour to the draperies, sails, mast, and cordage; for there was no other means of producing that sombre harmony so necessary to the power of emotion. Unity is, in reality, the secret of strong impressions; and this was so well understood by Géricault, that none of his episodes distract the attention nor divide the interest. If you recur often to that petrified head of the old man, it is because the whole catastrophe seems concentrated in him.

There is but one thing wanting in the work—the immensity of the sea. The little that we see is, to be sure, of rare beauty. The dark, deep, heavy water, in which bodies sink so slowly, and which in times of storm loses its transparency, and almost assumes the appearance; but even this splendid execution does not make up for the want of expression produced by the sky meeting the heaven in every quarter—pontum, et undique pontum. In a scene like this, nature should be everything, and man comparatively insignificant.

Géricault was modest as became a gentleman; but he still was fully conscious of his own genius—in other words, his modesty was but one form of his legitimate pride. He repudiated the praises that his friends heaped upon him, but it was because his works did not come up to the standard which he had fixed for himself. The "Wreck of the Medusa" was, in his eyes, but the preface to the great things which he might yet achieve.

In 1820 he brought the painting to England, with the view of exhibiting it, as the event it depicted had here excited as much horror and pity as in France. The enterprise proved successful, and he realised not less than 20,000 francs by it. It was then that the celebrated engraver, Reynolds, reproduced it in an engraving in the dark manner which everyone knows.

When Géricault returned to Paris, his constitution had begun to give way. His letters betrayed a deep feeling of melancholy and ennui. His love, for his friends seemed to have increased in intensity, and he was continually complaining of the rarity of their visits and their letters. He became almost childishly sensitive, and the least appearance of neglect wounded him deeply. If they were a long while without coming to see him, he wrote them a ceremonious letter, in which his native tenderness was ill concealed by a constrained politeness.

He was destined to fall a victim to his own boldness. He was one day out riding with M. Horace Vernet upon the heights of Montmartre: his horse was fiery and restive (he never rode one that was not so), reared up, plunged violently, and threw him on his face across a heap of stones. A buckle in his trousers was forced into his groin, wounding him severely. He was recovering slowly but satisfactorily, when he lost patience, and rising before he was well, brought on a relapse by his own imprudence. He again mounted on horseshack, and attended the races in the Champ de Mars, and while there received a violent shock from a gentleman riding up against him at full speed. He was once more an invalid, and for a year scarcely ever issued from his room; he occupied himself by having the lithographs which he had published in London copied under his own direction. Their printing had been badly executed in England, and he wished to have them reproduced. He still remained dull and melancholy, and was disquieted in mind by his inability to discharge some debts which he had contracted before his illness. His friends persuaded him to sell some of his paintings, which realised in one day the large sum of 13,000 francs. He was so astonished at this that he could hardly believe it, and accused his friends of having added to it out of their own pockets.

At last his health seemed completely restored, and he returned joyfully to his horse. He executed about this time a series of sketches of oriental costumes. He was about entering upon a still more ambitious work, when his malady suddenly returned, and this time was fatal. He died in his father's house, after a long and painful illness, on the 18th of January, 1824.

At Géricault's death, M. Dedreux Dorey, bearing 1 st the "Shipwreck of the Medusa" should pass into strange hands, bought it for 6,000 francs. Some Americans soon afterwards offered triple that sum for it; but M. Dorey refused to part with it, and soon after sold it to the government for what it had cost him, on condition that it should be placed in the Louvre, where it now hangs.

Géricault was an able sculptor as well as painter. On the walls of his studio he cut figures with his knife worthy of the frieze of the Parthenon. At Evreux there are many of his sculptures, amongst others, a lion in repose, and a bas-relief in wax representing an ancient cavalier. M. Etex has raised a noble mausoleum to his memory. Upon the pedestal, copies of his three principal works are sculptured. "The Shipwreck of the Medusa" appears in bronze upon the front, and on the sides "The Chasseur" and "The Cuirassier." A man of action, fiery, impetuous, and full of manly hardihood, as Géricault was, should have been sculptured upright on his tomb, as David has sculptured Armand Carrel. M. Etex, on the contrary, has represented him tranquilly and pensively reclining. The name of Géricault would always remain as that of an innovator, and yet he has not exaggerated nor gone to extremes. His style was firm, emphasized, and easily distinguishable. Without seeking after common types, he knew how to make use of them, and imprint upon them that character of force which is in reality another kind of nobility. If he saw a drayman's horse passing, he sketched it eagerly in its powerful gait. He followed steadily in the path which David and Vernet had opened up. But, without doubt, if, after contemplating "The Sabines" of David in the Louvre, we turn towards "The Shipwreck of the Medusa," the latter will produce a profound impression on us. When the two masters are placed in contrast, we can perceive an immense difference between them. Between the demigods of the former, and the agitated bodies of the latter, there is a vast gulf; but the intention displayed by both is the same—to enable humanity to infuse poetry into its history, and interest us in its misfortunes.

MURILLO.

It rarely happens that an artist of limited capacity takes much time in assuming his position. Nature having framed him for the comprehension of her beauties, some few aspects alone impart to his mind so vivid an impression of them, that frequently, on emerging from his first studies, the painter masters with a single effort the branch of art by which he hopes to gain eminence, and even the degree of perfection which he may be permitted to attain. On the other hand, an artist endowed with a universal comprehension, capable of making every chord of art vibrate simultaneously, and of thus blending the harmonies of many in himself alone, is never formed so rapidly. His progress is neither so deliberate, so direct, nor so determined. What a length of time does it not take to ripen that individuality which is as yet unconscious of its power, precisely because that power is so multifarious! What crude essays, what groping in the dark, what mixture of styles, what inroads on the domains of others, and how many relapses to originality, before the incipient master feels his strength, and can exclaim, in the proud language of Correggio, Anch' io son pittore! Such was the life of Murillo.

Will it be believed? It is no longer in the convent of the Franciscans at Seville that we must look for the pictures which first led to the celebrity of the Andalusian painter. It is in Paris alone that are now to be found the greater number of those pictures wherein the power of light and shade was so forcibly rendered from a close study of the works of Ribera. Carried off in the artillery waggons of the French generals, some of these paintings, such as the "Franciscan Cook in an Ecstasy," have contributed to enrich the magnificent museum of Marshal Soult; others, such as the "Death of Santa Clara," have constituted the pride of the Aguado gallery. To the second phase of Murillo's talent belongs a "Banditti Scene," in which, from a landscape background, vigorously painted, are relieved the figures of a monk and a half-naked robber into whose clutches he has fallen. The whole is executed in the manner of Spagnoletto; as well as a "Flight of the Holy Family into Egypt," which represents the infant Jesus affectionately folded in the arms of his mother on the back of the humble quadruped he afterwards chose for his triumphal entry into Jerusalem, while Joseph the carpenter, leading the animal by the bridle, hastens forward through the shades of night.

In a country like Spain, Murillo must have easily won the love of the masses. He was essentially endowed with all that could please the Spaniards. Differing in that respect from Velasquez, who portrayed by preference the nobler attributes of the national character, he devoted himself to the illustration of its more vulgar qualities, and that of the ordinary and general habits and manners of the people, with all the contrasts which they offer in a nation so profoundly catholic. He could paint the sacred fervour of the devotee, or the ecstasy of the monkish enthusiast, as well as the raggedtrary, stops; he is struck with the effect produced by the sunbeam which has penetrated through the opening and heightened the tone of the urchin's rags. He finds the attitude artless, and the subject picturesque; the accident of light is vivid, piquant, and warm, and the head in good relief. In one moment the painter has sketched his chance model, if not on paper, at least in his mind's eye, and on returning to his studio he paints that little gem of observation, so broad in its simplicity of light and shade, which is now so much admired at the Louvre under the title of the "Youthful Mendicant." Nor has he forgotten any of the accessories; neither the simple pitcher of water, nor the old basket in which some fruit appears, nor the shrimps scattered on the table-cloth — the bare earth; the preparations for, or leavings of, a frugal repast, the beginning and end of which are pretty much alike. The head is full of character; the fragments of the vest are ness of the proud mendicant, or the abject suffering of Job. Being himself of a pious disposition, he frequently went to pray for whole hours in his own parochial church, and was sure to remark after service such beauties as might peep through their window-blinds to attract notice. As a catholic, Murillo was at once worldly and devout; as a Christian, he bore an equal love to all human creatures, whether they were ill made or elegantly formed, disfigured by poverty or set off by luxury, filthy to excess, or adorned like queens and radiant as Seraphim. Behold him issuing from the cloister of the Franciscans, where he has been painting an apparition of angels, who might be said to be arrayed in robes of light! at the corner of the first street he perceives through a window an urchin with a shaven head squatting against a Gothic ruin, busily engaged in ridding himself of some of those insinuating friends, whose society is anything but a luxury. Any other person would have averted his gaze, but Murillo, on the con-touched with boldness, for no one can properly paint rags; the flesh is modelled with care; the rough and sunburnt skin, and the callous soles of the feet, sufficiently indicate the truant habits of the vagabond, and the horror of work and clean water. Thus has Murillo involuntarily characterised the Spanish people by the single figure of this urchin, equally free from care and trouble, who, after unconsciously sitting for 1 is portrait, proudly holds up his head, and is at least as abstemious as he is idle. The picture itself is really a curious and agreeable object to look at.

That talent which served to make Murillo the most popular painter of Spain, had already brought him so much into notice, that in a short time he acquired fortune enough to be deemed worthy of espousing a lady of distinction (una persona de conveniencias) of the city of Pílas, Donna Beatriz de Cabrera y Sotomayor. This marriage took place in 1648, from which time he found his fame rapidly increase, at the same time that he felt his genius more fully develop itself. The originality of the painter at length threw off the shackles of imitation. Vandyck, Ribera, Titian, and even Velasquez, all the models at first so ingeniously imitated, faded by degrees from the memory of their admirer, and on their vanished traces arose a new artist, a master in his turn, who now displayed a character, a stamp, and a signature of his own; this was Esteban Murillo.

This was his third and last transformation. The violent light and shade, which he had borrowed from Ribera, sensibly softened and gained in transparency what it lost in force; his touch grew more mellow, his style became fixed, and nothing remained to him of the great Velasquez but the art of graduating his tints to paint the air, as finely expressed by Moratin.

not anxious to have the image of its patron saint from the hand of Murillo; nor was there a high altar of a cathedral, or a chapel of renown, which was not reserved for one or other of the innumerable "Conceptions," as rapidly composed by Murillo as they were varied in character. It might be almost said that this striking miracle continually enlightened his imagination. The rapt Virgin always appeared to him clothed in blue and white, the invariable apparel which, doubtless, in the thoughts of the painter combined the two colours of purity and heaven. As to the Cherubim with which he surrounded her, those tender zephyrs of the Christian mythology charm in a thousand different ways, always graceful and artless, now playing with the skirts and folds of the flowing drapery, now merely showing their winged

He further preserved that excellent gray tone of his which generally serves as a background to the portraits of Velasquez, in which the gravity of the personages habited in black combines so harmoniously with those cool and tranquil tints, in which still lingers that glow which makes the coldest tones of Spain approach even the warm hues of northern countries.

In spite of the fierce rivalry of Valdés Leal, and the jealousy of Herrera the younger, Murillo ascended without difficulty to the first position in Seville. People flocked to him from all parts to give him commissions for Virgins, for monks praying, for Saviours, and other devotional subjects—so truly did he paint them in accordance with the impassioned feelings of the Spaniards. There was not a community of Capuchins, of Augustins, of Franciscans, that was heads swimming in floods of light. It seems almost as if, when he had to represent the Virgin apprised by the angel of the mysteries of her future maternity, the Spanish painter fell back into naturalism, and even produced a powerful effect by the contrast between terrestrial individualities and the ideal signs and personages sent from on high. We see frequently in Murillo's "Annunciations" the accessories of domestic life, the workbag, the thimble, and the scissors upon the linen heaped up in the humble basket. It was not undesignedly that the Andalusian painter, avoiding the lofty style of Raphael and the Italian catholics, exhibits to us in an humble workwoman the Virgin chosen as the accepted medium for the incarnation of Deity.

When a stranger arrives at Seville, he is immediately conducted to the cathedral, that he may be shown the numerous paintings of Murillo, which the chapter is so justly proud of possessing. At the back of the high altar he is called upon to admire a "Nativity of Our Lady," admirable for the sweetness of the tints, its quiet shadows, and its charming tone of colour, hermoso colorido. The traveller, after this, is conducted to the grand sacristy, where glitter the famous pictures of St. Leander and St. Isidore, in pontifical habits. He is then stopped at one of the lateral chapels before a "Repose in Egypt," painted with the freest and most masterly handling, and resembling a Velasquez from its brilliant effect. Finally, to raise the admiration of the visitor to the pitch of enthusiasm, they unfold to his gaze the "Saint Anthony of Padua," and on contemplating this matchless and unapproachable masterpiece, the stranger, as yet but little familiarised with the beauties of Spanish painting, remains in rapt ecstasy like the Cenobite in the picture. In a gloomy cell the infant Jesus suddenly appears to Saint Anthony, in the midst of a dazzling glory; and the pious hermit, on his knees, enlightened by the apparition, throws up his arms in an indescribable transport of love for the Deity resplendent with light and beauty, towards whom he stretches out his arms as for a loving embrace. Never was the force of passionate expression carried beyond this point by any painter, nor ever was there produced, with brush and colours, skies more transparent or features of more seraphic sweetness. The management of the chiaro-oscuro is no less astonishing here than the faith of the visionary monk. It is inconceivable how the painter has been able, by the mere power of light and shade, to obtain so luminous an effect, and by what infinite gradation of treatment he has been able to pass from the intensity of the sun's rays to the peaceful obscurity of the hermit's cell.

But before quitting the cathedral of Seville, there remains to be seen the chapter house, the works of which were directed by Murillo in 1667 and 1668. Provided the eicerone be a well-informed canon—and some may yet be found among the chapter—he will not fail to assert, with a feeling of becoming pride, that for the "Saint Anthony of Padua" the artist received 10,000 reals, equal to 60,000 at the present day; and as the life of the great painter of Seville is well known in that city rather by tradition than by reading the works of Palomino, the traveller will learn, on the subject of the beautiful "Conception" painted for the dome of the Franciscans, the history of the curious contest which took place between Murillo and the reverend fathers. A picture destined always to be seen at a distance, must be conceived and treated with the broad style suited to decoration. It must be drawn squarely, and touched with great vigour. In putting in his contrasts roughly, the painter confides to distance the care of restoring them to their just proportions; and if he handles his colours with rude ability, he calculates on the gradations of aerial perspective to produce an appropriate harmony. Murillo had been careful not to forget the principles which he had occasionally seen so well applied in the learned practice of Velasquez. When the holy fathers had a close view of what they should only see at a distance, they exclaimed against the coarseness of a painting that seemed all a mass of confusion, and which they doubtless thought was painted with the handle of the brush. They refused to receive it, in short; but the artist, before he carried away his picture, demanded and obtained leave to raise it for a moment to its proper position. In proportion as the canvas ascended, the figures became disentangled, the outlines softened by little and little, and the colours mingled; that which before was careless appeared finished, what was harsh became soft, and when the canvas reached its proper height, the most perfect harmony enchanted every eye. The good Franciscans then blushed at their ignorance; and to appease the irritated artist, who now expressed his intention of carrying away his work, they were compelled to offer him double the price originally agreed upon.

A happy life was that of Murillo! It was not characterised, it is true, by any of those romantic incidents which are the charm and the torment of our hearts; the sight of some pictures of Vandyck, a visit to Velasquez,—such were the two great events of that artistic life in which neither idleness nor weariness found a place. In a city peopled with monks, with picturesque mendicants, and enthusiastic devotees, in a city filled with mysterious churches, lit up, as Lafontaine would say, by the eyes of Andalusian beauties, Murillo passed his time in copying the inhabitants of the earth and inventing those of heaven. His whole world was summed up in the city of Seville. On the road on which he had to traverse, from the parish of Santa Cruz, in which he resided, to the cathedral of Seville, or else to the convent of the Capuchins outside the walls, he lost nothing that occurred to attract his notice. If he met the licentiate Alonzo Herrera and Juan Lopez y Talavan, he was struck with their fine heads, and he introduced them under the names of Saint Leander and of Saint Isidore into some devotional picture. Without the necessity of travelling, or of crossing the seas, he could handle a thousand different subjects, and paint in every branch of the art.—landscapes, flowers, sea-pieces, portraits, history, and miracles; miserable humanity cowering on the pavement, and beatified mortals wafted through the regions of Paradise. The soul and the body, visionary reverie and gross materialism, self-denial and voluptuous enjoyment, he observed all; he saw in creation all its phases, in social life its contrasts of nobleness and baseness, and in the heart of man he could read all its hidden stores of weakness, of grandeur and of love.

What Raphael Mengs said of the figures of Velasquez may be applied to the majority of Murillo's compositions,—they seem to be created by a simple act of volition. We can scarcely imagine that the painter has conceived them otherwise; and this perfect nature, with all its merit, has also some disadvantages. With Velasquez, for instance, it is seldom that the arrangement of a portrait or the composition of an historical picture has not the zest of freshness united with startling truth. With Murillo the conception is so prompt, that art has not had time to intervene. We might be almost tempted to imagine that the picture composed itself, and to look upon it as a fortunate piece of accident.

EUSTACE LE SUEUR.

There are few painters who have achieved so much so little known to fame, in England at least, as Eustache Le Sueur, which must be a matter of wonder to any one who remembers how readily any man, but particularly an artist, can become popular when the story of his life has any tinge of romance in it. About Le Sueur's there was so much that one incident in it has furnished a rich mine of materials to French novelists.

He was the son of a sculptor, and was placed at an early age in the studio of the famous old French painter, Simon Vouet, premier peintre du roi, who is considered the father of French art. While here he gave evidence of a very precocious talent, by executing a number of illustrations for a work entitled "The Dreams of Poliphilus," written by a Franciscan monk of the fifteenth century, and then greatly admired, because no one understood it. Very likely neither did Le Sueur, but he fancied he did, and this answered his purpose quite as well—even better, as it left him free scope for his imagination. His paintings were accordingly distinguished by great grace and liveliness, but still displayed something of that solemn grandeur and severe simplicity which have rendered his subsequent works so famous. And now comes the episode in his career which threw over his genius a melancholy cast, and in all likelihood inclined him to employ it almost exclusively upon religious subjects.

Louis XIII. about this time paid a visit to the celebrated Mademoiselle La Fayette at the Convent of the Visitation, and presented the sisterhood with a large sum to be spent in the decoration of their chapel—the chapel of Holy Mary. Vouet, of course, was appointed to do it, but what with his labours at St. Germain, at Fontainebleau, and at Vincennes, he had so much on hand that he was compelled to call upon Le Sueur, his pupil, to aid him in this new task, and to the latter was accordingly committed "The Assumption," to be painted on the centre of the chapel. To avoid having the sanctuary profaned by the presence of a Fornarina, the lady superior was obliged to assign him one of the nuns as a model; and, as might have been suspected, where the maiden was fair to look upon, and the heart of the artist susceptible, he fell in love with her; but as to harbour the feeling even was sinful, and as to reveal it would have been absurd, he cherished it in secret. Time, of course, at last put an end to it, but never put an end to the sorrowing regrets which it left behind, and all his life long Le Sueur was a melancholy man.

It was at Lyons, to which he undertook a journey soon after that, that the peculiar bent of his genius first displayed itself on seeing some works of Raphael. After studying them he was filled with enthusiasm for this great master, and immediately executed his painting "St. Paul laying hands on the Sick," a work which at once placed him far above mediocrity, and attracted the favourable notice of Nicholas Poussin. By his advice he sought to moderate the rapidity of his manner, caused by the natural fire of his disposition, and to perfect himself by the study of the great masters of Italy. But there were not many of their works in Paris, and by this time Le Sueur was married, and, as might be expected, was poor, - so going to Rome was out of the question. There is a story told to the effect that Poussin offered to make copies of the best of them and send them to him, and this, if true, reflects credit on him; but we do not find that Le Sueur accepted his offer, but supported himself for some time by asking frontispieces for books of devotion, theological theses, and other trifles. At last he was commissioned to decorate the cloister of the Chartreuse at Paris, and found himself in his proper sphere of action. "The Life of St. Bruno," a collection of twenty-two paintings, finished in three years for a very small remuneration, may be regarded as Le Sueur's chief work, though he himself was modest enough to call it a series of sketches. Poussin has called Le Sueur a disciple of Raphael and of the antique, but the fact is that he could be compared to no one but himself, not only in the choice of forms and in the flow of the draperies, but also, and above all, in the general expression and of conception of things not seen. In Raphael, the religious sentiment is always surrounded by something proud and imposing, which confounds impiety, but in Le Sueur it is accompanied by candour, which moves the most incredulous. The painter of Urbino lets us see a little of the pride with which the protection of the great and noble and his sojourn in the Eternal City had inspired him; but the Frenchman, simple and sad, painted all the phases of a monkish life with an humble faith, and a more devout adoration. It was in the fervour of the belief and hope by which he sought to drive away the gloom by which he himself was haunted, that he found the secret of this religious painting, which, to a sceptic, would have been impossible. So no one has ever represented with as much truth and impressiveness as Le Sueur, tranquil monasteries built in solitude upon accessible mountains; walls of enclosure surrounding communities of anchorites like barriers raised against the noise and tumults of the world; austere and thoughtful penitents struggling by dint of prayer and mortification against worldly thoughts and vain regrets, and the long white robes traversing the gloomy cloisters like ghosts. Le Sueur never appears to such advantage as when he paints his own sentiments.

Le Sueur was employed to decorate the Hotel Lambert, one of the most charming abodes in Paris; which after a long period of decay and neglect, is now restored to its ancient splendour, by Madame Czartoryski, and is the scene of some of the gayest reunions of the French capital. In this he was placed in competition with Le-brun, but by no means suffered by the contrast. His most splendid works here were the four paintings representing "The Muses." His groups are displayed in the background of charming landscapes, and the sky, distances, and colouring, display the most complete harmony. As to the figures, they have all the virgin modesty and other poetic characteristics which imagination has for so many ages ascribed to them. The artist who, in "The Life of St. Bruno," had given charms to austerity, remained still the same when giving modesty to grace. It is said that "The Life of St. Bruno" was attacked by the malice of enemies and the envy of false friends, who did not hesitate to make attempts to mutilate the paintings which the monks of the Chartreuse were obliged to preserve. Simple as La Fontaine and sensible as Fenelon, he forgave them all; and, in his goodness of heart, never spoke of his rivals without saying, "I have done everything in my power, and will do everything, to make myself loved by them." At last, driven to bay, he stood upon dignity, and painted an allegory in which he pictured his own triumphs. But even in this the sweetness of his disposition showed itself. He represented himself reclining upon a couch, plunged in melancholy reverie, while his genius trod down his rivals and detractors; in the background appeared a smiling plain - the image of the future, to which his thoughts were turned. Every great man has moments in which he rises in pride against the age which has persecuted or misunderstood him.

Le Sueur did not long survive the decoration of the Hotel Lambert. He died in May, 1655, at the early age of thirty-eight years. Some have said that he retired to the monastery of Chartreuse, and there ended his days; but this is a story invented, without doubt, to surround him with a greater degree of interest.

The goldsmiths' company at Paris were in the habit of offering each year to the church of Notre Dame, a painting which was exhibited at the porch of the cathedral on the first of May. One of the finest and most admired of these was the "Paul Preaching at Ephesus," of Le Sueur. The painter transports us all at once to Asia Minor - to Ephesus, celebrated by its magnificent temple of Diana. The temple and statue of the great goddess of the Ephesians, seen between the columns of the peristyle, serves to localise the scene perfectly. Upon the steps of a portico, to the right, St. Paul speaks with fire, with authority - he speaks, as his gestures indicate, in the name of God, of the true God, of the only God. At the sound of his voice the Ephesians renounce their religion, and burn what they had adored. One writes down the words of the apostle upon tablets, another explains them; all are deeply moved, and tearing in pieces the sacred books of polytheism, they commit them to the flames. A slave, kneeling in the foreground, blows the wood fire which is devouring the pagan manuscripts. There is great majesty in the attitude of Paul, and of the other figures; but the position of this Ethiopian slave, who appears in the scene only in its vulgarist part, without knowing anything of the change which the world is about to undergo, is still more admirable.

In this painting there is a concealed combination, a secret balancing of lines, which gives the composition its proper position and its grandeur. Take away the least of the details, the two trunks of the leafless trees, for instance, which stand out against the azure of the sky, and the painting would soon look as if cut in two. At first sight everything seems to be the result of foresight, and yet nothing has been calculated. All has been dictated by the happy intuition of genius. It is bright as French paintings generally are, but it is, nevertheless, animated. There is no confusion in it, and there is vivacity in all the movements; it is conceived in an elevated style, and yet it bears no marks of research; on the contrary, it bears in every part an air of simplicity, of gestures dictated by nature alone. Many painters can never rise into sublimity without appearing to be on the stretch; Le Sueur's dignity always seems to be a matter easy of attainment, and it is tempered by a charming ingenuousness. This seems owing to his tact in introducing into all his works details taken from everyday life. Many instances of this may be given. The first scene in the life of St. Bruno shows us a child, in the midst of a group of noble-looking and dignified figures, trying to prevent his dog from barking; the Ethiopian slave in the foreground of the St. Paul Preaching at Ephesus, and the signs of a dog's attachment to his master in the Martyrdom of St. Protas, are amongst the best accessories of these pictures.

In the martyrdoms of St. Gervais and Protas all is grand, noble, and even vigorous. The painter of Anchorite Retreats for Wounded Spirits, passes all at once and without difficulty Giulio Romano was more masculine perhaps, Raphael severer and more chastened in his outline; but no one has ever given the same delicacy to the noble army of martyrs—no one has ever conceived faces imbued with so much angelic fervour.

The women of the ancient masters were not more graceful than the "Veronica" of Le Sueur, or the maidens of the Woes of St. Martin, and they have not so much tenderness to the delineation of the most stirring scenes. He puts tumult, passion, and violence into his pictures as easily as he had put gentleness, calm, and retirement. The brutal soldiery with bared and muscular arms, the pagan judges in their togas, the boisterous mob, and impassable images of the false gods, are conceived in an easy but powerful style, which Le Sueur has found not in Raphael, but in his own genius. The graceful drawing of the elegant figures are all his, and his only.

The sentiment of antique grace, such as it appears in the bas-reliefs, addresses itself to the pure sensuality, the paganism of thought. The grace of Le Sueur, on the contrary, is impregnated with a spiritualism which touches and goes right to the heart of us. Except the "Belle Jardinière," the virgins of Raphael are more material, his carnations are more abundant, their forms rounder, and fuller; those of Le Sueur have a happy slenderness, a subduing sweetness.

bestowed on him the reputation of being the greatest painter of sea pieces that ever appeared down to his time. And, in truth, no one has more closely observed the agitation of the waves, their breaking or their repose; no one knew better the gait and habits of sailors, the rigging and working of ships, the variety of their build, their picturesque appearance when grouped by chance, and their imposing appearance when isolated between sky and water, the felicity of the lines in their foreshortening, when they rock to and fro slowly, ready to breast the billows. No one has ever felt so deeply the deep calm of the ocean, nor expressed so well the inexpressible emotions inspired by the sight of a fading horizon—the image of infinity.

Talents of so high an order did not show themselves all at once in the Van de Velde family. It is believed that Adrian, the celebrated painter of animals, and William, the younger, were brothers. This is not impossible, and the mention of the supposition reminds us, that in the Bridge water Gallery there is a "Coast of Scheveningen," by William, in which the sea, slightly agitated, is lighted by the hues of twilight, and the small figures in which are painted by Adrian. This goes to confirm the statement as to the existence of some relationship between them. This much, however, is certain—the elder William Van de Velde, the father of the great marine painter, was himself a designer of rare excellence. We shall take this opportunity of saying a few words about him, as we may not have another. He was born in Leyden in 1610. "As he loved sailing on the sea," says Houbraken, "he found means of entering the service of the States on board a small vessel employed in carrying orders to the fleet. Being thoroughly acquainted with the construction of ships, their rigging, and trim of the sails, he set about drawing with a pen upon paper or white canvas all the vessels in the roads, large and small, and finished by grouping together entire fleets upon a single sheet. As soon as he heard that a battle was about to take place, he embarked forthwith with the sole design of being present at the engagement, and so that he might make accurate sketches of the various details. To give greater play to his talents and courage, the states of Holland placed a brig at his disposal, and ordered the commander to carry him to whichever point of the action he wished. He was then seen braving all the perils of a naval engagement, going and coming from place to place, now in the midst of the enemy, and now amongst his own countrymen. Admiral Opdam was astonished to see a man risk his life in pursuit of any glory except that to be obtained by arms. He invited Van de Velde to dine with him in his cabin, and on the very same day, two hours after the painter had taken his departure, the vessel was blown up. He was present also at the battle which took place between the English and Dutch, under the command of Monk and De Ruyter, in sight of Ostend, in 1666, and which lasted for three days with surprising fury. Neither of the fleets made a single movement which Van de Velde did not sketch with singular fidelity. These drawings were made by order of the States, and supplied them with ample information regarding the manœuvres and conduct of their officers. It appears that the fame of them reached England also. Charles II. invited him to enter his service, and after the death of that prince he continued to execute, under James II., official drawings that circumstances sometimes made doubly valuable. He died at London, in 1666, and was buried in St. James's Church.

Such was the father of the painter, whose history we are about to write. The passion of the latter for the sea and ships, and his nautical knowledge, were, as we see, hereditary. William Van de Velde the younger was born, as was also Adrian, at Amsterdam, in 1633. His master was an able painter and a skilful engraver, Simon de Vliëger, who mostly occupied himself in sea pieces. The elder Van de Velde could only teach his son the elements of design, for he had not given any attention to painting till he was advanced in life, and had then only met with moderate success. His choice of Simon de Vliëger was an excellent one, so that the first sea pieces sent by William Van de Velde to his father, who was then at London, astonished the whole court. James II. was so pleased with them, that he made him come to London, and settled a handsome pension upon him. Like most great artists, he speedily attained to the eminence which has made his name illustrious. There are paintings signed by him in 1657, when he was only in his twenty-fourth year, and even prior to that date, which are exquisite in every point of view, without mannerism, real chefs-d'œuvre of art, in which art is nowhere visible, and nature everywhere. From the very beginning he displayed his predilection for the representation of calms, of those tranquil, unruffled waters, which scarcely smile under the breath of wind, and which, under a clear sky, and in the full light of the sun, resemble a brilliant carpet, slightly wrinkled at its borders.

Van de Velde did wonders with very scanty materials. Without having at his disposal the splendid elements which Claude Lorrain put in motion, without having before his eyes those Italian palaces, those projecting colonnades which served as side scenes to the sea views of the French painter, he knew how to give the appearance of distance to the background of his canvas, and make the ocean retreat, as it were, from the shore to the horizon. The level line of the horizon placed in contrast with the rounded masses of cloud, the stiffness of the masts and of the shrouds compensated for by the curved line of the sails, more or less distended, and by the sweep of the ships—such are the simple combinations by which Van de Velde has been enabled to interest those even who have never seen the sea. If sometimes a sand bank, or a group of fishermen, or the head of a jetty in pile-work forms the set off of his composition, oftener still he commences his painting only in the background, and puts nothing in the foreground, but a little angry surge, or a buoy tossed by the tide, so that the greater part of his canvas appears to have been painted not from the shore, but from a vessel at anchor. With means apparently so limited, Van de Velde has, however, produced splendid pictures, as captivating to the eye as they are agreeable to the mind, full of pleasure for those who love art, and full of delight for those who love the sea.

The secret of these impressions is simple truth—truth which he sought and rendered with passion. Owing to persevering and assiduous study, he possessed in the highest possible degree all the elements of which talent in a painter of sea-pieces is composed. He knew all about ships, thoroughly understood the working of them, and could repeat the names of every rope, pulley, and sail. As he was able to distinguish each kind of ship from every other at a glance, he enabled the spectator also to distinguish them in his paintings by the diversity of their forms—oblong, slender, bulging, or flattened; by the difference of their masts, or the size of their topsails; by the colour of their canvas, now unbleached white, now brown, and now black. But it was not only by these details that he caused each variety to be recognised—but also by the toute ensemble, the general outline and character, in fact—for every variety has its own—well marked too. He perceived and expressed admirably the majesty of the man-of-war, the elegance of the frigate, the magnificence of the yacht, the agility of the brig, the coquetry of the schooner, and the coarseness of the lugger-boat.

His figures, too, were drawn with the highest talent, and yet with the most charming simplicity. This is one of the points in which he excels Backuysen. He had bestowed the closest attention upon everything relating to the sailor. He knew and could depict admirably his gestures, his attitudes, his dress, and that rolling gait which he insensibly acquires from the habit of walking on the heaving deck. But it was in painting the sea itself that Van de Velde rose to the full height of his genius. The sea was to him not a treacherous element, but an adored mistress; he loved and admired everything about it—its caprices, its fantastic movement, its smiles and caresses, its fury and thunder. His own temperament, however, made him prefer the calm. It was while in a state of rest that he imitated the waters of the ocean with most effect, whether in those light ripples, that feeble undulation, which the Dutch call kabbeling, and which dies out with a low noise on the fine sand of the beach, or when in greater agitation they throw up fringes of foam, which fly back in pearly clouds from the dark sides of the ships. His water, truthful and transparent, does not possess the hard tint of green and blue, such as is seen in the Mediterranean; it is yellowish and light, like the seas of the north; the tinge is in general cold, unless when warmed by a ray of the setting sun.

Let us add that these fine sea pieces of Van de Velde are crowned by brilliant skies, light, silvery, and separated from the eye by boundless plains of atmosphere. The clouds, which play so prominent a part in all paintings of this kind,—because on the form which the painter gives them depends the disposition of the lines and their agreeable variety,—in Van de Velde's works possess rare beauty. Not only is the grouping happy and skilfully contrasted, not only is the outline well chosen, and never meaningless, but they possess admirable lightness. They appear to move like those which traverse the landscapes of Ruysdael, and their edges illuminated by the sun, rise off the blue ground, we can hardly help believing that this ground is disappearing at one point to appear at another. But what constant and assiduous observation, and what painstaking industry, it must have required to attain to such perfection! "Nobody," says Gilpin, "knew better the effects of sky, or had studied them with more attention, than Van de Velde the younger. Not many years ago, an old waterman of the Thames was still living who had often carried him in his boat to different parts of the river to observe the varied appearance of the heaven. This man related that Van de Velde went out in every sort of weather, fine or wet, and that he took with him large sheets of blue paper which he covered with black and white. An artist will easily perceive the object of this proceeding. Van de Velde called these expeditions in his Dutch, going a-showing, going to make a review of the sky.*

Horace Walpole, in "Anecdotes of Painting," informs us that the pension given by Charles II. to William Van de Velde the younger, amounted, like that of his father, to £100 sterling. Mr. Riwalson, an antiquary, found in the last century the original of the patent which conferred these pensions both on father and son, and communicated this valuable document to Mr. Vertue, who collected the materials for Walpole's work. From it we learn that William Van de Velde, senior, was employed in designing naval battles for the king's private use, and to his son was committed the task of colouring these same drawings. The terms of the letters patent,† granting their pensions, seem to imply that the son was occupied only in the colouring of his father's drawings; but perhaps we should interpret the expression "putting into colours" to mean more than this, and make them refer to the son's talent for painting sea-pieces when the father could only draw them. It was in the year 1675 that this double pension was bestowed on the Van de Velde, and the date is valuable as it enables us to fix the precise period, or nearly so, at which the painter left Amsterdam to settle in London. He was then forty-two years of age.

The residence that both chose at London was peculiarly well adapted to the requirements of their profession as well as to their own tastes. They lodged at Greenwich, and had the continual movement of ships and boats, which is always going on in that part of the river, constantly under their eyes. Hence their profound knowledge of all nautical usages, of the smallest and most minute formalities of the sea, if we may use the expression; hence, too, their exactness in all the details. What is said of Ruysdael with regard to trees, might be said of Van de Velde with regard to ships. As the great landscape painter never put oak leaves on the branches of a lime tree, so the marine painter never fastened the sails of a brig to the masts of a schooner. To study the works of Van de Velde is almost to study a course of navigation.

Here is a "Frigate about to set sail." The wind appears to freshen, but the sea, although a little agitated, still reveals in the distance its tranquillizing horizon. A three-decker is at anchor. In the background an armed frigate, with all her sails shaken out, is making ready to gain the offing. The sun has just risen, and a boat full of passengers is rowing towards her, and she is only awaiting its arrival to set sail. In the distance are various ships of different sizes gradually fading from the sight. The frigate, however, is the principal object of the picture, and is drawn and painted with extraordinary care, even in its minutest details. And this minuteness, which in painting a storm would be wholly out of place, here becomes a charm; for if you, like the painter, are one of the spectators on shore, and have no friend on board, or no personal interest in the departure of the vessel, it is but natural that you should admire all her beauties, the carving which adorns its bows, the order and neatness which reign throughout, the polish of the masts, the tautness of the rigging, and, in short, all the harness of this steed of wood and iron, which is about to walk the wide waters, and is brushed up before its departure.

There is a superb Admiralty yacht, bearing the arms of Amsterdam sculptured upon her, and carrying the admiral's flag at her stern. She is passing between two ships of war, which salute her, and she returns it. Van de Velde has imitated perfectly the white smoke of the cannon; we see it glide over the level surface of the water, in great round masses, which contrast admirably with the straight line of the sea. Fine clouds moving slowly along the sky, cast huge shadows on the ocean, and create splendid contrasts; all the artifices of chiaroscuro lend animation to a scene in which all is tranquillity; the eye is pleased and the attention is awakened, and yet the spectator is not withdrawn from the profound emotions with which the painter has endeavoured to inspire him.

But suddenly the sky is overcast; the sea, so peaceful a minute ago, begins to growl; the wind whistles sharply, and already a long belt of dark clouds seem to unite the sky and water; a furious gale sets in from the north-west. We are at the entrance of the Texel; ships great and small are struggling against the storm, in the attempt to reach the port. Amongst them passes a packet-boat lighted by a solitary gleam of sunshine, and splashed by the rising foam. Another ray of light flickering out through an opening in the clouds shows us the coast of Holland, whose grey and delicate tone contrasts well with the sombre colours of the rest of the picture, and in this the touch of the painter accords admirably with the nature of his subject. Here is no longer the complacent and brilliant execution of the paintings which represent calms, but the broader and freer pencil which tears open the clouds, whitens the sails, and boldly expresses the form of the waves, and is as much agitated as the sea itself.

We must remark, nevertheless, that for William Van de Velde to paint a storm is an exceptional case. What we have just now been describing is rather the approach of the storm than the storm itself; and perhaps indeed this is the most poetic course to follow, for the imagination of the spectator is then becoming heated, and is becoming impatient for the termination of the scene. Thus, in the eight pictures in Sir Robert Peel's collection, we see a heavy rolling sea, and over it a cloud hanging very low down casts a dark shadow, which threatens the poor fishermen's barks terribly, and which, as M. Waagen remarks, strongly reminds us of Homer's line; "And from the height of the heavens light plunged upon the earth." We can hardly shut out some feeling of anxiety from our breasts on seeing these frail boats tossed between the descending clouds and the uprising waves. But Van de Velde departs from his natural course when he depicts storms: he is more at home in painting the sea at rest. It is over these tranquil plains that he can best put in motion the few and simple elements of which his great effects are made up—the line of the horizon, the clouds forming like chains of mountains, and the rigging of the boats. Others have endeavoured in their compositions to fill space; Van de Velde seeks to paint it. To open up immensity on the canvas, to roll out infinity upon a flat surface, such has been his preoccupation, or rather his genius. For this he passed his life upon the water; he made open boats his studio, and went a considerable distance in this way to see De Ruyter's ship caulked, and went down the Thames in the same manner nearly every day to pay a visit to his old and familiar friends—the ocean waves. In Van de Velde's eyes the sea was not the classic and conventional personage represented by a venerable god with a slimy beard—but ocean such as nature has made it—endowed with all the passions of an animated being, with all the irritability of a blind monster, and with the sensibility and appearance of life.

Van de Velde the younger, for putting the said draughts into colours, for our particular use; our will and pleasure is, and we do hereby authorize and require you to issue your orders for the present and future establishment of the said salaries, to the aforesaid W. Van de Velde the younger, to be paid unto one or other of them during our pleasure, and for so doing this shall be your sufficient warrant and discharge. Charles II. dated his reign from the year in which his father was beheaded, 1649; so that the twenty-sixth year of which he speaks must be 1675.

However, the title and the pension which he had received from Charles II. compelled him, from time to time, to paint official pictures, if we may use the expression—fleets not ranged so as to please the eye, but according to the rules of tactics or the caprices of the admiral—vessels which, to secure historical accuracy, should fulfil a certain duty, or be sketched at a certain moment. Many of these compositions may still be seen at Hampton Court. Horace Walpole informs us that at Buckingham Palace there was one representing the Battle of Solebay, which Van de Velde the elder painted from nature, or perhaps we should rather say ad rivum, having attended the engagement in a light sloop by order of the Duke of well adapted for the display of their genius. Van de Velde painted, at one time, the united French and English fleets in the place where Charles II. went to see them. The king is represented in the picture in the act of stepping on board his yacht. Horace Walpole informs us, "that two commissioners of the Admiralty agreed to beg it of the king, to cut it in two, and each to take a part. The painter, in whose presence they concluded this wise treaty, took away the picture, and concealed it till the king's death, when he offered it to Bullfinch, the printseller (from whom Vertue had the story), for fourscore pounds. Bullfinch took time to consider, and returning to the purchase, found the picture sold for 130 guineas. After-† Charles Weisbrod, designer and engraver, was born at Hamburg in 1754, and came very young to Paris, for the purpose not of learning to engrave, for he had already acquired the art, but to perfect himself in it under the tuition of John George Wille, who was the master par excellence. His great talent lay in seizing on the spirit of a painting, and rendering it in a lively and vigorous manner in a rapid etching. He was, therefore, admirably fitted for executing those free and hasty engravings, which lend value to the original, though they make no pretensions to translate it.

William Van de Velde died in London in 1707, as stated in the following inscription:—

Navium et prospectuum marinarum pictor,
Et ob singularem in illa arte peritiam,

"What we esteem in this painter," says Lebrun, "is the transparency of his colouring, which is agreeable and vigorous;

Weisbrod was fond of these, and excelled in them. In the Choiseul collection his and those of Dunkerque are by far the best of their kind. He engraved, for instance, the two landscapes, designed by his vessels are drawn with precision; his small figures are sketched with spirit and judgment; his skies are clear; his clouds are varied, and seem to roll in the air." We might add here that the clouds of William Van de Velde are like those of Ruysdael: they have the same beautiful forms, the same agreeable masses, picturesque and contrasted without any affectation of singularity. They have also the same motion and lightness; they even seem charged with rain, but are never heavy, and we almost fancy we can see them blown along by the wind. "William Van de Velde," continues Lebrun, "is the first who rendered calm waters naturally, the sky, the fishing-boats, the vessels, and all other spectacles are as rare as they are valuable." Van de Velde, in his old age, painted many historical battles in England, which have a reddish tone, and are not much thought of; hence they are distinguished in Holland by the epithet of "English make."

In England, the admiration of the younger Van de Velde has for a long period known no bounds. Sir Joshua Reynolds, when president of the Royal Academy, said, in speaking of him, that another Raphael might be born, but not another Van de Velde. The very exaggeration of this sentiment would have been sufficient to immortalize him of whom it was uttered, even if his works had not really possessed surpassing excellence. More complete than Backhuysen, as delicate and as silvery Adrian Van de Velde, "Pastoral Scenes" as they were then called, in an able manner, though a little too delicately, perhaps. Ruysdael, Karl Dujardin, Pynaker, Weirötter—all the landscape painters, and, above all, those who had an eye to the picturesque—have been rendered by him with great felicity. He is liable to censure, however, for not having given greater size to the objects in the foreground, so as to enable us to distinguish the relative distances of the objects in the rear more readily.

More precise than St. Non, Weisbrod leaves less to the chances of crispness; his graver seems to take in at once the forms over which it has to run. His broken lines, short and waved in appearance, but in reality directed by a steady and skilful hand, are admirably adapted to the expression of broken down walls, disjunct and moss-covered stones, creeping plants, and in general all the capricious vegetation of ruins. In proof of this, we may refer to his fine engraving, after Alex. Kierings, to be found in Neyman's "Catalogue of Drawings" printed in 1766.

These hasty sketches of Weisbrod's were also well fitted for the reproduction of wild rustic scenes, and rugged, undulating ground—the chalky hills, and unclothed soil of a Haysman—the brush-wood of a Waterloo—the irregular and gnarled trunks of Ruysdael's old oaks, studded with tufts of foliage—the huge plants which flourish in the foreground of Pynaker's landscapes—and last of all those sandy hillocks, half-covered by flint and grass, which Wynants, and after him Adrian Van de Velde, painted with so much grace and devotion. Weisbrod bestowed great care on the management of the transition from black to white, so as to lend softness to those changes which are formed in nature by tufts of grass springing from a sandy soil.

In general, Weisbrod's great defect is his not putting sufficient variety on the sides of his lines. It has also been remarked that his masses of trees sometimes resemble the decorations in a theatre, which appear on the sky in flat silhouette; we mean that as much relief is desirable in the middle as there is of precision and delicacy in the outline. Weisbrod has also engraved several small plates after Paul Potter, which never fail to render perfect the phy-

Velde is the painter of the sea. When gazing on his canvas, and on his alone, we can almost fancy we feel the spray on our faces, and snuff in the strong odour of the tar.

Mr. John Smith, in his catalogue of the works of the most eminent painters, sets down the number of works known as William Van de Velde's at 262, seven eighths of which are in private collections in England, the painter's adopted country. In enumerating the pictures, we shall follow a different method of classification. First we shall take a run through the public galleries.

Hampton Court, so rich in the works of masters of every school, contains eight of Van de Velde's paintings:—a sea-piece in his Majesty's Gallery; in the Queen's Presence Chamber—two sea-fights between the English and Dutch; a calm sea; three burning fleets; the English fleet attacking the Dutch fleet in a harbour.

The famous Dulwich Gallery, near London, contains four—three calms, and one fresh breeze.

The Pinacotheca at Munich contains two—a calm and a storm.

The Museum at the Hague—two calms.

The Amsterdam Museum contains six—the capture of the English vessel, "the Royal Prince;" that of four ships of the line; these two paintings are pendants, and are considered some of the most finished of his works. "View of Amsterdam," a very fine production; two calms, and a stormy sea with vessels in full sail.

The gallery of the Louvre contains only one—a calm; but many deny the authenticity of this altogether, and attribute it to Van de Velde's master, Simon de Vlieger.

These are almost all that are to be met with in the public galleries. In the private collections they are more numerous, above all in England, where Van de Velde was held in such high estimation.

The Duke of Devonshire has one at Chatsworth—a calm; and at his villa at Chiswick, a stormy sea covered with ships—a painting warmly lighted, and possessing very striking effects.

Sir Robert Peel's collection contains eight of Van de Velde's paintings—a sea covered with ships of war, barks in the background, and a coaster in the foreground, a fine painting, dated 1657; a calm sea, in the foreground a lighter, and two frigates in the distance—this picture is valued at £300; a coast with large vessels and figures—this bears the name of the artist, it is dated 1661, and cost £500; the coast of Schevelingen while the sea is slightly agitated—this contains a great number of figures by Adrian Van de Velde; it is one of the finest of the Dutch school, and cost £800; the coast of Holland, fishing-boat in the offing—a delicate, silvery painting, one of the most carefully-finished of the master; a view of Texel during rain, the sea violently agitated, bad weather—a work full of variety, and displaying very striking effect.

The Bridgewater Gallery contains six of Van de Velde's works—a view of the entrance of the Texel during a violent gale, a magnificent specimen, full of poetry and truth; a shipwreck; view of a coast during a dead calm; sea-fight—the "Prince Royal" surrendering to the Dutch fleet,—this possiognomy of the beasts, and are true and faithful expressions of the original.

Weisbrod retired to Hamburg towards the year 1780, if we may judge from the date which appears upon his engravings, and there engraved several landscapes of his own composition, but he could not avoid imitating the masters whose works he had reproduced. He arranged his ruins in the style of Breenberg, and his pastoral scenes in the manner of Berghem; but one could not say of his compositions what was said of Huber and Rost, that he led one to expect more from his talents. Weisbrod could never complete an engraving; Dandot, Deguevanvilliers, and the celebrated Lebas, gave the finishing touches with the burin to many of his etchings, particularly the "Flight into Egypt" after Teniers, the landscapes after Ruysdael and Pynaer, and two "Views in the environs of Meinen," of his own composition. He died, most probably, at Hamburg, towards the close of the last century.

sesses great vigour of touch; and the capture of the "Prince Royal."

The collection of Sir Abraham Hume contains a great battle between the English and Dutch fleets in a slight breeze.

Lord Ashburton's collection contains "The Flotilla," from the Talleyrand collection, celebrated for the great number of vessels of every variety which are crowded into it upon a sea smooth as glass.

Mr. J. H. Hoop's collection contains two "Agitated Seas."

There are great numbers of them in other private collections in various parts of England, but to enumerate them would be tedious, if it were not useless. They are nearly all heirlooms, that pass and have passed for generations, from father to son, and are in some sense as much fixtures as the houses that cover them. It is a matter of more interest to learn the value which Van de Velde's works have borne at some of the principal picture sales on the Continent.

Three other paintings of this master figured in this sale: "A Dutch Fleet" of twelve vessels, £100; "A Calm Sea," covered with ships of war, merchantmen, elegant yachts, barques, long-boats, and light gigs; £200; "A Shore in Holland," low water; the ebb of the tide has left a boat stranded on the beach, which some fishermen are striving to launch; two fishermen on the shore, a dog barking, and a man dragging a piece of wood which has been thrown up by the sea; £60.

The Duke de Berri's sale, 1837. "The Sea in a Calm;" several boats, one of them with a great number of men on board setting out for the herring fishery, a ship of war, fishermen launching a boat; £92 10s.

Heris de Bruxelles sale, 1811. "A Calm;" a group of boats in the Zuider Zee—a frigate at anchor, a small boat with fishermen, and a boat sailing towards the other vessels scattered along the coast; £390. "The Zuider Zee;" a calm, a frigate setting sail, and making towards the offing; two fishermen near a boat preparing to draw their nets; in the back ground a three-decker at anchor; £235.

Count Pergeaux's sale, 1811. "A Sea fight;" three fleets, the English, French, and Dutch engaged; sailors in one place hauling at the ropes or shifting the sails, men in the water struggling for life, a boat rowing towards the admiral's vessel; on some of the decks the combatants are engaged hand to hand, smoke and shot are issuing from the port holes, and some of the vessels are on fire. This is one of Van de Velde's finest works. It was sold for £800.

Tordien and Heris sale, 1813. "A Fleet Setting Sail;" the sea covered with ships, vessels of war, merchantmen, boats, &c.; £310. "A Calm;" two ships and a boat—the sailors on deck variously occupied; to the right two fishing-boats near the shore, two ships of war, and sails in the distance; £100.

Van de Velde never engraved, but he has left several drawings executed with great skill, both with the pen and with wash,—outlines sufficient to show him the state of the sea, the shape of a ship, or the appearance of the clouds. There are two of them in the Louvre.

JEAN JOUVENET.

ABOUT the middle of the sixteenth century, a painter and sculptor, presumed to have come originally from Italy, took up his abode at Rouen. He was the ancestor of several generations of distinguished artists, and the grandfather of Jean Jouvenet, who was born at Rouen in 1644.

Jean received his first lessons in art in his father's house, and was then sent to study at Paris under Lebrun, who was at that time in his glory. Poussin had yielded the palm to him, and Le Sueur was dead.

Voltaire, in his "Age of Louis XIV.," speaks of Jouvenet's first attempts in Lebrun's studio thus: "Jouvenet is not, as Argenville says, an artist without a master, rough hewn by the first lessons of Laurent his father. I believe even that he acquired a taste for the great machines of Lebrun, since he laboured with him for twenty years, with several intervals, from 1661 to 1680. But be not disquieted regarding the originality of his genius and the future of his style. He will take from his master, who is doubtless an able practitioner as well as an inventive composer, nothing but breadth and ease in execution, knowledge of technical processes, and the details of arrangement in complicated subjects."

While painting from models in the Academy or in the studio of Lebrun, Jouvenet often aided his master in the ceilings of Versailles, for he had learnt his trade right speedily. There is hardly a doubt that he could paint from his very childhood, and that he never thought of anything else. Real painters receive their education from a palette and a few books, from conversing with men and contemplating nature. Jouvenet, however, gave no evidence of individuality in his style till about the year 1672. In 1673, when twenty-nine years of age, he carried off the Academy's second prize; and in the same year he executed the "May painting" for the Goldsmiths' Company of Paris, so called because during the whole of that month it was exhibited in the portico of the church of Notre Dame. The goldsmiths presented it to the cathedral, where, fortunately, it may still be seen,—"The Healing of the Paralytic,"—in the choir above the statues.

The May painting met with immense success amongst the public, and from this time the young artist's popularity was beyond doubt. Vermeulen asked permission to engrave his works, and Lebrun begged of him anew to labour at the Versailles decorations. In 1675, he was elected a member of the academy.

It is most probable that it was about this period that he married. The name of his wife has not reached us. He was soon afterwards offered apartments by the king in the Palais des Quatre Nations. And he joyfully took possession of them. In those immense galleries he had ample room for the pursuit of his profession, and he determined that his first achievement should be worthy of them, at least in size.

Upon canvas 30 feet long, and 28 feet broad, he painted his "Jesus healing the Sick," a work which contains all Jouvenet's defects as well as all his excellences. The shadows are thrown rather angularly, the figures are lively—a little vulgar in form perhaps, but full of warmth and motion. It would have been impossible to have shown a larger amount of knowledge in the drawing, more animation in the action, or more fire in the execution. The arrangement is picturesque, and the effects of the light and shade are broad and well contrasted. The five years following he was occupied in executing his celebrated works,—"Isaac blessing Jacob," for the Museum of Rouen; "The Nunc Dimittis," for the Jesuits; "The Family of Darius;" "Louis XIV. healing the King's Evil." The latter was painted in competition with Antony Coyppel, Halle, and the brothers Boullongue, but the gold medal was awarded to Jouvenet by the judge, the Abbé de St. Riequier. Lebrun died at the age of seventy-one, in 1690, and Jouvenet at once assumed the position of head of the French school. Louis XIV. to mark his sense of his merits, conferred upon him a pension of two hundred livres per annum, and after he had finished the paintings in the Chapel of Versailles, it was increased to five hundred. He also determined to send the artist to Italy at the expense of the state, but, whether owing to illness or negligence, Jouvenet never availed himself of the offer.

The "Resurrection of Lazarus" is one of Jouvenet's finest paintings. "Jouvenet," says the quaint historian Montei, "so closely applied himself to the reading of the gospel, that it would have been marvellous if he had not lighted upon its most picturesque page. This page never ceases to delight him; he never ceases to sketch it in thought, to colour it, to enlarge it, to embellish it. At last he is suddenly impelled to take up his brushes and paint. What has he seen? Lazarus has been dead many days; his body lies buried in a sepulchre hewn in the rock; Jesus appears in the neighbourhood; the sister of Lazarus, beautiful from her age, her paleness, her tears, comes to Jesus to ask him to restore her brother to life,—and here is the most touching of scenes. Jesus stands in the midst, taller than those around him; his face shining with almighty power; Son of the Author of Nature—he is about to suspend its laws. He advances, he bows slightly; he stretches out his arms towards the base of the rock; he calls Lazarus, 'Lazarus, arise!' The men who had entered the sepulchre with torches, to open the shroud, fall back stupified, not at the sight of the dead, but at the sight of the living. Lazarus breathes through livid lips, and looks out from glassy eyes. He has awakened in a body fading into dissolution. The fright, the terror of the men, under whose eyes, under whose hands, the miracle has taken place; the lively admiration of the people contrast with the calm figures of the apostles, who are accustomed to the wonderful works of their divine master. If it be not here, where is the skill of a great painting?"

It is in this picture, which Duchange and many others have engraved, that Jouvenet has painted his own portrait and those of his daughters, between two columns to the right, and amidst the spectators. The painting of "The Money Changers driven from the Temple" was the first of the series, which, by the king's order, was completed in 1702, with "The Miraculous Draught of Fishes." In order to represent the fisherman and his crew naturally, Jouvenet made a journey to Dieppe, and brought back the fine studies which are found in the work. When Louis XIV. saw these splendid paintings he was in ecstasies, and caused them to be reproduced in tapestry at the Gobelins.

In 1709 we find Jouvenet still labouring at Versailles with all the perseverance and energy of youth. But his sanguine almost as much dexterity as ever had been possessed by the other. The painting which he thus finished with his left hand is "The Death of St. Francis," at present in the Museum of Rouen. Holbein, we believe, is the only other artist who was thus able to paint with both hands.

Jouvenet now resumed his work, and with his left hand executed several compositions—amongst others the decorations of the ceiling of the Second Chamber of Inquests of the Parliament of Rouen. He was in the habit of signing these works J. J., deficiente dextrâ, sinistrâ pinxit.

All this made a great noise, and the regent himself came to see Jouvenet in his studio at the Quatre Nations. Sebastian Ricci, during his travels in France, also visited him. The courtiers and foreigners of distinction vied with each other in bestowing on him marks of favour and admiration. But his disease advanced apace, and in April 1717 he died in the arms of his sister and his son Francis. His last work was the temperament proved too much for his health, and in 1713 he was seized with paralysis of the whole of the right side of his body. Despite his age, sixty-nine years, he had retained all the richness of imagination, and the impetuous desire to be at work, which had characterized his earlier years, when he found himself thus struck powerless. His impatience under such an affliction may be imagined.

He was in his studio some time after, superintending the labours of Restout, his nephew and pupil, who was engaged upon a large painting. Jouvenet seized the brush in his right hand, in order to give more expression to a head; but the disabled limb refused to do its office. He then transferred the brush to his left, and was surprised to find that in it there was "Magnificat," or "Visitation," which still adorns the chancel of Notre Dame.

The Italians have called Jouvenet the French Carracci. There is some truth in the comparison. For he, like the Carracci, had a profound knowledge of his art; his drawing was firm and assured, his ability marvellous; like them, also, he was the connecting link between two schools; but he was more original than the Carracci, than the eclectics who mingled the school of Rome with the school of Parma, Raphael with Correggio, and took their subjects and their figures from every quarter.

What gives Jouvenet his best claim to celebrity, is his originality in the midst of his contemporaries. He was a maker of novelties, as all great men are. In fact, for a man to be great, it is essential that he should see farther and higher than his own time.

Almost all writers who have spoken of Jouvenet have spoken favourably. He has not had to undergo those thermometric risings and fallings in public estimation like more capricious talents. Dorgenville highly appreciates him; Voltaire places high value on him also, though he rates him below Lebrun; Saillasson says he is to Poussin what Crebillon was to Corneille. Other critics believe him to have filled in the French school the place occupied by Rembrandt in the Dutch. We do not agree with Voltaire as to Lebrun's superiority. Without doubt he was a great machinist, a powerful orderer; but Jouvenet, with more energy, if not equal method, is perfect master of an immense scene, and has the merit of invention in his groups, in the outline and drawing of his figures. His drawing was very skilful, strongly marked, and free from all hesitation. The action, which was his forte, sometimes leads him into exaggeration, a gymnastic manner, if we may use the expression, which became a vice in the school of the eighteenth century. Often, those of his figures that belong to the lower classes, such as the fisherman seen from behind, and the man who is drawing the nets, in "The Miraculous Draught of Fishes," have a robust grandeur and a proud gait. Jouvenet's colouring is not of the first order, although it has been frequently vaunted by his admirers. It is reddish, bounded, and not very agreeable as to locality; but it is saved by the skill displayed in the great effects of light and shade, and their resolute expression. Of all his paintings, the most complete, the most vigorous, the grandest, the richest in colouring, is "The Descent from the Cross," in the Paris Museum. It may be seen at all times surrounded by a throng of copyists, who admire its masterly drawing, its energetic tourneur, its strong colour, and its powerful chiaro-scuro.

It is not yet fifty years since Fragonard died, and yet such is the wonderful revolution which France has undergone since the period in which he flourished, that few know anything about him at the present; and even the famous "Biographie Universelle," which so seldom passes over the merits of a Frenchman, let them be ever so small, has made a blunder in giving his very name. No one, down to the present, has written much about him save Diderot; and even he in terms of condemnation oftener than of praise. The cause of this oblivion is obvious. Fragonard rose into celebrity in an order of things, and in a state of society, which happily exist no longer. His talents, great as they undoubtedly were, were prostituted to pander to the vices, follies, and frivolities of the old regime, and when the revolution came, and with it the affectation of Roman simplicity and antique grace, the heroes and demigods of David, and the other artists of the warlike school which flourished under the empire, with their bronze casques and coats of mail, threw the shepherdesses and lovers, with their flowers and light robes, completely into the shade. And yet this was not as it should be. There was nothing national, nothing thoroughly French, in the mawkish allegories which filled the salons during the empire, and consequently there was little in them worthy of admiration. To be truly great, a painter must be true to his early prejudices, sympathies, and associations. He must find his subjects in the men and women, and frailties and virtues, of his own time, and in the hills, and valleys, and plains, and rivers of his native land. This did Fragonard, whatever else he left undone. We are not about to stand up in defence of the scenes upon which he, in many cases, employed his pencil; but this has nothing to do with the value of his painting itself, any more than the immorality of a poem has to do with its excellence. Byron has described the loves of Haidée and Juan with as much pathos, and fervour, and beauty as if they had been the most virtuous pair who ever stood before the altar and received the blessings of the church. Pity that it should be so, but so it is. Fragonard found a certain state of manners about him, and, like Boucher, he has delineated them with a fidelity, imagination, force, and brilliancy which leave much to be regretted, but nothing to be desired. It is his paintings that we are concerned about, and not his morality; and this may serve as a general excuse for not pouring out a greater amount of virtuous indignation upon him than we shall exhibit in the course of the following notice.

Fragonard came into the world in the nick of time. He was born in 1732, just when Chardin, Loucherbourg, Hubert Robert, and Greuze were in the prime of their career. He had the benefit of their example, and the prospect of succeeding them. He was eighteen years of age before he displayed his penchant for art, by employing the pen which should have been engrossing deeds in a notary's office in sketching designs upon paper. His mother saw them, and instantly took him to Boucher, with the view of placing him under his tuition. But Boucher was too much absorbed in his own pursuits and pleasures, to devote any portion of his time and attention to the education of youth. His pupils were the ballet girls of the opera, and the graceful, but shameless, beauties of the court, who loved to see his pencil employed in delineating their charms. He was then taken to Chardin, who at once received him. Diderot speaks in the highest terms of Chardin's method of instruction, and adds that no one discoursed of art more ably and more eloquently than he. "By means of colour and of effect," he would often say to his young pupil, "interest may be thrown round the most vulgar subjects, and a chef-d'œuvre be made of a pot and some fruit. But how? You endeavour, you scratch out, you rub, you glaze, you paint over again, and when you have caught that, I don't know what to call it, which pleases so much, the painting is finished."

After spending six months with Chardin, he went back to Boucher, who finding him so wonderfully improved, received him into his studio without the payment of any fee. Boucher was at this time the painter of voluptuousness, and the delight of the court, and we may reasonably presume that from him Fragonard contracted the taste which fixed the style of the majority of his works. After six months stay with Boucher, he started for Italy at the age of twenty. While there, he copied the greater part of the celebrated pictures of all the great schools, of Michael Angelo, of Da Vinci, Andrea del Sarto, Raphael, Titian, Corregio, the Caracci, Guido, Domenichino, and of Ribera, and this splendid collection of drawings in red chalk, made in company with Hubert Robert, testifies his desire to assimilate every variety of style and practice. But, nevertheless, they are all in the style of the eighteenth century.

His first picture after his return from Rome was his "Callirhoe," which caused him to be elected into the Academy by acclamation, and was exhibited in the Salon of 1765. It was copied in tapestry at the Gobelins manufactory. It is still to be seen at the Louvre, though it has neither number, nor name, nor a place in the catalogue, just as a great many others, through whose negligence or mismanagement we know not. It represents the great priest Coresius sacrificing himself to save Callirhoe, and is a theatrical-looking composition about fifteen feet long. The scene is the interior of a temple; Callirhoe is fainting, her lover is slaying himself, and around stands a crowd of women, old men, and children. The whole appears very skilfully executed, and the colouring in some parts is very beautiful—the young Callirhoe is charming; but still it is not the Fragonard that we admire, who appears here.

In the Salon, 1765, the painting of the new academicien created a general sensation, but after the first tribute of eulogy had been paid to the artist, and the first round of acclamations, the public began to get bolder. Diderot pretended that he had not seen the picture, and in a pretended vision, entitled "The Cave of Pluto," he recounts the history of Coresius, and describes Fragonard's works in detail; Grimm comes into the dialogue, and exclaims, "You had a beautiful dream, and he has painted it. When we lose sight of the picture for a moment even, we fear still that the canvas will fold itself up as yours has done, and that these engaging fantasies will disappear like those of the night."

Nevertheless, the praise of the critics was loud and long, and none spoke more highly of it afterwards than Diderot. In his "Essay on Painting," he cites the "Callirhoe" as a model "of effect of light—true, forcible, and piquant." "It is a splendid thing," says he, "and I don't believe there is a painter in Europe capable of imagining such another."

Fragonard exhibited two other paintings in the Salon of 1765; a landscape with a shepherd standing upon a knoll or rising ground, and the "Profiting by the Father's and Mother's Absence;" a little familiar composition, representing the interior of a cottage, in which a young man is kissing a young girl, while the children are playing round a table. It is well planned, and, on the whole, effective and well coloured; though we know not, however, where the light comes from.

Fragonard never exhibited his works but on these two occasions, and this explains the absence of all further mention of him in Diderot's subsequent notices of works of art. Although belonging to the Academy, he was never appointed one of the professors in the school, as he had quarrelled with some of the members almost immediately after his entrance; some were jealous of him, and others were offended by his freedom and fantasies. Besides, during the superintendence of M. de Marigny, the brother of Madame Pompadour, who was entirely devoted to Boucher, he experienced great difficulty regarding the sale and payment for his "Coresius," which he had allowed to be numbered amongst the paintings, "by command." The favour of the public, however, amply recompensed him for the loss and annoyance he thus sustained. He became as fashionable as Boucher, who was now old. His paintings were greatly sought after, and all the amateurs were anxious to have one of his works in their collections. He executed, about this period, a "Visitation" for the Duke de Grammont, and a great number of graceful works, which bore sufficient evidence that his style was already formed.

Some time after this he resolved upon making another tour in Italy, a country to which he was devotedly attached, in company with a friend of his, a rich financier, who offered to bear all the expenses of the journey. Fragonard now thoroughly explored Italy, and made an immense number of drawings of the scenery in various parts. It was about this time that, in 1759, the Abbé St. Non came into Italy, and formed an intimate friendship with Fragonard and Robert. He took them to Naples and Herculaneum, and to Pompeii; they made an ascent of Vesuvius, and visited Italy and the coast of Sicily together, taking views, and sketching all the ruins and picturesque scenes; and St. Non, after his return to Paris in 1762, engraved them in a magnificent folio.* When they

* Jean Claude Richard, Abbé St. Non, was son of a receiver-general of finances; he belonged to the family of Boullongue, painters to the king. As he had a decided taste for the arts, he was pressed to engage in the study of theology and law. He was sub-deacon and counsellor clerk. Fortunately, during some of the political troubles in France, he was sent to Poitiers by a lettre de cachet, and ordered to remain there. He devoted himself now returned to Paris, he was surprised to find that his fellow-traveller had no thought of returning his drawings, which had remained in his possession. Upon making application to him for them, he signified his intention of retaining them to compensate him for Fragonard's expenses on the journey. The matter was brought before a court of law, and judgment was given against the financier, who was ordered to restore the drawings or pay 30,000 francs. He chose the latter. This may serve to give an idea of the estimation in which the artist's works were at that time held. He was then, in fact, in his glory. Boucher had just died; the greater part of the young painters, forgetful of the lessons they had received, were trying to assume a graver manner—a prelude of the revolution which was soon to follow, not in art only, but in politics. But Fragonard was not the man to repudiate his old idols, and stepped into the place which Boucher had left vacant, as the only one, in fact, who was fit to fill it. When, in 1772, Madame Dubarry, the mistress of Louis XV., so famous for her beauty, her wickedness, and her terrible end, in 1793, was building the pavilion of Luciennes, it was upon Fragonard that she fixed to decorate it. Accordingly he there painted, a la galante, from large panels on which were represented, in the midst of allegorical ornaments, the "Loves of the Shepherds." Madame was satisfied, and forthwith Fragonard found himself more than ever surrounded by noblemen, caressed by the ladies, and visited by "distinguished foreigners." In 1773 he was decorating a boudoir for Mademoiselle Guimard, and he and she differed regarding some part of the work, and separated in "a tiff," the lady declaring that she would bring all the gentlemen of her acquaintance to look at the painting and decide between them. The ceiling, which contained representations of the gods, was already almost finished, and that Mademoiselle herself, the goddess of the opera in her day, figured as Terpsichore upon the principal panel. Fragonard felt deeply insulted at any one being brought to pass judgment upon his work, and accordingly revenged himself by changing the light and graceful figure of Terpsichore into a hideous fury, but without altering the resemblance of the portrait. The lady arrived with a swarm of her friends; when she saw the alteration she flew into a violent passion; but her companions declared coolly that Fragonard was a great physiognomist. Mademoiselle, however, never forgave him; and it was David who finished the work.

Fragonard was now entering in right earnest upon what was clearly his legitimate sphere, the painter of the tender passion in all its phases and its details. His scenes, it is true, were often warm, often indecorous, but many of them are conceived in a vein of passing tenderness and purity. Witness the "Stolen Kiss" (le Baiser à la Derobée), and the "Fountain of Love," in which all the ardour of the passion is glowingly depicted without the least admixture of its grossness. What power in the colouring, what sentiment in the drawing of the two young lovers, who in the flush of youth bend eagerly over the basin into which the enchanted waters of love are flowing!

Fragonard, in making use of allegory, succeeded in combining reality and symbol with the happiest effect. By means of a well-timed boldness, he took away the coldness natural to symbolical compositions, and made life palpitate under the drawing and engraving, and met with extraordinary success. In 1759 he broke away from his imprisonment, and after a tour through England, he went to Italy, where he met, as we have stated above, with Robert and Fragonard, whose works he engraved. His style was a rapid sketching, which was admirably adapted for the expression of ruins, &c. On his return to France, he commenced the publication of his great work, "Voyage de Naples et Sicile," upon a grand scale, which no private resources could have carried out. He was for a while sustained by rich capitalists; but they at last became tired of the expense, and withdrew their aid. He carried it on for a while longer, by sacrificing the whole of his brother's fortune and his own; and though he was able only to publish a part of it, it was one of the finest offerings ever made at the shrine of art. He was an honorary member of the French Academy of Painting. He died in November, 1791.

wings of thought. Lesuer, Charles Lebrun, and most other great painters, who have clothed their meaning in allegory, have hardly ever got out of the domains of poetical allusion, that is to say, their characters are nearly always gods. Raphael mingled history with it; he brought well-known heroes and historical personages, such as Marie de Medicis and Henry IV., into contact with the divinities of mythology. Fragonard has done more than this; he has brought human figures and living symbols upon the scene; he was the first, we believe, to express one sentiment, or rather sensation, as it was then called, by painting another. We mean, that instead of putting allegory in the persons he has put it in the action. The "Fountain of Love," of which we have been speaking, is an admirable example of this. The waters are flowing fast over the edge of the basin which surrounds the fountain, and as it falls, groups of cupids rise from its spray. On the bank a youth and maiden in light and flowing drapery are seen flying towards it with eager and longing eyes. Here the loves are but accessories, and the ardour of passion is painted in lines of fire in the movements made by the two lovers to besprinkle themselves with the enchanted liquid which intoxicates the senses and lulls the heart into happiness and repose.

Fragonard, as we have already said, has been accused of descending in search of subjects to regions where art should never enter. But allowing that there is some truth in the accusation, there is an immense deal of exaggeration in it. It was in vain that Diderot counselled the artists of his time to choose themes of an honourable and decorous character. For pupils of Boucher, it was no very easy matter to follow his advice. What would have been said, had Fragonard suddenly falsified his antecedents, and returned to the paths of virtue! Why, this at that time would have caused awful scandal. To effect such a change in the artist would have required nothing less than a remodelling of the whole of French society. So on he went in his old way, and painted "La Gimblette;" the "Milk-pot," and many other works of the same stamp. He married a woman of great talent, who painted miniatures, and they lived together very happily at the Louvre, with a tolerably large family. Here he had a studio furnished in a style that gratified all his caprices. Curious and fantastic drawings were suspended round the walls; in the corner was a swing or hammock in which he generally placed his models, and it was by this airy staircase, that his daughter, a fine girl who died at the early age of eighteen, descended from her apartment on the upper floor. In the furniture and the general arrangement of the room, everything recalled the fairy scenes which he so often depicted in his paintings; here and there garlands of flowers, shrubs, and even jets d'eau, splendid carpets, and gorgeous drapery.

The voluptuous scenes he painted at this period of his career brought almost fabulous prices. He was the idol of fashion—the lion of the salons. Women crowded to caress him who daily held woman up to the eyes of the world in degradation and guilt—a mere animal; and the men were happy to see their vices and escapades so gloriously veiled and even transformed by the painter's genius. But their hour was come, and the destroyer was at hand. A change was insensibly coming over the French people. The philosophers had not sinned and denounced in vain. The nation was gradually rising to a sense of its true dignity and glory, and was beginning to think it foul scorn that a knot of dissolute courtiers and shameless women should stand forth as the representatives of all the courage, hope, and capability that lay slumbering in its mighty heart. For the first time, the real people, the roturiers, rose up into the view of the world after a thousand years of oppression, and declared their wrongs before high heaven. Fragonard saw the change, and had the sagacity to conform himself to it. He abandoned the painting of the follies and crimes of gallantry, and set himself to the nobler task of delineating the condition, the wants, the virtues, and sufferings of the poor, as did most of the other artists of the day. It was a vast and hitherto unexplored field which was now opening up. The works of Chardin and Greuze had furnished faint glimpses of it, but never before had it seized upon the imagination and attention of the public. Fragonard's successes in the new walk were so many proofs that he was capable of better things than he had yet attempted, and resulted in most of the paintings which have since been multiplied by engraving: "The Happy Mother," "A Family Scene," and "The Cradle," were all executed at this period. In none of them has allegory any part; the sentiment is always pure, and often touching.

The "Family Scene" seems a reflection of Greuze's manner. Fragonard has in it painted a mother surrounded by her children, playing with one of them, while the others, older, are following their humour in various childish amusements. The husband is looking in through an open window upon this scene of quiet happiness. A fine taste is visible in gratitude and admiration of mankind. But even this was too ponderous a subject for Fragonard's training and temperament. Familiar scenes suited him better, and when the revolution broke out, he paid a tribute to it by dedicating the "Happy Mother" to his country. Fragonard grown wise and grave and decorous,—what a surprise this must have been for the good old dame, who, years before, was the famous Made-moiselle Guimard!

By the revolution he lost two-thirds of his fortune, which had been invested in the funds, but was still left a modest competency. His fine drawings, illustrating "Orlando Furioso," and "Don Quixote," did not sell at as high a price as they would have brought in former times. M. Devon possessed the greater part of the latter; from him they were the drawing of all the figures, and in the expression which he has given them. The children, too, are charming.

There cannot be a doubt that when Fragonard returned to the idyl also, it was in obedience to influences which then acted upon him from every quarter. Is it not a curious circumstance that the amorous painter of Dubarry's boudoir, and of the temple of Terpsichore, should afterwards have been inspired by the noble figure of Franklin? And yet nothing is more true. When the American patriarch paid a visit to France, Fragonard sketched in Indian ink, and afterwards engraved, a large composition, in his honour. Turgot's line, since become so famous.

"Eripuit cado beluen, sceptrumque tyrannis," explains the design of the work, in which the artist has endeavoured to set forth the old patriot's double claim to the bought by an eccentric Englishman, who caused the "Don Quixote" to be printed in folio, struck off but one magnificent copy, and bound up Fragonard's drawings in it.

Fragonard died at Paris in 1806. He treated every possible variety of subject; historical, religious, mythological, familiar scenes, pastorals, decoration, landscapes, vignettes, in crayon, in water-colours, water body colour, Chinese ink, red chalk, black lead, beautiful miniatures, and engravings of etchings of exquisite delicacy. Some of his paintings remind us of Rembrandt by the effect and judgment of their light; of Rubens, by the splendour of the flesh and the harmony of the colouring; of Ruysdael, in some of the finished and vigorous landscapes; Chardin, and even Watteau, in the fancy figures; and Reynolds, by the vivacity of some of his sketches. Among the poets, he has illustrated La Fontaine, Boccaccio, and Ariosto. Grace and elegance reign in all his compositions.

His figures, his heads, and his hands of women are skilfully drawn. His children have a coquettish simplicity about them. His landscapes are luminous, and his skies magical. Of all the painters of the eighteenth century, Fragonard is the one whose works give an exact idea of French history during that period—commencing with pastorals and ending with terrorism. Watteau has told us of all the follies of the regency, and speaks of love, while love had still some poetry in it; Boucher paints not love, but pleasure, or rather debauchery. Chardin tells us of the virtues of the l'ours et al. Greuze takes up the pencil of philosophy and preaches morality. Fragonard has done all these—fetes like Watteau's, intrigues and gallantries like Boucher's, interiors like Chardin's, sermons like Greuze's. His earliest works are dedicated to love; his latest to France.

BURNET.

We have on more than one occasion remarked upon the effect that pictures are at once expressions of the thought of the artist and appeals to the feelings of the spectator. And yet a ness; but only suggests it, and leaves all the rest to our own imagination. Let us see what it tells us.

There has been a long and severe storm on one of our picture does not fulfil its office when it leaves nothing untold. If there remains nothing for the imagination to shadow forth for itself, nothing for the mind to ponder over, it is little better than mere imitation. It is one of the highest triumphs of genius to convey all its meaning while expressing only a part of it. How successfully this has been done by many of our own great artists we need not say. Wilkie has taught many a solemn lesson, and written many a piece of humour rich, and pathos deep upon his canvas. There may not be any great variety of detail in the scene he pictures,—it may be one of humble life,—but there is a moral in every line, that he who runs may read. What a sermon lies in his "Young Postboy!" What warning, instruction, and tenderness in the confusion of the lad, and the anxious look of his grandmother!

The picture, an engraving of which is before us, is another of those which suggest its meaning with beautiful distinct-coasts. For days the sea has been fretting itself against the rocks in impotent fury. Seaward, a sierra of foaming waves, black clouds, and driving rain. At intervals, vessels have been seen in the offing, tearing madly through the storm under doubly reefed topsails, and those on board must have been bold hearts if they did not shudder as they looked towards the land, that loomed upon them so frowningly, so sternly. All along the grassy brow of the cliffs, white wreaths of foam lie like woolpacks, or are swept inland to disappear on some flooded field. Great bundles of sea-weed are found on all the paths by the shore, lying where the sea cast them from it in its fury. The eagle, whose nest is in the cliff, screams hoarsely and savagely as she leaves it in the morning, and more savagely as she returns at night, for this tempest is even more than she can enjoy. There is nobody stirring abroad, the fishing-boats are hauled up high, though not dry, upon the beach; every house in the village has its door shut ast, and blazing fires of wreckwood make the inmates comfortable.

But down in one rude cabin near the shore, matters have not been so cozy. Every blast has made the old smoky rafters shake and tremble; the rain has penetrated the thatch at a hundred places, and falls in regular and constant drops on the floor; it oozes in, too, by the crevices in the badly-joined casement of the window. The thunder roars distantly at intervals, and the lightning sends occasional flashes through the gloom. The youngsters are frightened, and crouch round their mother; but she, good woman, heard not the raging of the storm, or the dash of the rain. Her heart is light within her, and she sings gaily as she goes about her household duties; for her husband is not at sea, but snug at home, mending his nets and smoking his pipe, and waiting patiently for the return of fair weather. She remembers what fearful nights of watching and anxiety she has passed when a gale had caught him far from land; how her heart throbbed and her limbs trembled, when the boom of the minute guns of a vessel in distress has come dimly on the blast, and the hoarse dash of the remorseless surge was mingled with the melancholy whistling of the wind through the chinks of the old door. She remembers how, breathlessly, she listened for his footstep; and she remembers with what anguish she watched the morning dawning on the stormy sky, and the troubled sea, and still no Dermot returned, and she is happy in contrasting her present quiet with her past alarms. And yet, even now, she has cause for sorrow and vexation. Before evening the storm has cleared off, but it has left many a trace behind it. The thatch, the straw for which cost them so much but six months ago, has been torn off their cabin; the potatoes on which they relied for subsistence during a considerable part of the year, have had their stalks broken by the wind, and many of them are blasted by the lightning; the woodbine and the rose-tree, which had twined so gracefully round the door, are battered and torn, and bent and bruised; the little plot of flowers, sheltered from the sea breeze by a thick hedge, which was her pride and the delight of the children, is covered with pieces of stone and rubbish, and the flowers, the gay, pleasant, and sweet-scented flowers, are lying dead. The children are roaming about outside, lamenting over the ruin and desolation which meets their view; when, lo and behold, in a great lump of thatch which the wind has swept off the roof, they find a nest, lined with down and hay carefully interwoven, and in it lay three fledglings; but, alas! the cold and wet had killed two of them, and one alone survived, to gape feebly for food at the sound of a chirp. But its mother, poor thing, has fled away towards the blue sky, with sorrow in her heart, and will never, never more return. The children nurse the little orphan and carry it in. Their mother prepares a little warm feather bed for it by the fire, where it can rest snugly, secure from danger; and the rough fisherman himself, whose heart is soft and tender as a maiden's, has made a little skewer to offer it bread and milk upon; and to the delight of the two boys it arouses itself, eats, and is merry. The family are present at all its meals; are enchanted to see it extend its little beak for more, and to flap its half-clothed wings.

In two or three days the thatch is repaired, the garden is cleared of the rubbish, and the flowers resown; the potatoes begin to revive; the rose and the woodbine are once more nailed to the wall, and once more begin to smile as they were wont to smile. All the damage is repaired, and the storm is forgotten, but the fisherman has not forgotten to point out to his children the moral of it all—to remind them each time they rejoice over their pet that it was the storm which brought it them, with all the pleasure it gives; and that God never fails to infuse some leaven of happiness into the worst calamities he sees fit to inflict upon his creatures.

Art has its early victims, as well as poetry. Chatterton and Kirke White gave no greater promise of excellence in verse, than did Bonington and Liversege in painting. To these names we may add that of James Burnet, a young landscape painter of no common powers. He was born at Musselburgh in the year 1788, and was the fourth son of George Burnet, general surveyor of excise in Scotland, a man of probity and talent, and Anne Cruikshank his wife, sister to the eminent anatomist, the friend and associate of John Hunter. Others of his house have attained distinction: his brother John Burnet is as widely known for his talents in original composition with the pencil as for his almost matchless skill with the graver. The family came originally from Aberdeen.

The instruction which Burnet received at school during the day was excellently followed up in the evening by that of his mother, a devout and prudent woman. There are few of his countrymen who derive not as much of their knowledge from their father's fireside as from the public schools. His mind took an early turn towards art; during his leisure hours he loved to walk into the studio of Scott, the landscape engraver, with whom his brother John was a pupil; nor was he long in lifting the pencil; the result of his attempts was, that he was put under the care of Liddel to learn wood carving, at that time a profession both lucrative and popular. This branch of art, indeed, is now nearly extinct; a love of what is plain has come upon the country, and carved chairs, couches, and cabinets, are expelled from parlour and drawing-room; our cornices and architraves are no longer ornamented, and festoons and flowers flourish no more on our walls.

During his apprenticeship, Burnet studied at the Trustees' Academy, under Graham, where he was noticed for the natural truth of his delineations. As his skill of hand increased, he began to perceive the limited nature of the art of carving in wood. He sent some of his compositions to his brother John, who had removed to London; expressed a wish to follow and devote his time to painting; and without waiting for a letter of encouragement, which was on the way, he left Edinburgh, and arrived in London in the year 1810, in the twenty-second year of his age. He found his brother busied on his fine engraving of Wilkie's inimitable 'Blind Fiddler.' He stood and looked earnestly and long on the picture; he had seen nothing so full of character, or so finished in all its details, during his studies in the North. A new light, he said, broke upon him, and from that moment he resolved to alter his style of drawing. In this resolution he was confirmed by examining the works of the best Dutch masters in the British Gallery. In them he perceived much of what he admired in Wilkie: he lost no time in making attempts in what ought to be called the natural, rather than the Dutch style. 'So convinced was he,' said one who knew him intimately, 'of the little progress he had made in colouring, and the other essentials which are everything in the department of the art he had chosen, that he may be said to have only then commenced his studies; so little applicable is an academical education to the humbler and picturesque walks of art.'

In Wilkie and the Dutch masters he perceived something entirely after his own heart: he loved the vivid human character in the former; and of the latter, Potter and Cnyp became his favourites. He desired to unite their qualities; and while he studied their mode of handling their subjects, and endeavoured to look on nature with their eyes, he was perfectly aware that nothing short of originality of conception would lead him to distinction. He had sought what he wanted in the Academy, but found it not; he therefore determined, like Gainsborough, to make nature his academy; and with a sketch-book and pencil he might be seen wandering about the fields around London, noting down scenes which caught his fancy, and peopling them with men pursuing their avocations, and with cattle of all colours, and in all positions. Of these sketches I have seen a vast number; some are rude and ill arranged; others display bits of great beauty and character; the greater number are such as he probably intended to paint pictures from; for the scenes are generally well depicted, and the sentiment plainly expressed. Of cattle he seems to have been particularly fond, and has represented them in all possible postures, and of all hues—'The ring-straked, the speckled, and the spotted.' He also seems to have been a judge. Some of our cattle painters, imagining that the more flesh cows have the more milk they will give, have plumped them up into a condition for the butcher, but not for the milk-pail. Burnet knew that a moderately lean cow produced most milk, and in this way he drew them. But in all that he did he desired to tell a story. This he knew would give interest to his works, and produce at the same time action, expression, and variety. Nor did he confine his studies to the fields alone; he made himself familiar with the indoor as well as outdoor economy of a farmer's household during seed-time, summer, harvest, and winter; he left no implement of husbandry unsketched, and scarcely any employment of the husbandman without delineation.

The first fruit of all this preparation was his picture of 'Cattle going out in the Morning.' There is a dewy freshness in the air; and the cattle, released from their stalls, seemed to snuff the richness of the distant pastures, and acknowledge the loveliness of the day. His next picture was superior even to this: in his 'Cattle returning Home in a Shower,' purchased by Sir Thomas Baring, 'he has introduced,' says an excellent judge, 'everything that could in any way characterise the scene. The rainbow in the sky, the glittering of the rain upon the leaves; the dripping poultry under the hedge, the reflections of the cattle on the road, and the girl with her gown over her shoulders, all tend with equal force to illustrate his subject.' This picture placed him in the first rank as a pastoral painter. Others followed of equal or superior truth and beauty: such as his—1. 'Key of the Byre;' 2. 'Crossing the Brook;' 3. 'Cowsboys and Cattle;' 4. 'Breaking the Ice;' 5. 'Milking;' 6. 'Crossing the Bridge;' 7. 'Inside of a Cow-house;' 8. 'Going to Market;' 9. 'Cattle by a Pool in Summer;' 10. 'Boy with Cows.' Some of these are in the collections of the Earl of Coventry, the Earl of Egremont, and the Marquis Camden; others are in the possession of the painter's relatives. A very fine one, 'The Boy with the Cows,' belongs to James Wadmore, Esq., and hangs worthily with the Wilkies and the Turners, and other masters of the calling.

I have said that he sketched and studied much in the fields. He felt that the excellence which he coveted could not be obtained on more moderate conditions. It was also his practice to write down on the spot his own observations regarding the future handling of the picture in oil; these are both curious and numerous, but their scope and aim are so interwoven with the landscape to which they relate, that few of them will be understood separate. I find the following memoranda regarding distances—'Extreme distance ought generally to be of the same tint as the sky with which it unites; and as it approaches the middle ground, the strata appear interspersed with touches of light and dark, such as the lights upon the tops of houses with their shadows. Be particular in marking the buildings with a firmer line than the trees; never admit colour into your distance when in the direction of the light; scumble a little with purple and grey at the bottom of your objects, losing their forms at the base. In a side light, the objects are coloured where the light shines upon them, while the shadows are all of one tint: even red is grey in the shadow; but when the light is behind you, every object is made out with its proper colour.' The same clear, simple mode of instruction distinguishes all he says regarding the treatment of that unstable element, water. 'To paint water well, it ought, if possible, to be painted at once with a full pencil and a quantity of vehicle: the colour reflected in water appear more pleasing from their possessing a rich pulpy substance, and also from their sweetly melting into each other. In painting water, particular attention should be paid to the place and distance, as it alters much according to the situation. Objects near the fore ground raise their reflections strong when they touch aught, but are often lost when they come to the bottom of the picture; while, on the contrary, objects in the distance show their reflections stronger as they approach towards you. This arises from the waves conveying the reflection being larger and less under the influence of perspective than when they touch the distant object.'

Burnet is equally plain and explicit on the subject of 'sky'; as his remarks are the off-spring of his own observations, I shall give the student all the advantage which can be derived from them. 'The sky being of a receding character, all those points which contribute to give it such character should be the study of the painter. More white, for example, will seldom keep its place in a sky, but it ought to be used in foreground objects for the purpose of giving a retiring quality to the whites in the sky and distance. Softness of form also aids in giving the sky a retiring character, although it is necessary to give a little sharpness to prevent the sky appearing what is termed woolly; yet very little is sufficient to give firmness to the whole. Clouds are much more opaque in the north than in the south, as the light shines upon them in the one situation and through them in the other. Their form alters much, too, according to the time of day; at noon they are round, and more like those of Wouvermans; in the evening they are more like those of Cuypp or Bath, especially about an hour before the sun goes down.' Besides remarks originating in the contemplation of nature, there are, in his school-books, observations on some of the landscapes of our greatest masters. Under the date of May, 1814, I find the following memorandum concerning the pictures of Richard Wilson in the British Institution:—'I observed some pictures more pleasing than others; those which seemed most so were light pictures with warm foregrounds falling into a cool sky and a distance, the middle ground mostly in shadow of a purple grey, with yellow and green touches through it; a piece of blue drapery in the foreground gives great value. Of all things, Wilson seems careful to keep a proper balance of hot and cold colour, and of light and shade, with very little positive colour, and little of black or white, but always some of each.'

But whilst this young painter was noting the excellence of Wilson, or watching the shifting colours of the sky and the changing hues of nature, he was sensible that a disease which flatters while it destroys was gradually gaining upon him as ice upon the stream, and robbing him of his vigour, bodily and mental. He still continued his excursions among the fields; the consumption from which he was a sufferer made him feel the beauty more deeply of solitary places; he was to be found often in secluded nooks; and the beautiful churchyard of Lee, in Kent, near which he, in his latter days, resided, was a place where he frequently wandered. But change of air and scene brought no improvement to his health; his looks began to fade; he could scarcely take his customary walk in the fields, or use his note-book and pencil. He is still remembered about Lewisham and Lee as one who was to be found in lonely walks making sketches. His cheerfulness never forsook him; he loved to talk with his friends concerning art; and at times, when he forgot that his days could be but few, he spoke of landscapes which he had planned and resolved to execute. On finding that death was near, he desired his brother John to bury him in the village church of Lee, which forms the background of several of his studies, and resigned himself calmly to his fate. He died on the 27th of July, 1816, aged 28 years. His dying request could not, it seems, be complied with; parochial etiquette forbade the burial of a stranger, even of genius, in the church of Lee, and he was interred in the churchyard of Lewisham.

James Burnet had a fine eye, and an equally fine feeling, for the beauties of landscape; his knowledge of nature was extensive and minute; he had watched the outgoings and incomings of shepherds and husbandmen, had studied flocks and herds, and, as the memoranda which we have quoted show, had made himself intimate with much that lends lustre to landscape. It was his custom, in country places, to watch the cows going to pasture or returning home; to look to the manners and practices of the cowherds; nor did he sometimes hesitate to lift rammeret the cottages, and observe through the lighted up windows the employments or amusements of the peasantry. To such feeling for the rural and picturesque, he added an excellent eye for colour; he could employ at will either the bold deep tones of Rembrandt, or the silvery and luminous tones of Cuypp. To those who know the difficulty of guiding the eye from one extreme to another, this will be deemed great praise. He had considerable poetic feeling; there is nothing coarse or common in his scenes; his trees are finely grouped; his cows are all beautiful; they have the sense to know where the sweetest grass grows; his milkmaids who are acquainted with country scenes, and with flocks and herds, may smile at some of these remarks. Under a fat cow a milkmaid will think it nearly labour lost to place her pail; and a sheep which grazes among briars and thorns cannot fail have an air of natural elegance about them, and his cowboys are not without grace.

Of his defects the critics of his day spoke; they called his cows lean, his shadows too dark, and said his sheep with their torn fleeces seemed creatures dying of the rot. Those to show dishevelled fleeces. No doubt he had defects; but what were they compared to the great natural truth and beauty of his delineations? *

In our prospectus to the present publication we said: "The Works of Eminent Masters will include specimens of the the productions of those who followed the same glorious vocation as Raphael and Titian, Rubens, Rembrandt, and Velasquez; but in the present instance we shall have occasion to extend our plan, and treat of the representatives of every art mentioned in the above lines quoted from our prospectus. Not only shall we speak of painters, but also, and more particularly, of those who wield the chisel and not the pencil, and whose skill endows the cold, hard marble with the glowing semblance of life, compelling it to assume some of the loveliest forms that ever mortal eye beheld or enraptured poet's

We shall, also, in another particular, allow ourselves greater latitude than usual. We shall introduce many facts mind imagined. At the same time, too, we shall have an opportunity of introducing to our readers the sister art—Architecture, grave, solemn, and awful, standing in all the dread magnificence of woe upon a mighty pedestal erected for her by the gratitude of a great nation bewailing the loss of one of her mightiest sons. Each of our former notices was confined to the works of one man; in the present account we are which certainly do not belong to the arts abstractedly, but which not only belong to them in the present instance, but lend them much of their value, in so far as they are connected with Napoleon's tomb. The design of the tomb is, undoubtedly, magnificent, and the execution something which strikes the spectator with the deepest admiration and respect, but does not the whole pile gain in interest from the fact that it is raised to the memory of one whose name will live as an object of blind admiration, or as equally blind hate, in the hearts of most men, as long as the pages of History shall not be sealed to human inquiry; and will not each detail, will not each bas-the tomb, we shall place at the conclusion of our narrative the biographical notices of the various artists, whether painters, architects, or sculptors, whose works we mention.

After the mortal remains of the Emperor Napoleon had been transported from St. Helena to Paris, in the year 1840, they were provisionally placed in a chapel of the dome-church of St. Louis des Invalides. At present, they repose in the monumental crypt which has been constructed and decorated to receive them at an immense expense, and which is situated under the centre of the celebrated gilt cupola, that, for the future, borrowing fresh importance from their grand object to which it is now devoted, will be remembered and renowned chiefly in conjunction with the fact of its being the vault that stretches over the imperial mausoleum.

All communication between the space beneath the dome and the other parts of the church, as well as the Hôtel des Invalides itself, has been cut off, and, at present, it is not possible to enter the funereal sanctuary by any other way than the grand southern portico, which looks upon the Place Vauban. Access is gained to this portico by traversing a large open space in front of the dome, enclosed by a ditch colonnade of St. Peter's, at Rome. It is easy to imagine the magnificence that the execution of this project would have imparted to an architectural composition, whose various details are already so admirably calculated to produce a striking effect.

A number of fine statues tend to increase still more the richness of this fine specimen of architectural skill; some of them are not at all out of keeping with the new destination of the dome.

The façade of the dome is composed of two orders of and iron gate. On each side of the latter is a pavilion, serving the purpose of a guardhouse.

Immediately the visitor reaches the Place Vauban, he obtains a full view of the church of the dome, constructed according to the plans of Jules Hardouin Mansart, superintendent of royal buildings, and nephew of François Mansart, architect of the Val-de-Grâce, and inventor of the windows which are still called after him. The Hôtel des Invalides, properly so called, was constructed by Libéral Bruant.

At the time of his death, in 1708, Mansart entertained the idea of adding to the beautiful façade a grand colonnade, with four pavilions rising above it, in the style of the admirable architecture, superposed and ornamented with columns and pilasters, the Doric being below and the Corinthian above. The two sides of the first story are formed of a simple attic, ornamented with pilasters, and surmounted by stone groups, placed two and two, representing eight of the fathers of the Greek and Latin churches.

Access to the portico, which juts out from the body of the church, is gained by a grand flight of fifteen steps, ornamented by six fine Doric columns, behind which are an equal number of pilasters. Four of these columns are placed on the top of the steps, while the two others are situated near the door. There are also four more pillars, which are less advanced than those we have just mentioned, and are placed on each side of two niches, more than thirteen feet high, containing marble statues, representing St. Louis and the Hardouin Mansart desired to impart to his work, do not at all clash with the present destination of the edifice.

INTERIOR VIEW OF THE CRYPT AND OF THE TOMB.

Above the Doric entablature, is, as we have before said, a number of columns and pilasters of the Corinthian order, corresponding with those of the order beneath. Before the pilasters of the attic, which terminate on each side this

This projecting portion of the building is surmounted by a pediment, terminated by a cross, and bearing the arms of France. On each side of the cross is a seated statue: one is Faith and the other Charity. These statues are each attended respectively by two of four others, in a standing posture, and

Above the two orders which we have now described, rises the dome properly so called. It is decorated with a system of forty columns of composite order, artistically combined so as to strengthen the construction, and at the same time to

BAS-RELIEF—CREATION OF THE ORDER OF THE LEGION OF HONOUR.

This arrangement is a grave fault against the rules of architecture, which require the principal axes to present voids, and not the contrary. It has been often criticised, and the learned Blondel has pointed out ts defects, observing, however, at the same time, that there are certain deviations from the established rule, whose bad effect is lost in the harmony of the mass. He adds the following important critical maxim, of which we shall have to avail ourselves in the course of the present article:—"We ought never to judge of an architectural work, without having first penetrated the reasons which induced the architect to select one particular plan of operation in preference to every other."

Thirty-two of these columns are employed in cantoning eight masses of masonry, which serve as so many buttresses, while the eight others are placed two by two in front of the piers at the extremities of the four axes of the building.

Above the Composite order is an attie with twelve semi-circular windows and eight large consoles, each of which is ornamented at the base with two figures of saints or apostles.

Above the Attie commences the arch of the dome, terminated by a circular platform with four arches and twelve columns,

These chapels are about sixty-five feet in height and forty-two in depth, and contain the mausoleum of Turenne, sculptured by Girardon, and that of Vauban only lately finished by Mons. Antoine Etex.

The four circular chapels are consecrated respectively to St. Jérôme, St. Grégoire, St. Ambroise, and St. Augustin. They are about eighty-two feet in height and fifteen in diameter. They are perfectly symmetrical, and all four decorated in precisely the same manner. In the intervals between eight engaged Corinthian columns raised upon pedestals at equal distances, are three arches, three niches, and two windows; the columns support an entablature, below which is a kind of pedestal or attie from which rises the springer of the vault.

the four more prominent columns supporting four Virtues. The whole is crowned with an obelisk surmounted by a cross.

The height of the building is something more than three hundred and thirty feet.

INTERIOR OF THE DOME.

The visitor enters the dome by a richly sculptured and gilt door, the work of Bondi and Louis Arnaud, surmounted by two angels, serving as supports to the escutcheon of France.

The church of the dome is shaped like a Greek cross, in the centre of which is the dome itself, supported by four systems of pillars with openings leading to four circular chapels, constructed in the four corners. The pilasters and columns of these supports are of the Corinthian order, fluted and carved with a degree of perfection not to be surpassed by any other edifice of the same period.

On entering the space beneath the dome, the visitor immediately perceives in face of him the baldachin, which we shall describe further on, while to his left and right, respectively, are the chapels of the Holy Virgin and of Sainte Thérèse.

chisels of some of the great masters of the reign of Louis XIV., such as Coysevox, Pigal, William and Nicolas Coustou, Sigisbert Adam, Espingola, and others, ornament the chapels and command our admiration in every portion of the edifice, where sculpture can advantageously be employed in assisting her sister, architecture. The original plans, from which all these various details were executed, are due to Girardon.

The cupola of each of the chapels, as well as that of the dome, is covered with paintings relating to various traits in the lives of the four fathers of the church, under whose patronage the chapels were raised, and are reckoned among the finest productions of Michel Cornille, Bon Boullongne, and Louis Boullongne.

If we now return to the space beneath the dome, we shall be struck with admiration at the splendid sight presented by the general view of the edifice.

The whole vault of the sanctuary is either painted or gilt; Noël Coypel has represented on it the Trinity and the Assumption.

The roof of the four different portions of the nave is painted by Charles de la Fosse, and represents the Evangelists.

Jouvenet has painted twelve pictures of the twelve Apostles, placed between the principal arches, above the windows of the cupola.

But it is the ceiling of the upper dome which offers to our view the finest portion of this splendid specimen of the painter's skill: it represents Saint Louis received into Heaven, and is the greatest work of Charles de la Fosse.

In the reigns of Louis XIV. and Louis XV. divine service used to be solemnly celebrated here, in presence of the king, at certain fixed periods of the year.

On the pavement beneath the dome is yet to be seen the rich marble mosaic laid down in the time of Louis XIV., and in the ornaments of which are still to be traced, at each division of the design, the intertwined L's with the royal crown and the fleur-de-lys.

The dominant idea which presided over the conception of the plans for the emperor's tomb completely interdicted, as we have before said, every modification of a nature to change the primitive and historical character of the dome.

THE SEPULCHRAL LAMP.

It was in obedience to this idea, formally expressed in a programme from which the architect could not depart under any pretext whatever, that Mons. Visconti excavated the crypt, the opening to which, under the very centre of the dome, attracts the attention of the spectator immediately he enters the temple. It is surrounded by a balustrade of white marble breast-high, over which the spectator can look down into the interior of the crypt, and perceive all its various details at one glance.

We must not omit this opportunity of mentioning the beautiful finish of the sculptures ornamenting the balustrade. They consist of a system of coffers alternately filled up with laurel branches and separated by roses in the same style as the masks of the dome.

The windows of the eupola as well as those of the chapels are at present filled with violet-coloured glass, and allow only a dim mild light to penetrate into the interior of the dome. The appearance of mystery in which this envelops the edifice, and the aspect of solemn grandeur that seems to be a natural consequence of it, add another and deeper tinge of poetry to the impression which the visitor involuntarily feels in this last resting-place of a man who once filled the whole world with his power and his glory, as he now serves to show by his tomb the vanity and emptiness of all earthly things.

From the opening of the crypt, which is so situated that the cupola of the church itself serves as the roof of the tomb, the spectator's glance falls on the altar before which the clergy will officiate at all the religious ceremonies that may be insti-

A bronze figure of Christ, cast after a model executed by Mons. Triquetti, is placed over the tabernacle, the richness and delicate workmanship of which are also worthy of remark. The altar, the balustrade surrounding it, the hand-rail, and the pedestals which support the torches, are formed of black marble from the Pyrenees and green marble from the Alps.

The torches, placed on each side the altar-steps on the pillars that sustain the hand-rail, are supported by groups of angels in gilt-bronze, very well executed and most elegantly designed.

The skilful artist did not fail to fulfil his engagement or realize his expectations; the most finished chasing could hardly produce a more delicate specimen of workmanship. It is separated from the present church by a magnificent cast iron railing.

At first there was some idea of forging this railing in steel, but independently of the fact that this would have cost a very

The elegant and airy style of ornament adopted in this railing consists of an ingenious combination of interlacings of the Corinthian order, and branches of laurels, the emblems of military glory.

Both professional men and connoisseurs admire the precision with which all the delicate details of the model and the truly antique rigidity of the lines have been preserved in the casting. We must observe, too, that the chaser's chisel has added nothing to the purity of the design; the iron is pre-

TOMBS OF DUBOIS AND BERTRAND.

The vestibule of the crypt, between the railing of separation and the gates of the tomb, has been selected as the resting-place of Marshal Duroc, Duc de Frioul, and General Bertrand, who were, in turn, the emperor's dearest and most intimate friends.

Duroc was born in 1772, at Pont-à-Mousson, and killed by a stray ball at the combat of Warschen, the 22nd May, 1813. From the 18th Brumaire until his death he was constantly attached to the person of Napoleon. He was named Grand Marshal of the Palace in 1804. He lingered twelve hours after having received his death-wound, and during this long agony received a visit from the emperor. "My whole life has been devoted to you," said the dying man; "and I only regret that I am about to lose it, because it might still be of service to you." "Duroc," replied Napoleon, "there is another world after this, and there it is that we shall one day meet again." A striking proof of the profound feeling of friendship which united these two men, in spite of the distance which a throne placed between them, is to be found in the fact of the idea entertained by Napoleon, in 1815, of asking permission to reside in England under the name of Colonel Duroc.

General Foy has characterised in the following manner the relations which existed between the Emperor and his Grand Marshal of the palace: "No other person was ever the depository of so many and such important political secrets. The peculiar turn of his mind, remarkable rather for the justice of its views than for their comprehensiveness, his irreproachable demeanour, and, more than all, the force of habit, had placed him on a footing of confidential intimacy. Had a prince of Napoleon's character been capable of having a favourite, the relations subsisting between him and Duroc would have been looked upon in a very different light."

Bertrand was born at Châteauroux, and first served in the engineers, in which corps he obtained all his grades up to that of general of brigade. In 1805, he was named aide-de-camp to the emperor, and became Grand Marshal of the palace after Duroc's death. He followed Napoleon to the island of Elba, and subsequently to St. Helena, where he performed the sad duties of closing his eyes for ever.

These reasons are most decidedly sufficient to justify the honour which France has shown these two faithful servants by laying their ashes near those of the great man whom they loved so well. Thus do the two Grand Marshals of the palace, who, during their lifetime, watched over the safety of the emperor's person, appear even after their death to be entrusted with the care of guarding his tomb.

It is in the masonry supporting the altar and the baldachin, already described, and at the foot of the two flights of stairs leading from the dome to the vestibule, that the doorway opens into the crypt. It is closed by bronze gates, as simple in their style as they are severe. The ornaments consist of three superposed coffers of unequal size. The one nearest the bottom contains the imperial N. The smallest, in the middle, displays the thunderbolt, while the largest, occupying the upper portion of the gate, represents the victorious standard, twined with laurels, and surmounted by the eagle and the crown.

Two funeral genii of damaskeened bronze, the one bearing the globe, and the other the imperial crown, support the architrave of the door, on the pediment of which are sculptured the following words, contained in Napoleon's will:—

JE DESIRE QUE MES CENDRES REPOSENT
SUR LES BORDS DE LA SEINE AU MILIEU DE CE PEUPLE FRANÇAIS QUE J'AI TANT AIME.*

The two genii, modelled by Mons. Duret, are not deficient in style, but the gilding with which they are covered detracts greatly from their characteristic appearance.

THE CRYPT.

After passing the doorway, guarded by the two genii enveloped in their funeral crape, we arrive at a large flight of twenty-six granite steps. Before the first step, in the pavement, is a mosaic rosette, whose centre is occupied by the imperial N. Two other mosaics, representing the eagle and the star of the legion of honour, are let into the flag-stones of the passage which extends from the last step to the opening of the crypt.

The obscurity which reigns in this vast corridor, the sepulchral silence, and even the feeling of cold which seizes on every one beneath these massive vaults, announce most plainly to the visitor, already greatly moved, that an imposing sight awaits him beyond the last doorway.

A dim, uncertain light, admirably adapted for pious reflection, envelops the sarcophagus in a veil of faint violet colour, the rays of which being caught in their passage by the slightest projection in the sculptures, tinge the marble of the caryatides with warm and mellow tints. This artificial light is obtained by means of the violet muslin curtains worked with silver, with which the windows of the cupola have been hung until such time as coloured glass can be substituted for that at present in use.

The crypt consists of a circular gallery, about six or seven feet broad, and of a round central space formed by twelve arches with a marble balustrade, breast-high, connecting them with each other, and separated by twelve caryatides about fifteen feet high. Lastly, there is a small funeral apartment intended for a reliquary, and opening into the gallery by a bronze door. The sarcophagus occupies the middle of the crypt, its extremities being turned towards the two doors.

THE GALLERY.

The gallery is paved with marble mosaics of various colours.

The outer wall is divided into twelve compartments, each of which corresponds to one of the arches. The door of the crypt and that of the reliquary occupy two of these compartments; the ten others contain ten marble bas-reliefs. Twelve bronze lamps, suspended from the ceiling of the gallery in such a manner, that a straight line drawn through the centre of one of the arches would likewise traverse the centre of the lamp hung opposite to it, are intended for the illumination of the tomb during the celebration of all religious ceremonies.

THE BAS-RELIEFS.

The ten bas-reliefs, due to the chisel of Mons. Simard, are destined to perpetuate, under the form of allegories, the remembrance of the grand institutions and of the most important acts of the Emperor Napoleon's reign. Counting them from the entrance, and commencing at the right hand, they represent, in the following order: The Institution of the Legion of Honour, Public Works, Encouragement of Commerce and Industry; Establishment of the Cour des Comptes;* Foundation of the University; the Concordat; Promulgation of the Civil Code; Foundation of the Council of State; Organisation of Public Administration; and Pacification of Civil Troubles.

THE LEGION OF HONOUR.

The general arrangement and dignity of composition displayed in this bas-relief, are in perfect keeping with the character of the subject. According to the idea which presided at its establishment, the Legion of Honour was an essentially democratic institution, although it seemed to confer a kind of aristocratic privilege, and form, as it were, the base of a new order of nobility. It consecrated the principle of the equality of all in the eyes of national gratitude, and the fitness of every citizen to earn for himself a splendid reputation by the brilliancy of his merit and the services he might have rendered his country.

It is this idea which the artist has endeavoured to embody. Napoleon, standing up, crowned with laurels, and having merely an antique pepulum thrown over his shoulders, is distributing recompences to the magistrates, scholars, artists, and warriors, who are crowding round him in attitudes at once noble and modest. A legend let into the stone at the bottom of the bas-relief has these words, taken from the Mémorial de Sainte-Hélène:

* Audit Office.

"J'ai excité toutes les émulations, récompensé tous les mérites et reculé les limites de la gloire." *

PUBLIC WORKS.

"Partout où mon règne a passé, il a laissé des traces durables de son bienfait." †

Such are the words which serve as an inscription, and which have furnished the subject for this bas-relief.

Napoleon, who is seated, and whose head is surrounded by a crown of rays, is stretching forth his two arms towards tablets bearing the names and purposes of the various monuments and works of public utility executed during his reign and by his order. Architecture and Civil Engineering, with their attributes, the compass and square, are holding the tablets. Two Glories are seated on the steps of the throne to the right and to the left.

In endeavouring to give his composition a monumental character in accordance with the idea suggested by the subject, the artist may, perhaps, with some justice, be accused of being rather heavy and obscure.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY.

Napoleon, seated upon a throne in an attitude full of calm majesty, is resting his hands upon two tablets, which bear the names of two grand institutions—the Code of Commerce, and the Quinquennial Exposition of the Products of French Industry—founded expressly to protect commercial transactions, and give a greater impetus to industry.

Vulcan personifying Industry, and Mercury as the god of Commerce, each bearing his respective attribute, the hammer and the caduceus, are raising up and supporting two towns, Paris and Lyons, kneeling at the foot of the throne.

There is a great deal of grandeur about this composition, which is, at the same time, both simple and elegant.

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE COUR DES COMPTES.

Napoleon is seated on his throne, his body is naked, his legs only being covered with long drapery. His physiognomy is severe and his look implacable. He is stretching a protecting hand over Truth, Justice, and Order, who are placed on his right. The figure of Truth is simple, and the expression of her features one of candour; she is presenting her mirror with mild assurance. Justice is impassible, whilst Order, represented as a beautiful young female, at the foot of the throne, is inscribing in a book, with arithmetical impartiality, the sum of the expenses and of the receipts. The emperor is repelling with his left hand, and with a gesture of indignation, the affrighted figures of Illegality and Peculation, while Falsehood, whose mask has fallen off, is kneeling down terror-stricken, with her head bent and her face concealed by her two hands.

This bas-relief is the best conceived and the finest of all the ten. The dramatic movement of the composition and the happy opposition of the two groups impart to it a character of grandeur which is not met with to so great an extent in the other subjects, although several of them are very remarkable, and display the most extraordinary talent. At the bottom of the bas-relief are the following words, which sum up, in a clear and concise manner, the end and the utility of the institution it commemorates: "Cour des Comptes, décret du 16 Septembre, 1807.—Je veux que par une surveillance active, l'infidélité soit réprimée et l'emploi légal des fonds publics garanti." ‡

The Cour des Comptes was founded in virtue of the law of the 16th September, 1807.

The first article of this law runs thus: "The national accounts are kept by a Cour des Comptes."

In 1780, there were in France ten provincial audit offices (chambres des comptes) in various parts of the kingdom,

* I have excited every kind of emulation, recompensed every kind of merit, and extended the limits of glory.

† Wherever my reign has passed, it has left permanent marks of its beneficial influence.

‡ Audit Office, decree of the 16th September, 1807.—It is my will that unfaithfulness shall be suppressed and the legal employment of the public moneys guaranteed by a system of active supervision.

namely, at Dijon, Grenoble, Nantes, Montpellier, Rouen, Pau, Metz, in the sovereignty of Lorraine, and that of Bar.

The unity introduced into the administration of government by the National Assembly was naturally followed by the foundation of a single audit office. However great a nation is, its affairs ought to be, and may be, administered with as much simplicity and regularity as those of an ordinary mercantile firm.

The first thing done was to create an account office (Bureau de Comptabilité), the National Assembly, however, reserving the right of scrutinising the accounts, which could only pass after they had been sanctioned by that body.

Under the Constitution of the Year Eight of the Republic, a decree of the consuls enlarged the field of action of this institution, which was definitively simplified and organised by the law of the 16th September, 1807. Subsequently, fresh laws and decrees introduced other changes, which are all summed up in the ordinance of the 31st May, 1838, headed, "General regulations concerning the public accounts."

It is the duty of the Cours des Comptes to verify the statements of the public expenditure and receipts presented to it by the receivers-general of finance, the paymasters of the public treasury, the registers of stamps and public domains, the receivers of the excise, the accountant-directors of the post-office, the directors of the mint, the central cashier of the public treasury, and the responsible agent of the Virements des Comptes. It likewise audits the annual accounts of the colonial treasurers, of the general treasurer of the naval pensioners, of the bursars of the public colleges, of the commissioners of powder and saltpetre, of the accountant charged with the transfer of the Bontes inscribed in the ledger of the public debt, of the accountant of the funds and pensions, of the cashier of the sinking fund and also of the suitors' fund, of the royal printing-office, of the administration of the salt works of the East, and of the receivers of the poor-houses, hospitals, and other charitable institutions, whose incomes attain the sum fixed by the laws and regulations on the subject.

The Cour des Comptes ranks immediately after the Cour de Cassation.

FOUNDATION OF THE UNIVERSITY.

The following words are inscribed upon the legend of this bas-relief:—

"Décret du 10 Mai, 1806.—Il sera formé, sous le nom d'Université Impériale, un corps chargé exclusivement de l'enseignement et de l'éducation publiques dans tout l'empire." *

The artist has treated this subject in the following manner: he has represented Napoleon seated in an attitude expressing the natural solicitude of the father of a family as well as the wise forethought of the sovereign. In his right hand he holds the sceptre, while with his left he is drawing towards him a youth who is nestling against his body as if to seek a refuge there. The five Faculties, each bearing the attributes peculiar to her, surround the throne, over which tower the busts of Aristotle and Plutarch.

This bas-relief is one of the most mediocre, both as regards its ordonnance and execution. The figure of Science, however, is very fine, and of truly antique elegance.

The law of the 10th May, 1806, first decreed the formation, under the name of University, of a body exclusively charged with the education and instruction of all classes throughout the kingdom.

This law was further developed in the decree of the 17th March, 1808, of which the following are the first provisions:

"Public instruction, throughout the whole kingdom, is confided to the University. No school or any kind of establishment whatever for imparting instruction can be formed independent of the University, and without the authorisation of its head. No one can open a school or teach publicly, without being a member of the University, and having graduated in one of its faculties. The course of instruction in the clerical seminaries, however, is under the direction of the archbishops and bishops, each in his diocese, who have the power of naming and dismissing the professors. The University will be composed of as many academies as there are Cours d'Appel. The schools belonging to each academy will be placed in the following order:—1st, the faculties for the abstruse sciences and the conferring of degrees; 2ndly, the lycæums for ancient languages, history, rhetoric, logic, and the elements of mathematics and physics; 3rdly, the colleges and parish schools of the second class, for the elements of ancient languages and the first principles of history and of the sciences; 4thly, the larger schools kept by private individuals, but in which the course of instruction is very similar to that pursued in the colleges; 5thly, the boarding-schools belonging to private masters, and devoted to a less solid course of study than that of the large schools; and 6thly, the small primary schools where the pupils are simply taught reading and writing, with the first notions of arithmetic."

These provisions have continued, up to the present day, to be the basis of the course of public instruction in France; although it is true that several very important modifications have since been introduced into the constitution of the University by the laws of 1850 and 1852. The circumscriptions are now modified, there being a rector to each department.

The difference of principle which separates the imperial law from that of the 15th March, 1850, is, however, very great. The first is based upon the idea that the state possesses in a greater degree than any private individual, or any collection of individuals, the tradition of the general spirit of the country, and is more deeply interested than any one else in directing each successive generation to the goal assigned by Providence to the nation. The second is founded on the directly opposite opinion, that, allowing the impulsion and direction of everything relating to the material interests of the country ought to flow from government, such should not be the case in what relates to its moral interests (Report of the Committee, 6th October, 1850). In 1817, M. Royer-Collard said:—"The University enjoys the monopoly of instruction in nearly the same manner that the courts of law enjoy that of justice, and the army that of the public defence. The University is nothing more or less than government applied to the universal direction of public instruction, to the municipal colleges as well as to those of the state, to private schools as well as to the colleges, and to country schools in the same manner as to the Faculties themselves." In 1850, M. Beugnot, the reporter of the new law, expressed himself in these terms:—"Whenever liberty shall be triumphant, and competition with the government schools allowed and encouraged, the state, as guardian of the rights and interests of the community at large, will no longer be able to identify itself with these schools. If it continues to support public educational establishments, it will do so for the sake of assisting and not crushing competition, and in order to contribute, according to its own notions, to the general improvement of education; but it will not defend the rights of its own particular establishments more warmly than those of establishments founded by private enterprise, for it is bound to show an equal interest in both, since it has exchanged its office of sole educator of the nation for that of overseer and protector of any person undertaking, in the name of the law, to bestow on youth the boon of education. If the external facts happen to remain the same, the right is changed."

THE CONCORDAT.

"L'Église gallicane renaît par les humilières et la concorde."* Such is the motto of this bas-relief, in which the artist has been tolerably felicitous. Napoleon, standing up, dressed like a Roman emperor, is drawing Catholicism and France towards each another, and obliging them to grasp each other's hand. Around the principal group the people are represented as praying and raising the cross from the ground where it has been suffered to lie.

* The Church of France springs into life again by intelligence and concord.

The name "Concordat" was given to a convention concluded the 15th July, 1801, between the pope, Pius VII., and the French government. By this convention the First Consul restored to the Roman Catholic church a portion of the authority which it had lost in France since the year 1789.

The Constituent Assembly had adopted as a principle that the administration of the church ought to be assimilated to that of the state. It had, in consequence, established ecclesiastical districts on the same plan as the administrative districts, and created each department into a diocese. It caused the bishops to be elected by the Faithful in the same way as the civil and judicial magistrates were named by their fellow-citizens. Lastly, it had suppressed the canonical institution, that is to say, the confirmation of the bishops by the pope.

In abolishing this system of the Constituent Assembly, the First Consul had to overcome numerous obstacles both at Paris and Rome. Most of the men by whom he was surrounded, whether ministers, generals, legislators, or councillors of state, manifested a spirit of opposition towards his endeavours to bring about what he called the reconciliation of the church of Rome with the Republic. Some entreated him not to mix himself up in matters of religion; others wished him to found a French church independent of Rome, and of which he, as first magistrate, would have been the head; while others strongly advised him to draw France over to Protestantism by himself abjuring the Roman Catholic faith. He rejected the advice of all these persons, braved the disapprobation of his companions in arms, and likewise resisted the efforts made by those at Rome to obtain more concessions from him than he had resolved to accord.

It was only after a series of long and difficult negotiations that both parties were enabled to come to an agreement. The following is the entire text of the Concordat, which people so often cite without ever having had the opportunity of reading, and which is still, with the exception of a few unimportant modifications, the basis of the legislation of France in matters concerning the Roman Catholic religion.

Convention between the French Government and His Holiness Pius VII.

"The government of the French Republic acknowledges the Apostolic Roman Catholic religion to be that of the great majority of the French people.

"His Holiness, on his part, acknowledges that this religion has already derived, and still expects, the greatest advantages and most brilliant results from the establishment of the Roman Catholic ritual in France, and from the especial fact of the consuls of the Republic professing it.

"Therefore, as a consequence of this mutual acknowledgment, both for the good of religion and the maintenance of the internal tranquillity of the Republic, they have agreed to the following Articles:—

"1. The Apostolic Roman Catholic religion will be freely followed in France; its rites will be publicly celebrated in conformity with the police regulations which the government may judge necessary for the public tranquillity.

"2. The Holy See, in conjunction with the government, will proceed to a new circumscription of the French dioceses.

"3. His Holiness will declare to the titularies of the French bishoprics that he expects from them, with the most entire confidence, for the sake of peace and unity, every kind of sacrifice, including even the resignation of their sees.

"After this exhortation, if they should refuse to make the sacrifice enjoined for the good of the Church (a refusal, however, which his Holiness does not expect), the government of the circumscription will be confided to other titularies in the following manner:—

"1. The first consul of the Republic will, in the course of the three months following the publication of his Holiness's bull, appoint persons to the archbishoprics and bishoprics of the new circumscription. His Holiness, in conformity with the forms established for France previous to the change of government, will institute canonically the persons thus appointed.

"5. The nominations to the bishoprics which may subsequently fall vacant, will also be made by the first consul, and the persons appointed will be canonically instituted by the Holy See in conformity with the preceding article.

"6. Before entering on their office, the bishops will, in the presence of the first consul himself, take the oaths of fidelity in use before the change of government and expressed in the following terms: 'I swear and promise to God, upon the Holy Evangelists, obedience and fidelity to the government established by the constitution of the French Republic. I likewise promise to have no communications, to take part in no council, and to enter into no league, either at home or abroad, inimical to the public tranquillity; and if I learn that, either in my diocese or elsewhere, there is any plot prejudicial to the state, I will make the government acquainted with the fact.'

"7. The ecclesiastics of the second class will take the same oaths in the presence of the civil authorities named for that purpose by the government.

"8. The following form of prayer will be recited at the conclusion of Divine worship in all the Roman Catholic churches of France (here follows the form of prayer).

"9. The bishops will make a new circumscription of the parishes of their dioceses, but this new circumscription will only be put into effect after having received the consent of government.

"10. The bishops will nominate persons to the various livings. They will only be allowed to choose persons approved of by the government.

"11. The bishops may have a chapter in their cathedral and a seminary in their diocese, but the government does not engage to endow them.

"12. All metropolitan, cathedral, parish, and other churches, not already alienated, and necessary for the celebration of public worship, will be placed at the disposal of the bishops.

"13. For the sake of tranquillity and the happy re-establishment of religion, his Holiness declares that neither he nor his successors will in any way disturb the persons who have acquired alienated ecclesiastical estates, and that consequently the right to the said estates, together with the privileges and revenues attached to them, shall remain incommutable in their possession or that of their assigns.

"14. The government engages to make a suitable provision for the bishops and curés whose dioceses and parishes shall be contained within the limits of the new circumscription.

"15. The government will also take measures to enable French Roman Catholics, if they choose, to make endowments in favour of the Church.

"16. His Holiness recognises in the first consul of the French Republic the same rights and prerogatives enjoyed at the Papal Court by the former government.

"17. It is agreed by the contracting parties that in the case of any one of the successors of the first consul not being a Roman Catholic, the rights and prerogatives mentioned in the preceding article, as well as the power of nominating the bishops, will, as far as such success or is concerned, be regulated by a new convention.

"This convention will be ratified at Paris, by the two contracting parties, within the space of forty days.

"Done at Paris, the 26th Messidor, year 11."

Some years afterwards, on the occasion of his coronation, Napoleon addressed the following words to a Protestant deputation, which had been admitted to an interview:—

"I wish it to be distinctly understood, that it is my intention and fixed resolution to maintain full liberty of religion. The empire of the law finishes where the empire of the conscience begins; neither the law nor the reigning sovereign can effect anything against this kind of liberty; such are my principles and those of the nation."

THE CODE NAPOLEON.

In none of his bas-reliefs has Mons. Sarrasol depicted an investing figure of the Emperor with a nobler and better conceived air of grandeur than in this one. The figure is indeed that of a legislator, animated solely by the sentiment of right and justice. Napoleon is stretching his hands over tablets borne by figures personifying the common law and the Roman law, as if he would seize, and then unite in one vast whole, the laws destined to form the code which bears his name, and which a nobly imagined figure is bearing proudly beside him. Underneath his feet is the following inscription:—"Mon seul code, par sa simplicité, a fait plus de bien en France que la masse de toutes les lois qui l'ont précédé."

It is well known in what a state of confusion French legislation was previous to 1789. In spite of the innumerable labours of several of the first lawyers of the time, the multiplicity of ordinances, regulations, precedents, and jurisdictions, presented to the mind a very labyrinth of confusion.

The Constitution of 1791 had announced that a civil code, destined to be employed in all parts of the French territory, was in course of compilation.

On the 30th of April, 1791, Cambacérès presented to the assembly a project of codification, which the assembly threw out. This did not discourage Cambacérès, who returned to the charge, and presented his colleagues with two other codes, that of the 23rd Frimaire of the year 2, and that of the 21th Prairial of the year 4; but he was not more fortunate in these last two instances than he had been in the first.

On the 12th of August, 1800 (24 Thermidor, year 8), the consuls named a commission, charged with examining the measures taken, up to that time, for realising the wish of the Constitution of 1791, as well as with drawing up a plan and with discussing and preparing the various elements of a new code. This commission was composed of Messrs. Bigot-Préaumeu, Tronchet, Portalis, and Malleville.

In four months their plan was drawn up, and submitted to the Tribunal de Cassation and to the Tribunaux d'Appel. It was then discussed in the legislative section of the Council of State, and also in the general assembly of the same body. Lastly, in conformity with the prescriptions of the Constitution of the year 8, it was taken to the Legislative Body and the Tribunalate.

The various laws composing the code civil, to the number of fifty-six, after having been first decreed one by one, and separately rendered executory, were collected into one whole, under the title of Code Civil des Français, by the law of the 30th Ventôse, year 12.

At the present day, the Code Civil is considered, and with justice, as one of the greatest things ever accomplished by the French Revolution and the consulate; but this important work was, at first, far from being received with enthusiasm or even approbation. For instance, the plan of the Code Civil was sharply criticised in the Tribunalate. Among the members who opposed its adoption with the greatest warmth were Messrs. Andrieux, Benjamin Constant, Chénier, Ginguiné, Thiessé, Fyvaud, and Siméon. It was reproachfully stigmatised as being a mere hurried compilation of the Roman or common law, of the institutes of Justinian, of Donat, of Potbier, and others. Persons obstinately refused to see in it a great and new creation, peculiar to French society. Mons. Portalis and his colleagues, in the work replied, according to Mons. Thiessé:—"That, in the matter of legislation, originality was not so important as clearness, justice, and wisdom; that they had not to create a new system of society, like Moses or Lycurgus, but to reform an old one, in a few points, and restore it in many others; that French law had been in operation for ten centuries; that it was the result of Roman learning, of the feudal system, of monarchy, and of the spirit of modern times, all combined and acting in concert during a long series of years upon French manners; that the civil law of France, a sublime monument of human reason, ought to be rendered suitable to a new society which had been called to be organised, and because it was necessary, for instance, to modify the old laws in marriage, on paternal authority, and on the rights of inheritance, to free them from all that was opposed to the present state, that it was necessary to purify the law, to bring to property of everything, and to feudal servitude ; to draw up the whole body of prescriptions in clear and precise words, that would no longer afford scope for ambiguity and interminable disputes, and to arrange them in a convenient order ; this," they said, "was the only monument they had to raise." In spite of these remarks, the first portions of the code were rejected by the Tribunate, and the government withdrew the bill. But in June, 1802, Napoleon, who was then first consul, caused the drawing up of the Code

Civil to be resumed. A section of the Council of State and a section of the Tribunal used to meet daily for the purpose of carrying out the work, at the house of the Consul Cambacères. Opposition was now out of the question, and the will of the first consul no longer met with any obstacle to thwart it.

It is well known that Napoleon himself assisted at the discussion of the code in the Council of State (towards the end of 1801). "Present at each of the sittings," says his historian, "he displayed, as president, an amount of methodical arrangement and clearness, and oftentimes views so profound, as to prove matter of astonishment to every one. Having been accustomed to direct armies and govern conquered provinces, no one had been surprised at finding him to be a good administrator, for every good general must necessarily be so; but it certainly was allowable to wonder that he was a good legislator. His education, in this branch of knowledge, had been quickly completed. Taking an interest in everything because he understood everything, he had asked the Consul Cambacères for some books on law, and particularly for the materials prepared in the time of the Convention for the purpose of drawing up the Code Civil. He actually devoured them. Shortly afterwards, classifying in his head the general principles of the civil law, and adding to these few notions rapidly picked up his profound knowledge of mankind, and his extraordinary clearness of perception, he was enabled to direct in person a work of such importance, and to enrich the discussion with a large number of just, new, and profound ideas. Sometimes a superficial knowledge of the matter rendered him liable to defend strange notions, but he readily allowed himself to be led back to the right path by the learned professional men around him, and invariably proved himself superior to them all whenever it was necessary to draw from the conflict of contrary opinions the most natural and most reasonable conclusion. The principal service rendered by the first consul was his contributing to the completion of this grand monument a strong will, and the most determined resolution to work, by which he was enabled to overcome the two difficulties under which all previous efforts had succumbed, namely, the infinite diversity of opinions and the impossibility of working with anything like a continuance, in the midst of the agitated state of matters at that time. Whenever the discussion, as was often the case, had been long, diffuse, and obstinate, the first consul knew how to sum it up and decide it by a single word; and, besides this, he obliged every one to work, by working himself for days together. The reports of these remarkable sittings were published, but before sending them to the Moniteur the Consul Cambacères always carefully revised them and suppressed what he deemed inexpedient to publish, either because the first consul sometimes gave utterance to singular opinions, or treated questions of morality with a familiarity of language which was not intended to go beyond the limits of a confidential sitting. All, therefore, that remained in the reports were the ideas, sometimes rectified, often discoloured, but always striking, of the first consul."

As we already know, the collection of laws adopted in these sittings was promulgated in the year 12 of the Republic, under the title of the Code Civil des Français. On the 3rd September, 1807, there was a decree commanding a new edition of them to be drawn up under the name of the Code Napoléon.

"Our Code Civil," said Mons. de Goltzky, in 1843, "still governs Belgium, a large portion of Germany, and several of the Italian states; it is once more being revived in Sardinia, where it had been abolished, and is on the point of becoming, in conjunction with the Roman law, the basis of a new system of legislation in that country. Our commercial code is imitated and perfected in Spain and Portugal. Our penal code became the model of that of Sicily in 1819, of that of Parma in 1820, and of that of Rome in 1832, and this great work, the subject of such frequent accusations, throws its rays as far as over the code of the Brazils. Bavaria is establishing in regenerated Greece our judicial organisation and our criminal law. England herself is abandoning the uncertainties of her common and statute law, and banishing from her system the cruel but inefficacious disregard of human life. We are enabled to applaud the reform, undertaken in 1825, thanks to the efforts of Peel and Landsdowne, and ardently carried out by the recent acts of parliament. We shall observe the same movement in the States of the American Union. Holland and Denmark are enriching themselves with new laws, and Russia itself, not being able to codify its ancient ukases, turns them into pandectes."

THE FOUNDATION OF THE COUNCIL OF STATE.

Napoleon, seated in all the calm and serenity of his immense power, is drawing towards him scholars, philosophers, and magistrates, to whom he says:—"Coopérez aux desseins que je forme pour la prospérité des peuples." *

Behind the throne, a winged figure, his familiar genius doubtless, is whispering something into his ear and appears to be advising him. This personage, that has no equivalent in the symmetry of the composition, produces a strange effect, and injures the equilibrium of the general outline, which is in other respects remarkable for its character of grandeur and elevated style.

"Previous to 1789," says a well-known writer, "the Council of State reflected, as in a mirror, the confusion that reigned in the various branches of the administration of public affairs. It took part in government and politics by its intervention in foreign affairs, financial questions, and commerce; in the execution of the law, by its regulations concerning the judges, its evocations and its annulment of judgments; and in the public administration, by the jurisdiction it exercised over the ordinances of the Intendants, and the decisions of the Cour des Aides, and the Cour des Comptes. But if it encroached upon the dominion of Justice, Justice, in her turn, disputed with it the possession of its own powers, and while she deprived it of any share in contentions purely judicial, obtained for herself, by means of the decrees of the parliaments, a share in matters of administration. What, at that period, composed the Council of State, was nothing but the union of five separate councils, forming as many distinct bodies. The law, the church, the army, and finance were all collected there.

During the French revolution, various laws weakened or changed the Council of State.

A consular decree of the 6th Nivôse, in the year 8, regulated the organisation of the Council of State, and confided to it the task: 1stly, of developing the signification of the laws on their being submitted to its judgment by the consuls; and 2ndly, of deciding in all disputes which might arise between the administrative and judicial authorities, and on all subjects of contention which had previously been sent to the ministers for decision.

These functions were successively extended by various decrees and senatus-consulta.

Under the consulate and the empire, the Council of State became a constitutional power. It drew up the laws, discussed them when brought before the Legislative Body, and interpreted them when passed. Functionaries of the highest rank, summoned before the committees chosen from among its members, were called upon to render an account of their conduct; the various persons connected with it, from the councillors of state themselves down to the simple auditors, were charged with the most important missions, administering the affairs of conquered countries, organising their finances and drawing up their codes. Men of the greatest consideration were summoned to take part in its deliberations, and esteemed themselves honoured by belonging to it. Subjected to the superior authority of this powerful body, exposed to its censure and almost entirely under its control, the ministers occupied only the second rank in the administrative hierarchy.

The Council of State ranked after the Senate and before the Legislative Body. It held its sittings in the palace of the Tuileries, near the Emperor's own cabinet. "There," says the author of "Questions Administratives," "appeared, in all their splendour, Cambacères, the most didactic of legislators and the most able of presidents; Tronchet, the most learned of European jurists; Treillard, the most nervous dialectician of the council; Portalis, celebrated for his eloquence; Ségur, for his graceful turn of thought; Zangiacomi, for the sharp conciseness of his words; Allent, for the depth of his attainments; Dandon, for his erudition in all the matters of administration; Chauvelin, sparkling with unexpected sallies; Cuvier, famous for his strong reason and universal knowledge; Pasquier, who was so mild; Boulay, so judicious; Béranger, so cutting, so close in his reasoning, and so witty; Berlier, so profound and so copious; De Gérando, so skilled in the science of administrative law; and Andréossi, in engineering; Saint-Cyr, in military strategy; Regnault de Saint-d'Angely, that brilliant orator, consummate publicist, and indefatigable worker; Bernadotte, at present King of Sweden; and Jourdan, the conqueror of Fleurus."

ORGANIZATION OF THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION.

On this bas-relief is the following inscription: "Sans l'ordre l'administration n'est qu'un chaos."*

It is a difficult task to explain the manner in which the artist has endeavoured to express this idea. If his other compositions speak plainly to the eyes, this one appears lost in an allegory as incomplete in its execution as it is obscure in its conception.

Napoleon, seated in his unvarying and rather monotonous attitude, holds in one hand the helm of state, and in the other the fasces of empire. He is summoning to him Justice, armed with a torch and a pair of scales, Truth bearing her mirror, and Plenty, her distinctive attribute. But these figures, grouped somewhat at hazard, do not strike us in any way connected with the subject intended to be represented.

Before 1789 the administration of affairs in France was one of the most complicated description. Through the immense multitude of functionaries, or agents, and the great variety of administrative divisions into which the country was parcelled out, it was almost impossible to discern any kind of unity either in the plan or actions of the government; France was divided, in what regarded its ecclesiastical constitution, into eighteen archbishoprics; financially, into thirty-two intendancies and generalities; politically, into sixteen parliamentary districts and other sovereign courts; and militarily, into forty general provincial governments.

The councils, in which the great affairs of state were discussed, were: the King's Council, the Council of the Despatches, the Royal Council of Finance, the Royal Council of Commerce, the Private Council of State, or des Partis, and the Grand Chancellery of France.

In ordinary matters, justice was administered in the castellanies, provostships, viguierhips, and other royal and seigniorial courts, forming the inferior class; and in the bailiwicks, seneschals' courts, and presidials, which were the middling or intermediate courts. Lastly, important matters were carried before the parliaments, or royal councils, and other superior tribunals. In 1789, there were in the kingdom thirteen parliaments holding their sittings in Paris, Toulouse, Grenoble, Bordeaux, Dijon, Rouen, Aix, Rennes, Pau, Metz, Douay, Besançon, and Nancy. To these we must add other institutions possessing the same authority as the parliaments, such as the Provincial Council of Artois, and the Sovereign Councils of Alsace, at Colmar, and of Roussillon, at Perpignan. The Parliament of Paris was composed of six chambers. Lastly, above all these magistracies, there were still two other tribunals; the Grand Council, and the Provostship of the King's Household. Several branches of the administration had separate tribunals; for instance, in the matter of taxes, there were the tribunals of the Treasurers of France, the Cour des Aides for the aids, tallies, and gabelles, besides many others.

The administrative and judicial organisation adopted by the French Revolution is as simple as that which it succeeded was complex and diffuse. France, divided into departments and arrondissements, is administered according to the same system by a number of agents, all corresponding, through their various ranks, with one another, and with the centre, where a few ministers, at the head of the administration, are grouped in council around the head of the state, who, at every instant, is immediately informed of everything which takes place through the whole length and breadth of the country, and who, so to speak, from the cabinet in which he works, sees all the superior and subordinate administrative authorities, from the capital to the frontiers, performing their various tasks with almost mathematical regularity. Such is the plan traced out and perfected by the republican assemblies, and more especially brought into practice by the first consul. This plan has been compared to that of the spider's web, where the slightest shock given to one of the threads, even the most remote, is communicated to the centre with electric rapidity. There is no doubt that so beautiful and harmonious a system is open to abuses; but such perfect regularity does not necessarily exclude the possibility of real independence in each separate part of this kind of network, and on no hypothesis can a state of confusion and disorder, where it is lawful for the subordinate agents of the administration to turn to the profit of their own passions and interests the kind of veil which conceals them from the eye of the superior authorities, be considered as tending less to favour abuses.

PACIFICATION OF CIVIL TROUBLES.

This subject terminates the series, and closes the train of ideas by which art has undertaken the mission of expressing the dominant characteristics of the emperor's reign. Napoleon is crushing with his foot a man on the ground, who probably is intended to personify Anarchy; while, in obedience to the emperor's voice, France returns her sword to its scabbard, Religion resumes her rights, and Youth returns to the arms of Wisdom. The execution of this composition is heavy, and the figures are altogether deficient in character and grandeur.

THE CARYATIDES.

Twelve marble pillars, enormous blocks of stone, brought at a great expense from Carrara, support the crypt. Out of these blocks twelve caryatides, each about sixteen feet high, were sculptured by Mons. Pradier.

Caryatides are generally draped female statues, placed as supports or ornaments beneath the architraves of buildings. The following is their origin, according to Vitruvius: Caria, in the Peloponnesus, having been taken and ruined by the other Greeks, conquerors of the Persians, with whom the Carians had formed a league, the men were put to the edge of the sword, and the women carried away into slavery, in which state the most noble among them were compelled still to wear their long robes and ornaments. At a later period, in order to perpetuate the recollection of their treason and their punishment, the Grecian architects substituted, in several public edifices, figures of Carian women for the usual pilasters and columns.

In our modern architecture, caryatides do not always represent slaves; they are often, like those now before us, statues symbolical of the several sciences and arts, or of some divinity or other taken from the domain of Fable, but they have invariably preserved their original destination.

The caryatides of the Emperor's tomb represent figures of Victory bearing palm branches and wreaths. Two only, one on each side of the opening of the door, hold in their hands a bunch of keys; they are there as the guardians of the tomb, and their proud attitude forms a striking contrast with the calm and devotional repose of the ten others.

These caryatides are not all equally impressed with the marks of a large and grandiose style of execution. Two or three are very fine, and correspond with the grandeur of the subject and the majesty of the place, but some, on the other hand, are unworthy of their object and the name of the artist who furnished the models. We must here mention that each caryatis, together with the pillar against which it is placed, consists of a single block. This circumstance, which cannot escape the observation of connoisseurs, imparts an air of great magnificence to the mausoleum, and gives it that peculiar character of grandeur which is found in the gigantic constructions of Egypt and ancient Nineveh.

* Without order every system of administration is but a chaos.

THE MOSAICS.

The whole space between the base of the caryatides and the foot of the sarcophagus is occupied by an admirable piece of mosaic, representing a system of rays of the colour of bright gold, which seem to spring from a colossal wreath of laurels. The inner circle of this mosaic forms a band, on which are incrustated the immortal names of Marengo, Rivoli, the Pyramids, Jena, Austerlitz, Friedland, and several other places.

tion, comes from the workshops of Messrs. Ciuli and Scagnoli.

We know that the origin of mosaics is very ancient; their great merit consists in their uniting brilliancy to solidity. The architects of Greece were constantly in the habit of employing them. Thanks to a marvellous kind of glaze called pouzzolane, made partly of lime and partly of a reddish volcanic earth found principally at Pouzzoles, the Italian artists have succeeded in imparting to their mosaics a degree of solidity which bids fair to defy the destructive effects of time.

ENTRANCE TO THE RELIQUARY.

In order to give the mosaic a brilliancy corresponding with the extraordinary splendour of the materials employed in the construction of the mausoleum, the richest enamels have been employed in its formation, so that we may justly affirm that it would be impossible to find, even among the precious relics of antiquity, anything displaying more brilliant and more intense colours. The wreath of laurels possesses all the vigour of a fine painting.

This beautiful specimen of an art which produced such marvels in the ingenious and able hands of the old Roman artists, and which offers such resources to modern decora-

THE SARCOPHAGUS.

Exactly in the centre of the mosaic stands the sarcophagus, composed of so-called Finland porphyry, placed upon a pedestal of Corsican granite. It is of the most imposing simplicity, and consists of the receptacle for the body and the cover, without any ornaments save rounded arrises and scrollwork of severe regularity. By the effect of contrast, the red tone of the porphyry stands out with majestic vigour on the bright green of the wreath of laurels.

used in the same way as it is employed in a mahogany coffin, which is supported by two or three pieces of hard lead; these in their turn are placed within the cavity of the sarcophagus in the form of a shell the 17th December 1841.

The sarcophagus is formed with gray Brecon granite. Moved by a feeling of national superiority, the architect adopted this means to prevent the body of the French sovereign from being already exposed on marble.

The stone of which the sarcophagus is formed is not a homogeneous material termed porphyry, it is composed of quartz crystals which are lighter than real porphyry, will prove less durable. This stone which was brought by the greatest caravans from the Sahak has its quarries in the neighbourhood of St. Flourburgh, all not less than 2000 miles before it reached Paris. Its grain is so hard that a workman employed in sawing it had not been enabled, at the end of ten months, to make an incision as deep as the blade of his saw. It was necessary to have recourse to a greater power than that of the hammer and Mens. Simon, a skilful marble-worker, being on the idea of employing a steam-engine for sawing and polishing the surface of it.

The top of the sarcophagus formed a plane slab of this rich stone weighing 10000 lbs.

All beneath this is the large opening in the pavement of the church, the side which the sarcophagus appears with its admirable paintings and its dimly penetrating light which only reaches the sarcophagus, the opening stands through the floor and under the steps and their funeral crepes.

THE SARCOPHAGUS OF NAPOLEON.

On reascending the gallery we have yet to visit the sword tomb which is a monument of the same moment, collected there has also been termed the red quarry.

It is a small chamber lined with white marble. At the farther end is raised a marble statue of Napoleon in his imperial costume, grasping his sceptre in one hand and the globe in the other; these two distinctive signs of sovereignty were, as likewise the emblem of his mantle, are gilt. Behind the statue, a small porphyry pedestal has been raised, upon it is a small bronze vase made in the shape of a caudon. This contains a few drops which belong to the emperor, namely his little token hat of Austerlitz, his epaulettes, and his orders. The sword of Austerlitz and the crown of gold brought by the town of Brest are also placed upon the pedestal.

To the right and left is a table to receive the obsequies by an inscription of the year. These were originally supported the obsequies saved at the Luxembourg by the patriotism of Mens. de Simonville.

In the wall are inscribed the names of the bodies which Napoleon commanded in person.

The pavement which is lined with marble contains four niches for preventing the four principal attributes of imperial power, namely, the sceptre, the hand of justice, the sword, and the diadem itself.

All round, lamp flames night and day in the gallery, but the light is not allowed to enter and which is gradually brought down through the ornaments of the gilt bronze grates.

Every year, on the 6th of May, the anniversary of the Emperor Napoleon's death, a funeral mass will be celebrated at the altar of the dome church. On this occasion, all the lamps, of the stars as well as in the crypt, will send forth a soft flame.

The monument raised to the memory of the Emperor Napoleon reaches the spectator by the prodigious magnitude of the materials employed in its construction. We have seen people who described it as having successfully that the height of the building are 100 feet high, and made of a solid block of the black marble of the Pyrenees; that the steps of the altar were numbered and laid out in a way which would make more than three blocks of white Carrara marble that could be taken to the quarry, together that with the pillar against which it is placed, the complete of a single block of Carrara marble, 100 feet high, 10 feet broad, and more than 100 feet thick. This great splendour imparts a most imposing appearance to the general aspect of the tomb, and prevents the eye from straying, without an attentive examination, the details of details and composition which we have pointed out in the bas-reliefs and the Caryatides.

No less than twelve years have been required for this great work.

In 1841 the Chamber of Deputies voted a grant of 2400000 for the purpose of transferring the mortal remains of the emperor to France. This sum having proved insufficient, a supplementary grant was voted by the law of the 10th June 1841. In reply to the following words pronounced from the tribune, on the 10th of May, 1841, by Mens. Roussin, minister of the interior—"Any monument France may raise in memory of the emperor should be simple in its beauty, grand in its form, and, in its appearance, of a solidity that nothing could ever disturb. Napoleon should have a monument as durable as the form of his deeds"—the Chambers, by the same law of the 10th June, granted 2000000 for the construction of the tomb.

Artists were publicly solicited to send in plans; eighty-two did so. Mens. Visconti's idea of placing the sarcophagus below the level of the ground, in a crypt lighted from the dome, was the only one not conceived an objection to the decided resolution of the government to reject every kind of external mausoleum which would have the effect of destroying the monumental character of the Dome-Church.

The plan was adopted; it became the greatest difficulty of the government programme, which imperiously insisted that the tomb should be placed beneath the dome; for we must not forget that this position had been irrevocably decided on by the Chambers, and M. Visconti's plan, while averring all the exigencies of the case, allowed the greatest scope to the architect, without in any way interfering with the aspect of the interior of the edifice such as it was conceived by Louis XIV.

CHARLES-BOURBONNAIN'S SKETCHES OF THE PRINCIPAL ARTISTS MENTIONED IN THIS NOTICE.

CHARLES-BOURBONNAIN MANSART was born at Paris, in the year 1740. His father, also, was named Jules-Harism, and had married a sister of the Francois-Mansart whom we have had occasion to mention in the first portion of this notice, and who was next painter to his Majesty. The young Charles was placed under his uncle's care to learn his profession. He profited so well by the instruction he received, and was endued with so delicate and agreeable a turn of mind, that he was fortunate enough to please the king, Louis XIV., who confided to him the most important architectural works undertaken during his reign. Pleased of the favour of his sovereign, and naturally desirous of progressing, Mansart succeeded in inspiring the king with that taste for building with which posterity has so often reproached him, and which was the cause of such vast sums of the public money being expended. Among Mansart's works may be mentioned the chateau of Marly, the Grand Trianon, and the chapel of the Maison de Saint-Cyr, the Place Vendôme, and the Place des Victoires, the church of Notre-Dame at Versailles, and the chateau of Vaux, of Dampierre, and of Longjumeau. But what most certainly set the seal upon his reputation was his erection of the Château de Versailles and the dome church of the Hotel de Invalides. It is very rarely that any architect has so many buildings of such immense magnitude confided to him. Mansart did not, however, always satisfy the expectations entertained of him. With regard to the chateau de Versailles, however, for which he has been severely criticised, we must not reproach him with the design of the situation, nor the aridity of the soil on which the palace stands; and if the various buildings which form the exterior of the chateau on the same side as the Cour de Marie represent a mean and disagreeable contrast with the mass of the chateau, then, the necessity the architect was under of preserving that portion of the palace erected in the time of Louis XIII. may in some degree excuse him. On the garden side, however, he had nothing to shake his ideas, and therefore has no excuse. When viewed at a short distance only, the edifice produces an imposing effect by the immense extent of its lines; but when viewed from a long distance, its uniformity becomes fatiguing. It is a square building, flanked by two long wings, in a cramped style of architecture, full of projections, but without any contrast or opposition in its different parts, so that, at a certain distance, it resembles nothing more nor less than a long uniform wall. It is in the interior, however, that its defects are peculiarly apparent. The staircase is placed very far from the entrance, and in such an out-of-the-way corner that the visitor is obliged to employ a guide to point it out. At the top of the staircase there is no vestibule nor reception room; there are merely two or three small chambers conducting, at an angle, to an ante-room that is but half-lighted. There is no regular communication between the apartments, and in order to pass from one to the other, it is necessary to go first up and then down several small flights of stairs. Many of the details, however, are very beautiful, and among the buildings belonging to, although not actually forming part of, the palace itself, we may mention the orangery, an edifice ornamented with columns of the Tuscan order, grand and noble, yet, at the same time, extremely simple. If historians are to be believed, however, the plan is not due to Mansart. It is said that Louis XIV., being far from pleased with the plans which Mansart had submitted to him, asked Lenôtre for one. Lenôtre at first excused himself, on the plea that he was not at all familiar with this department of architecture; but his majesty having again pressed him, Lenôtre made a sketch which pleased the king extremely, and which Mansart was ordered to carry into execution, after having modified it in certain particulars. The chapel of Versailles, ornamented with isolated Corinthian columns, is very elegant and admirably planned, but the architect appears to have been cramped for space. It was his last work; in fact he did not live to complete it.

* See also M. de la Harpe's account of the engraving in France.

For constructing the dome-church of the Hôtel des Invalides, Mansart received the order of Saint Michael from Louis XIV., he and Lenôtre being the first artists thus honoured. The great works with which he was continually being entrusted, and the constant favour of Louis XIV., enabled him to amass a considerable fortune. It has been said that, in order to please the king, Mansart was in the habit of employing means that would have done honour to the most subtle courtier; for instance, in his plans he would leave such absurd mistakes that the king discovered them at the first glance, whereupon Mansart would go into ecstasies about the profundity of the king's knowledge of the subject, and with such an appearance of simple and innocent candour, that the king was completely his dupe.

Mansart had many enemies, who did all in their power to ruin him in the estimation of the king. At last, they thought that they had hit upon a plan which could not possibly fail. Mansart was acquainted with a female, who robbed him of an order for 50,000 francs which the king had given him for some of the royal works on which he was then employed. The order was taken to Louis XIV., with the remark that it was thus that his Superintendent of Buildings used the funds confided to him for very different purposes. Unable to believe Mansart guilty, Louis XIV. summoned him to his presence. The architect had already discovered his loss; he confessed the whole truth, and had not much difficulty in proving his innocence to the king, who, to show his confidence in him, gave him back the order that had been stolen, and caused another of the same value to be sent to him, so certain was he that the money would not be badly employed.

Mansart was endowed with a very prolific genius. His conceptions are generally full of nobleness and grandeur; but his style is not chaste: he very often allows himself a license which has not always the advantage of producing a beautiful result. He died rather suddenly at Marly, the 11th May, 1708. His body was transported to Paris, and buried in the church of St. Paul, which was also that of his parish. His tomb, sculptured by Coysevox, was, during the first French revolution, removed to one of the rooms of the Musée des Monuments Français. In 1818, however, it was transferred to one of the churches of Paris.

ANTOINE COYSEVOX was born of Spanish parents, at Lyons, in the year 1649. Before he was seventeen, he had established his reputation in his native town by a statue of the Virgin which he executed. He then went to Paris, and worked under Lerambert and other masters, with whom he made the most rapid progress. He was scarcely twenty-seven when he was selected by the Cardinal de Fürstenberg to go to Alsatia, and decorate his palace at Saverne. This work occupied him four years, at the expiration of which period he returned to Paris. He first executed a pedestrian statue of Louis XIV., with the two bas-reliefs of the pedestal, for the courtyard of the Hôtel de Ville, but they were all destroyed in the first Revolution. He then received an order from the States of Brittany for an equestrian bronze statue of the same king, fifteen feet high. In order to carry out this work with the same amount of perfection with which he had conceived it, he sent for sixteen or seventeen of the finest horses out of the royal stables, selected the best portions of each horse, and, after long studying their movements, imitated them. It is to this spirit of persevering industry that we owe most of Coysevox's finest productions. Our limits prevent our mentioning all his works; we will content ourselves with naming the tombs of Mazarin, Colbert, and Charles Lebrun. Most of his works fell a sacrifice to the vandalism of the first revolution, but those we still possess are quite sufficient to ensure his fame. He died at Paris, the 10th October, 1720.

NOËL COYPEL was born at Paris, the 25th December, 1628. He learned the elements of his art from an obscure master of the name of Guillerie, under whom he made such rapid progress, that, at the early age of eighteen, he was selected to work on the scenes of "Orpheus," a piece brought out at the Grand Opera. From this time forward he was almost always employed in the royal palaces. In 1655, he executed several works for the Oratory and the king's chamber, and also ornamented with the productions of his pencil the apartment of Cardinal Mazarin. It was he, too, who, on the occasion of Louis XIV.'s marriage, painted the ceilings of the queen's apartment in the Louvre, several rooms in the Tuileries, and several in the palace of Fontainebleau. In 1663, he was received a member of the Académie Royale de Peinture, the picture he painted on that occasion being "The Death of Abel," which was greatly admired. After several years of untiring artistic activity, Coypel was named by the king Director of the Academy of Rome. During his directorship he painted four pictures, which for a long time formed the principal attraction of the guardroom of the queen's guards at Versailles. These pictures represent "Solon," "Trajan," "Alexander," "Severus," and "Ptolemy Philadelphos." The first was engraved by Duchange, and the three others by Charles Dupuis. Having been compelled by the disastrous wars of the latter part of his reign to limit the expenses of the crown, Louis XIV. abolished the office of First Painter to the King at Mignard's death, but to make some amends to Coypel for not bestowing the place on him, created him Perpetual Director of the Academy, with an annual pension of a thousand crowns. Coypel was seventy-seven years old when he painted his two grand pictures of the "Assumption," which are so greatly admired, over the altar of the church of the Hôtel des Invalides. He died two years afterwards, at Paris, on the 24th December, 1707. He was twice married, and had four children by his second wife.

Coypel was not always correct in the drawing of his figures, which he sometimes endowed with a somewhat too theatrical air, besides often being far from exact in matters of costume; but these faults are generally redeemed by his magnificent colouring and the vastness and grandeur of his composition, the style of which bears some similarity to that of Lebrun. He was equally at home in sacred and profane history, and had made an especial study of perspective and anatomy. To distinguish him from his sons, who were also painters, Coypel was commonly called by amateurs, Coypel le Poussin. We possess some excellent works by him on the principles of painting and colouring, and also his portrait, painted by himself, and engraved by J. Audran.

JEAN JOUVENET was born at Rouen, on the 21st August, 1617. He received the first lessons in his art from his father; but the latter, soon perceiving that he could teach him nothing more, sent him to Paris, where, alone and without a master, but with nature as his guide, he prosecuted his studies with the greatest ardour. His first efforts were successful; and this so mortified a jealous rival, that he wrote to Jouvenet's parents to say that their son, instead of applying himself to his art, was losing his time, and ruining his health, in debauchery and vice. On this, Jouvenet received a letter, ordering him instantly to return home. The young man was justly indignant; but, conscious of his innocence, sent, as answer, the last picture he had painted: this opened his father's eyes, and Jouvenet was allowed to remain in Paris. Not long afterwards, he achieved a brilliant triumph by his picture of the "Curing of the Paralytic." He was hardly twenty-nine years old when he executed it; but the boldness of design, the vigour of touch, and the grandeur of composition displayed in it, revealed the finished artist. By the kindness and protection of Lebrun, Jouvenet was received a member of the Académie de Peinture, in 1655; and from this moment his reputation was firmly established; indeed, he could scarcely find time to execute the different pictures required of him. Jouvenet became a special favourite with Louis XIV., who granted him an annual pension, and loaded him with many other marks of his protection. In 1713, he became paralyzed, in consequence of a severe attack of apoplexy. Every remedy was tried in vain, and Jouvenet was obliged to renounce his pencil. But his love for the art was as strong as ever; and, not being able to work himself, he took a pleasure in directing the efforts of his nephew and pupil, Restout. One day, the young painter could not clearly seize his uncle's idea, who wished him to correct the expression of a face he was painting. Jouvenet takes the pencil, but in endeavouring, with his lame hand, to correct the head, spoils it. In a fit of despair, he endeavours to repair the accident with his left hand; and, to his great astonishment and unspeakable delight, perceives that it obeys, without the slightest effort, the dictates of his will. From this moment his illness is forgotten, and he sets to work again with increased ardour. There is no doubt that the pictures painted in this manner are not so fine as his former ones, but they still possess extraordinary merit. His last work was a "Visitation," known under the name of the "Magnicat," and executed for the choir of the cathedral of Notre Dame. Jouvenet died on the 5th of April, 1717.

That which particularly distinguishes Jouvenet from the other painters of his time, is the vast extent and grand effect of his compositions, the happy arrangements of his groups, and the boldness of his outlines. Although his colouring is wanting in truth, and has a yellowish tint, the knowledge he possessed of chiaro-oscuro imparts peculiar harmony and force to his pictures. His drawing is generally correct, but without revealing any knowledge of the antique; he is heavy, angular, and too often wanting in nobleness; his drapery is free and well-disposed, but it never allows the outline of the naked figure to be perceptible through its folds, and seems rather intended to hide than to cover the personage who wears it. His expression, too, is sometimes weak. In a word, as a general rule, his compositions have something theatrical and symmetrical about them, as if, while producing his effects, he was desirous to conceal from the observation of the spectator his defective knowledge of drawing and his ignorance of beauty of form. We have the more reason to be astonished at this, as it seems in direct contradiction to the principles which he himself professed, and regarding which he thus expressed himself: "Painting should resemble music, and, in order to be without fault, a picture should, by its arrangement and colouring, produce as perfect an accord on the eyes as a well-executed concert does on the ear." Perhaps the defects of this artist are not to be entirely attributed to his character and individual disposition, but to the fact of his never having quitted France.

CHARLES DE LAFOSSE was born in Paris, in the year 1640. His father was a jeweller, who placed him at an early age under Lebrun. His progress was so rapid that in a short time he obtained a pension from the king and the privilege of being sent to Italy. After studying correctness of drawing and grandeur of composition in the Roman school, he proceeded to Venice, where he perfected himself in colouring by meditating carefully and assiduously on the master-pieces of Paul Veronese and Titian. It was in Italy, too, that he learned the art of fresco-painting. On his return to France, whither his reputation had already preceded him, he received orders for various pictures from several persons of note, and among others from Louis XIV. himself, for whom he painted several pictures intended for the palaces of Trianon and Marli. In 1683, he was received into the Académie de Peinture, and, his reputation having extended to England, was invited over, some time afterwards, by Lord Montague, for whom he painted two ceilings in Montague House, which was subsequently known as the British Museum, but has since been pulled down to make room for the present building. These two ceilings represented the "Apotheosis of Isis," and the "Meeting of the Gods." The artist lavished on them all the riches of his genius, and particularly distinguished himself by the poetry of the composition, the magic of the colouring, and the beauty of the arrangement. King Charles II. was so struck with them that he endeavoured to persuade Lafosse to settle permanently in England, promising him considerable advantages and constant occupation in case he did so. But Lafosse refused every inducement held out to him, and hastened back to France, in the hopes of succeeding Lebrun, who was just dead, as First Painter to the King. Lafosse was a great friend of Mansart, in whose house he lived, and for whom he executed sketches of all the pictures for the church of the Hôtel des Invalides. Mansart, through whom he hoped to obtain the office in question and the task of executing all the pictures, happening to die before the matter was decided, Lafosse was not appointed, and was charged with the execution of a part only of the paintings. After Mansart's death, Lafosse took up his abode in the house of an intimate friend of his, Mons. Crezat, for whom he painted, on the ceiling of his gallery, the "Birth of Minerva." He painted, also, a great number of other pieces, and died at Paris, in 1716, without issue.

NICOLAS COUSTOU was born at Lyons, the 9th January, 1658, and came to Paris, at the age of eighteen, to study the art of sculpture under Coysevox, his uncle. He was highly successful, and, after a sojourn in Italy of some time, returned to his native country, where he produced many most beautiful works, remarkable for their purity of form and happiness of conception. His principal defect was a certain want of grandeur. This artist worked at his profession until the age of seventy-six years, and the last of his works, which death did not allow him to finish, is esteemed one of his very best. It is a medallion bearing a bas-relief of the "Passage of the Rhine." Coustou terminated his laborious career on the 1st May, 1733.

WILLIAM COUSTOU, who was even more celebrated than his brother Nicolas, was born at Lyons, in 1678. Like his brother, he studied under Coysevox, and, also, for some time in Italy, and, on his return, was received a member of the Académie Royale. Among his works may be mentioned "Hercules on the Funeral Pile," the figures of the Ocean, the Mediterranean, and the Rhone, and also the pediment of the Chateau d'Eau opposite the Palais Royal. The last, and, perhaps, the finest of his productions, are the two groups now at the entrance to the Champs Elysées. Each group represents a horse rearing up with a man holding it. William Coustou died at Paris, the 22nd February, 1746.

Monsieur VISCONTI, who is one of the first French architects of the present day, has been charged with the completion of the palace of the Louvre. He has also been appointed imperial architect.

NICHOLAS LANCRET.

THERE came a time in France, when Madame Tallicn took the place of Madame de Pompadour, when the petits maîtres and jolly abbés of the court, who had been swept away by the revolutionary storm, reappeared in the shape of gay fops; and the gentlemen, instead of close coats and red heelpieces, walked about in Paris with box coats, cravats, and whiskers trimmed à la Borras. Thenceforward Lancret was no longer talked of. Alas! to fling this amiable painter into oblivion, there was no need of the three Horaces, and of Brutus, and some of Carle Vernet's Invoyables. Watteau might bid defiance to death, when it came, for Watteau was the creator of a branch of painting, the founder of a school. Watteau, in the time of Louis XIV., was a phenomenon; but Lancret, his pupil, who had not altogether the same claims to immortality, was shipwrecked with the old society, whose manners, whose attitudes, and whose graces—sometimes insipid to the verge of the ridiculous—he had faithfully sketched. It would require the advent of an era of eclecticism, like our own, to enable Lancret to shake off the dust of garrets, and to take possession of the drawing-rooms once more. At the present day, there would be no objection made to what we see figuring in a boudoir of the time of Louis XV., over chairs with rounded arms and bedecked with roses—the swing in which Madame la Presidente de B— perches herself in Lancret's gardens.

It would be hard to find a painter who has more faithfully portrayed the features of his own time than Lancret. He entered more fully into its conventionalities, manners, and customs than Watteau, and more fully too than Pater, between which two we shall place him. A clever prose writer, speaking of Watteau, has told us in bad verse, that Dame Nature brought forth the painter of fashionable gaieties for the express purpose of admiring her own portrait in French dress; but he has overlooked the fact, that Watteau had a positive horror of French costume—a horror which it was quite pardonable to entertain, even with regard to the fashions which prevailed in the first half of the seventeenth century—and that this able master always borrows from the wardrobe of the Italian comedy, the garments with which he fits out Mezzino and Pantolon, and adorns the inscrutable folly of Gille. Lancret stands on the boundary between real life and the stage; he verges close upon the vaudeville. Watteau, with his immortal types, and his gay landscapes, paints eclogues, travestied certainly, but still eclogues; he keeps sufficiently within the region of fiction to reach poetry. Lancret, without removing too far from reality, manages to throw a theatrical air around his works.

Certainly Lancret is not a poet, but he is an elegant prose writer. His ideal, for he was not altogether without one, is a drawing-room ideal; his fancy never rises above the conventional distinctions and the refinements of the fashionable world. His characters are all "persons of quality"—their figures graceful, their eyebrows arched haughtily, their mien defiant. We need not expect to see them rambling along wild fields: the painter introduces them into a conventional landscape, in the midst of masses of trees and shrubs, clipped into the form of arcades or gothic arches, in those artificial retreats which were then called cabinets de verdure. There he makes them keep time to the music of the monaco, or the slow cadence of the minuet. The cavaliers screw up their mouths, and wear beauty spots on their faces; the ladies appear in lackadaisical attitudes—one arm hangs gracefully over the skirt, the other holds a fan in such a position as to conceal only one half of the face, and leave full scope for the manoeuvres of their killing eyes. The little marquis, he is all grace; he smiles with an assuming air, and executes triumphant pirouettes. In truth, the Saxon porcelain makers, who executed for the furniture of the great those enamelled gentlemen, most unpolitely called "maggots," never invented anything so splendidly droll, so delightfully affected.

And yet such was the world at that time; such were the postures, and such was the turn of mind; it might be said even—if the human race is modified by the times and the manners—such were the men also. They carried their eyes on a level with the head; they assumed distorted attitudes and sly airs, and consulted "The Laws of Good Breeding." As to the women, their beauty was delicate, no doubt, but it was "got up." We must not forget that it was in Lancret's time that Froissac becomes Richelieu, and the regent exhausts the very springs of his life. We find ourselves in the interval between the regency and Louis XV., and in this point of view Lancret's works are an admirable study, not merely for the connoisseur, but for the historian, who believes it to be his duty to make himself acquainted with the outside of things, the fashions, the cut of the coats, and even the make of the furniture.

Nicholas Lancret was at first intended for a mould engraver, but as he showed an inclination for painting, he was put to study under Peter d'Ulin, a professor of the Academy. Having acquired the rudiments from him, he chose, as the department to which he intended to devote himself, the fêtes galantes, picnics, gipsy parties, &c., which Watteau had at that time made very fashionable. He made such progress under this new master, that Watteau, it is said, became jealous of him. Some of young Lancret's paintings having been exhibited in public, were taken for Watteau's by some amateurs who piqued themselves upon their powers of discernment. Watteau, who was excessively sensitive, became more jealous than ever when he heard this, and all intercourse between the two painters was completely broken off. Lancret's reputation, however, became greater every day. People began to run after his works, which now found a place in the choicest collections. An amateur having ordered four at a certain fixed price, was so pleased with the first two, that he offered to pay a larger sum for the remainder. Lancret displayed great talent in those storied ornaments which were then employed so freely in the decoration of apartments. M. de Boulogne, Intendant des Ordres du Roi, instructed him to paint an entire hall in this style, and he executed the task to perfection. The king hearing of it sent for the painter to Versailles, and commissioned him to paint for the dining-room of the small apartments, "a Collation served up in a Garden," some rural subjects above the gate of the Apollo Gallery, and a "Leopard Hunt," in which the painter represents the animal attacked by naked men.

D'Argenville, who was the contemporary of Lancret, and who was certainly acquainted with him, furnishes us with several interesting details regarding him. He declares him to have been a man of upright character and affable disposition. He gained the good-will of all honourable men by his gentleness, and won their esteem by his integrity. A broker, perceiving that Lancret's pencil could render him good service, by giving a delicate retouching to valuable pictures, proposed to him to undertake this sort of work, at the same time offering him a large salary. "I prefer running the risk of executing bad paintings," was the reply, "to spoiling good ones." The soundness of his judgment kept him on his guard against prejudices and hasty decision, and he often said—in reference to old paintings, which were praised and admired beyond measure simply for their antiquity—"You offer incense to idols." He often visited the great collections of the princes with the celebrated Lemoine, the only one of his brother artists with whom he kept up close intercourse. There everything was discussed, examined, criticised, and rated at its just value. It was in this way that Lancret acquired his great familiarity with the works of the ancient masters. Regarding these his glance even was infallible. An amateur, one day, wishing to test his skill, substituted a copy of a Virgin of Rembrandt in the place of the original, and in the same frame. As soon as Lancret had examined it, he exclaimed to a friend who was with him, "They are deceiving us. This is not the original that I have seen here so often." His friend inquired how he was able to tell, and the painter in reply pointed out some false touches in the arms of the child and of the Virgin. The original was then brought in, and proved the correctness of his statement.*

With this rare accuracy Lancret united an inexhaustible imagination, and a fertility bordering on enthusiasm, to use the words of his biographer. What variety he has introduced into subjects so trite and hackneyed as "The Elements," "The Seasons," "The Four Quarters of the World," "The Hours of the Day," "The Twelve Months of the Year," "The Five Senses!" Some of them he has treated two or three times, and always in different ways. He was one of the most industrious of artists; underwent an enormous amount of labour, and yet never repeated himself. He passes for a painter who has wholly practised from a conventional type, created by Gillot and Watteau; and yet he never drew one line with his pencil without consulting nature. In the salons, in the streets, in the promenade, everywhere, he was constantly studying, watching the attitudes, the dress, and the gestures with the eye of a painter. The ladies whom he met with at the Tuileries were his models; the alley along which he had seen them trailing the skirts of their silk dresses with huge flounces, was, in his eyes, only the background of the painting in which he should introduce them. Sometimes the rustle of one of these robes, the passing vision of a fair marchioness, accompanied, as if for a pretext, by two pretty little children, would make such an impression upon him that he would leave his friends, on the moment, and go aside to sketch what had pleased him so much. Some time before his death he conceived the idea of painting a Savoyard in the act of exhibiting some little curiosity which he hawked about the streets. So he brought all the boys and girls whom he met with in the squares exhibiting live marmots, and arranged them in picturesque groups, or rather suffered them to arrange themselves, in his studio, so that he might observe at his ease their countenances and the varied expressions of their physiognomy. Just as he was preparing to sketch them thus, one of his friends entered suddenly, and surprised him in the act of putting into practice his own constant advice to others, to paint from nature. This, in fact, in relation to his art, was his habitual thought. "Men," he said, "were not angels, and could not guess what was not always before their eyes. If you abandon nature too soon you will become false and affected; so that, when you wish to consult her again, you will look upon her with prejudiced eyes, and will render her in your usual style." Who would believe that it was Lancret who spoke thus—he who was himself so affected, the pupil and imitator of Antoine Watteau? How shall we reconcile these classical precepts with painting which borders closely on decline? The explanation of this apparent inconsistency lies in the fact that for seeing nature aright eyes alone are not sufficient; there must be also principles and a tradition—a key to translate her, to interpret her language; for she does not make herself intelligible to everybody. In the eighteenth century there existed a strong perception of reality, but the real sentiment of nature had disappeared. It was wanting in the poets, as well as in the literary men and the painters. With the exception of Jean Jacques Rousseau, and more recently of Bernardin St. Pierre, no writer possessed it—at least not in the degree in which a man must have it before he can be called an artist. French painters laid it down as a rule that nature should be studied, and yet never were they so far from her as when they were studying her. Boucher never painted the nude female figure without having a model before him; and yet his flesh was like wadding, his bones were broken, the sinews were softened down, and nature placed in subjection to the orthodoxy of art; and this was because he saw with the eyes of his age. Lancret, also, faithful to his professions, never took up a brush without having nature before him; but still, in spite of himself, he remained an imitator. Educated in the imaginary parks of Watteau, in the midst of his nymphs, bedecked with ribands, and his shepherds clothed in satin, the little tinge of reality that he mixed up with his remembrances of his master, only weakens his work; for, when one imitates Watteau, it is not worth while going to the trouble of improving him, and it is as well, we think, to remain in the regions of fancy. Lancret wished to systematise Watteau, but he deceived himself. One does not reason upon fancy. Consequently, beside the poetry of this charming artist, the prose of the pupil, elegant though it be, is, after all, nothing but prose.

Lancret's painting appeared excellent to his contemporaries. In his twenty-ninth year he was elected a member of the Academy, under the title of Peintre des Fêtes Galantes, which had already been given to his master; and in 1735 he was raised to the rank of councillor. The two pictures which he presented at his admission, and which adorned the halls of the building, were amongst those which were most highly thought of, and most readily pointed out to visitors. One of these represented "Country Pleasures," or "The Agreeable Conversation," of which Jacques Philippe Lebas executed so brilliant and so delicate an engraving. With regard to this, an occurrence took place which is worthy of record, as showing the high esteem in which Lancret was held by his confères. It was the custom, whenever an engraver was received into the Academy, for him to engrave the portrait of one or two of the members as his reception piece. When Lebas was elected, the Academy thought proper slightly to depart from the established usage; and as Lebas had already engraved the portrait of one of the academicians named Caze, he was now requested to engrave Lancret's picture, "The Agreeable Conversation." The fame of the picture was by this greatly increased, for, as Lancret was inferior to Watteau in delicacy, the softness of Lebas' inimitable style supplied the defect, and placed him on a level with his master.

Like a true Parisian, Lancret always possessed in a high degree that sentiment of propriety, and that worldly tact, by which he introduced himself into notice at a very early period of his career. He had that sort of education which is known as "good breeding" in a far greater degree than his Flemish rivals, Watteau and Pater. Watteau was brusque, irritable, stiff, and caustic; while Lancret was polite, affable, and pliable. The one was but too familiar with the road to the public-house; the only resorts frequented by the other were the great houses in the fashionable quarters of the city. He presents himself before Madame la Marquise de B—— when she is receiving none but her intimate friends; he is present at breakfast, at luncheon, he reads with her; and even when M. le Due is "not at home" to most callers, he is admitted at his levee. He owed to this sort of life the privilege which he enjoyed of composing upon canvas those familiar memoirs from which materials for a history of his age might readily be drawn.

Certainly Lancret is a little cold, but he is amiable; he has not the luxuriant palette of his master; he has not his lively expressions, which Watteau found more readily in his imagination than in reminiscences of the Italian comedy; he has not that brilliant and masterly pencil which makes painters beyond comparison, but he atones for these defects by agreeable accuracy. If he is wanting in fire, he at least sees correctly; and his observation, full of keenness, has this singular merit, that he reproduces most truthfully whatever is artificial in life. His people of quality, for example, have their armorial bearings and ensigns perfectly regular; they are not strolling mountebanks, accustomed to make grimaces before crowds at a fair for bad pay. Lancret neither liked nor was acquainted with any theatricals, except those of French comedy, of which he never missed a single play. There everything was conducted with decency and order; the daughters of high families did not suffer those little head-dresses then in fashion, and so like nightcaps, to be crumpled or ruffled by any one but their femmes de chambre. Lancret's assiduity in attending the theatre was the means of producing one of his best works—the closing scene in the "Glorieux" of Destouches. The painting is indeed a masterpiece.

It is easy to mark out the sphere in which each of the three French painters of fêtes moved. To Watteau belonged the poetry, the idealty, the heroism of gare; to Pater, the people, or the reality of scenes in low life; to Lancret, the elegant manners, the conventionalities of fashion, of society, and of the world. A distinguished German connoisseur, Hagedorn, has classed Lancret amongst painters of conversational pieces; and, in reality, this is his real distinction. And who will deny the importance of these charming artists? Is there anything, after all, more useful than the agreeable? We can understand why the paintings of the old great masters are placed beside ancestral portraits in the impressive gloom of a gallery in which the thoughtful seek to meditate solemnly, or the poet seeks inspiration and ecstasy. We can understand also why a dining-room should be decorated by Oudry or Landseer when Sneyders is no longer in existence. But how would you decorate a drawing-room, the scene of so much frivolous chit-chat, of so much caressing, trifling, and flirtation? What would you hang over a sofa, occupied all day long by readers of the last new novel? Would you place "The Death of Patroclus," "The Adventures of Ulysses," "The Greek Agora with Agamemnon presiding," in the midst of this scene of interminable gossip and babble? Conversational pieces are the only ones which will not clash with the overwrought refinement and delicacy of the place. The generation to which Necker and Rochambeau belonged, although already a little quakerish, nevertheless made use of the cameos of Boucher and his imitators; that of Richelieu hung Lancret's works above their doors.

The Marquis de Beringhen, wishing to decorate his splendid chateau at Jouy, commissioned Lancret to paint the Four Elements in the salon. Like a man of genius, Lancret eschewed dull allegory, and commonplace attributes. The age of Louis XIV. did not lose itself in symbols. "Water" was represented by a bath scene; "Fire" by a flirtation under the wide mantelpiece; but what, think you, did he paint in the panel set apart for the "Air?" Why, a marchioness in a swing abandoning her satin skirt to the indiscreet caprices of the element! Despite the want of mechanical facility displayed in Lancret's paintings, he must have been a laborious man, and not less assiduous at his easel than in his attendance at the theatre. The works that are known to be his are very numerous, and none can tell how many of those piers and door pieces are his which are discovered in Paris every day at the demolition of old houses. Although in painting he was Watteau's son, he was, nevertheless, his contemporary. Like the painter of Valenciennes, he had studied in the studio of Gillot. He left it to rejoin Watteau, just as the latter had obtained the brevet rank of Peintres des Fêtes Galantes. Without following in the track of this great artist, Lancret followed him in a more modest side-path, which led equally to the Academy. He was received there, as we have already said, under the same title as the founder of his school. He did not marry till he was fifty-two years of age. The object of his choice was the daughter of the poet Boursault, the author of "Esop at Court;" but he died two years after the union, on the 14th of September, 1743. In spite of the tortures which he inflicted upon the straight line, Lancret will live even for his defects. He was another Watteau, colder and more diminutive perhaps than the original; but agreeable, civilised, and historical. How can he perish when his theme was gallantry, his contemporaries the madcaps of

With Lancret the French school of painters, whose pencils were dedicated to love and gallantry, may be said to have expired. Those who came after him were too gross to entitle them to a place in the same category with him and Watteau. When he died, the sentiment of old France died with him, and the debauchery, unrelieved by one ray of taste or elegance, which ended in the revolution, except we allow it to have received a temporary blow from the amiable and unfortunate Louis XV., began to have free course. The painter of this latter period was Boucher; but how great the contrast between his creations and those of the amiable painter of the fêtes galantes. He admired him, studied him, copied and engraved him, it is true, and perhaps displayed no less talent; but he had fallen on a more evil time. The one belonged to an age in which vice was compelled at least to veil itself, and be pastoral and Arcadian; but the other, to an age in which decency was outraged to the last degree. In the works of Watteau, Lancret, and Boucher, we have a full history of the reigns of Louis XIV. and Louis XV. We see in them follies, gaieties, weaknesses, and virtues of the old regime. The picture is a sad one, no doubt; but there is a vast difference between the frailty of Mademoiselle de la Vallière, and the licentiousness of Pompadour and Dubarry. No one can ever read the story of the first without some touch of admiration and regret; but no one ever mentions the two last without regret. The simplicity, constancy, and truthfulness of La Vallière, her sorrowful and repentant end, are all full of an interest which the blase weariness of Pompadour, or the horrible death of Dubarry, can never afford. The two last were the goddesses of Boucher, while Lancret was inspired by the elegance of De Prie, and the beauty and grace, rather than the license, of the court of the Grand Monarque. Lancret, we know, was an enthusiastic admirer of the old masters, and could, when he pleased, infuse into his conventional formalism some portion of admiration for stirring reminiscences, great names, or ennobling memories. But it was not so with Boucher. When he went to Rome, he found nothing to interest him there. For him the ruins of the imperial city—for him the streets through which the mighty Caesar once swept along, in all the pride and pomp of a Roman triumph, to the capitol—for him the Forum, in which Cicero once held his hearers fascinated as by an irresistible spell—for him the Colosseum, the Pantheon, and all the other monuments of a sovereign race now passed away for ever, possessed no charms, nor caused any other sensation in his breast than what would be produced by mere heaps of moss-grown stones, picturesquely disposed, perhaps, but nothing more: he saw the moss which time had planted on them, but was blind to the halo with which history had enveloped them; and gladly did he take leave of the former abodes of the illustrious dead, in order once more to indulge in the light, frivolous, and profligate amusements of a generation of powdered trilliers, who knew not the real value of life till they heard it from the lips of death itself, at the outbreak of that terrible revolution which their vices had had so great a share in bringing about.

But supposing what we say as to the picture of the old regime presented by these three painters being a true and faithful one being correct, what a horrible picture it is, relief

cret, we know, was an enthusiastic admirer of the old masters, and could, when he pleased, infuse into his conventional formalism some portion of admiration for stirring reminiscences, great names, or ennobling memories. But it was not so with Boucher. When he went to Rome, he found nothing to interest him there. For him the ruins of the imperial city—for him the streets through which the mighty Caesar once swept along, in all the pride and pomp of a Roman triumph, to the capitol—for him the Forum, in which Cicero once held his hearers fascinated as by an irresistible spell—for him the Colosseum, the Pantheon, and all the other monuments of a sovereign race now passed away for ever, possessed no charms, nor caused any other sensation in his breast than what would be produced by mere heaps of moss-or gloss over it as we may! What astonishment should we not feel at the blind stupidity which deplors the revolution as a calamity for the human race—at the shortsightedness of the great orator who saw in it the destruction of chivalry and of manly sentiment. Even if all we hear and know of the miseries of the people, of the reckless waste of the public money, of the corruption which reigned in every department of the administration, were totally untrue, the downfall of a society in which such manners prevailed in private was a blessing and a cause for rejoicing.

"Lancret, Boucher, and Carle Vanloo," says Gault de St. Germain, "were the three artists who furnished most abundant materials to the Tremblins and the Bécots—picture-dealers, who lived in the houses formerly covering the Pont Nôtre Dame. These dealers were famous for the quantity of rubbish which they got manufactured after the designs of Lancret and Boucher to go over doors, or over mirrors, and after those of Carle Vanloo for country churches. The traced outline adopted in these establishments, and which the unhappy artists, who got their bread by working there, were obliged to follow, was filled up in a colouring raw and bright, laid on smoothly and without any sign of touch or execution. The word daub (crôte) was supplanted by that of 'Pout Nôtre Dame,' more expressive at that time, since it recalled the bad taste which prevailed there, and which some artists, who commenced in these shops, afterwards carried into the Academy."

In the first volume of the "Archives of French Art," published at Paris in 1852, there is a curious fragment, which we extract, relative to this painter. The precise period to which it refers has been ascertained by M. Mantz.

"During the queen's journey, a great many accidents took place, particularly between Provins and Montereau, where the second of the ladies' carriages stuck fast in the mud to such a degree that it could not be extricated.

"Six of the court ladies were therefore obliged to get into a cart filled with straw, though they were in full costume, and had their hair dressed; the six ladies must be represented as grotesquely as possible, in the style in which calves are carried to market, and the attendants must be made as ragged as possible.

"There must be another lady upon a cart-horse, harnessed in the usual way, but very lean and tired; and another across another cart-horse, like a sack, her hoop raised so high above the panniers that you may see her garters; all accompanied by some cavaliers who have been upset in the mud, and tater-damillions holding lighted wisps of straw as torches.

"The carriage must be seen in the distance, stuck in the mud; and the whole scene must have as much grotesqueness and absurdity as the painter can put into it."

In the margin the following appears, in the handwriting of the eighteenth century:—"Copied from the original sent by the Duke d'Antin to the Sieur Lancret, who has executed the drawing." From this, however, M. Mantz has managed to extract conclusions, of the accuracy of which there can hardly be any doubt. The fragment relates to the journey made by Maria Leczinska, in 1725, for the purpose of joining her future husband, Louis XV., at the Tuileries. The Duke d'Antin was then Superintendent of Buildings, and it would have fallen within the sphere of his duty to order Lancret to execute a painting for the amusement of the young king and the court ladies. The heroines of the episode were the élite of the nobility—Tallard, Bethune, D'Épernon, De Prie, De Matignon, De Nesle—and to have seen them all in this plight, marchionesses, duchesses, and all, stuck in the mud, their hair dishevelled, their hoops raised, and their legs displayed, assisted by boors and lighted with straw, must have given a very lively turn to the wedding gossip, and furnished subject matter for merriment even to the ladies themselves, who, having started from Chantilly in the royal carriages, little expected to come back in carts, "in the way in which calves are carried to market."

It is Lancret's good fortune to have been reproduced by engravers as able as himself, and who, moreover, rendered immortal the splendid works of his master. Jacques Philippe Lebas, Cochin, De Larmessin, Cousinet, George F. Schmidt, of Berlin, have engraved Lancret's finest works, and we might almost say that he loses nothing by the transition. The principal engravings after him are:—

"The Agreeable Conversation," by Jacques Philippe Lebas. This was the name given to Lancret's reception piece at the Academy. It was previously known as "Country Amusements."

"The Italian Repast," by the same.

"The Game at Blind Man's Buff," by C. N. Cochin.

"Mesdemoiselles Sallé and Camargo, executing pas in a Garden, surrounded by Musicians," by De Larmessin. This is one of the painter's best works, and is a real picture, though he only intended to make a portrait of it.

"One should never consider," by the same engraver. "The Gascon Punished," "The Maidservant Justified," "The Five Senses," by the same.

"The Amorous Turk," by G. F. Schmidt, of Berlin.

"The Beautiful Greek," by the same.

"The Mill of Quinquengrogne," by Elizabeth Crasinet.

"The Ages and the Elements," by Desplaces, Tardieu senior, Benoit Audran, jun.

Lancret's drawings are very like those of Watteau, but they display greater finish; and for that very reason, perhaps, have less freedom and warmth. "His figures," says Argenville, "are not wanting in length; and in this he has surpassed Watteau." He shows, however, correctness, lightness of touch, and gracefulness. His love for his art caused him to enter into the minutest details. The style of his paintings may serve to indicate that of his drawings.

The works of Lancret, in forty-six pieces—a far greater number is counted at the present day—were sold for only about £2 10s. at the Lorangère sale, under the direction of Gersaint, in 1744, a year after the painter's death. At the present day, these same engravings would bring four or five times that sum.

At that same sale, two of Lancret's paintings, one representing thieves plundering a traveller, only reached about £3 5s.; but it is right to add, that "The Chateau of Teniers," one of Teniers' works, sold, on the same occasion, for only about £8 16s.

At the Lalive de July sale, in 1770, a "A Pic-nic," engraved by Moitte, reached little more than £8.

Like those of Watteau, which at the same time were hardly any dearer, Lancret's paintings were for a long time sold as screens for fire-places.

In 1845, at the Vasserot sale, "The Pleasures of Angling" sold for £52, and "The Archers" for £16.

In the same year, at the Cypierre sale, three of Lancret's paintings were sold:—1. "A Fancy Ball in the Rotunda at Trianon," £129; 2. "A Ball in the Garden at Trianon," £146; 3. "A Young Shepherdess," life size, in a landscape, £20.

PRACTICAL AND ORNAMENTAL ART.

ONE prominent effect of the Great Exhibition was that of showing more clearly than before, that in the arts of ornamentation and design England was far behind her continental neighbours, and that she might learn much even from the study of ornamental works produced by the rice-fed and half-naked Indian artisan. Englishmen saw—not without regret—that though pre-eminent as manufacturers, and famous all over the world for cheapness and good workmanship, they were no match for other countries in point of elegance and taste; and that unless some great effort was made with a view to improvement in these respects, they would, at no distant period, be in danger of losing their proud position as manufacturers for the rest of mankind. Thinking men perceived this, journalists were not slow to make the fact patent in print, capitalists and employers of labour saw it, government also observed it, and took the only course left open to them, which was to raise up and educate, in the true principles of decorative art, an army of young men and women, so that, in a few years, England might regain the ground it had lost, and once more go into the markets of the world with not only the cheapest but the best of goods.

It was thus that the Museum of Practical and Ornamental Art came to be formed. A parliamentary grant of £5,000 was placed at the disposal of the Board of Trade for the purchase of articles from the Great Exhibition; a committee of taste, consisting of Mr. Pugin, the architect (since deceased), Mr. Owen Jones, Mr. Redgrave, R.A., and Mr. Cole, C.B., was formed, with power to select and purchase from the Exhibition such articles as they considered necessary to form the nucleus of an Art Museum; and Marlborough House, which had been vacant since the death of the Queen Dowager, was appropriated to the reception of the objects purchased. On Monday, the 6th day of September, 1852, the museum, rendered as perfect as possible by the gift or loan of many valuable articles illustrative of the decorative arts, in addition to the £5,000 worth of purchases, was opened to the public. On Mondays and Tuesdays, and during Easter and Christmas weeks, the public are admitted free; on Wednesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays, persons not students are admitted on payment of sixpence each, with liberty to copy any article on payment of an additional sixpence; and manufacturers may, by payment of a guinea annually, obtain a transferable ticket for any of their several firms or any person employed by them. Besides all this, classes for art education were speedily brought into active operation, and schools of design were formed all over the kingdom.

The objects which the promoters of this department of art have in view are threefold:—First, to bring together such specimens as will best serve to illustrate the history of various manufactures; secondly, to show, by examples selected from numerous sources and belonging to separate periods and countries, an approximation to the true principles of art in decoration, form, and colour; and thirdly, to teach in classes, by means of lectures and the employment of efficient masters, the following arts:—1, woven fabrics of all kinds, including embroidery, lace, and paper-staining; 2, the principles and practice of ornamental art applied to furniture, metals, jewellery, and enamels; 3, pottery and its kindred manufactures; 4, painting on porcelain; 5, instruction in the art of engraving on wood; 6, chromo-lithography; 7, the study of artistic anatomy, including drawing, painting, and modelling the human figure, with practical demonstrations; 8, architectural details and practical construction; and 9, practice in the various processes of casting and moulding. All these classes are open to both male and female students, except those for teaching wood engraving and chromo-lithography, which are at present confined to females. In a word, the instruction afforded at Marlborough House consists, briefly, of—the study and examination of the finest specimens of ornamental art; attendance at lectures, &c., on the principles and practice of art; and the study and practice of those special processes of manufacture which govern the character of design and lead to its production. This very comprehensive course is conducted by the most efficient teachers, assisted by a museum and library expressly formed for such students, who are permitted to study any one or more of the arts on payment of a very moderate scale of fees. In each of the classes, it is the aim of the teacher to render the most efficient service to the pupil, so as to fit him to go at once into the world, properly qualified for whatever branch of manufacture or art he may select.

To show, for instance, the methods pursued in these classes, we may extract so much of the prospectus issued by the council as relates to pictorial anatomy (No. 7), which is under the superintendence of J. Walsh, Esq.:—"The study of artistic anatomy, with practical demonstrations in drawing, painting, and modelling, are conducted in the following groups:—

"1. Drawing in chalk or charcoal, with a view to the correct study of structure through light and shadow. The study of the antique and of nature will, therefore, be prosecuted step by step, in careful comparison with the bony and muscular frame-work, from casts, prints, &c.

"2. Modelling in clay and in wax. In this class the principles of relief are taught, and the study from the round, whether of original figures, or from fine examples, is carried on with constant reference to the test of anatomy. In both the above classes, the method of analysis is adopted, so that, according to the occasion, the drawing or model, or selected portions of it, are anatomically rendered.

"3. The Painting class comprehends the various methods of painting in water colour, tempera, oil, or fresco; commencing with monochrome painting from plaster casts, and advancing to the study of coloured examples, with occasional reference to the living model."

The Art Museum at Marlborough House, which is thus thrown open for the instruction of the studios of both sexes and the public, is considered as yet far from perfect; but even now it contains a larger number of objects having a directly educational tendency than any collection hitherto brought together.

"The great sources of error," says Mr. Redgrave, in his essay on design, alluded to the Reports of the Jurors of the Exhibition of 1851, "in designing for garment fabrics are over ornamentation. The designs are too large for the fabric, or the colours are too violent, or the taste in the choice of both is questionable. . . . The 'up-and-down' patterns best suit the motion of the wearers, while the horizontal direction of pronounced forms quarrels with all the motions of the human figure, as well as with the long folds in the skirts of the garment. For this reason, large and pronounced checks, however fashionable, are often in very bad taste, and interfere with the graceful arrangement of any material as drapery." So, likewise, those cross-banded cloths so much worn by gentlemen are ungraceful and outré, because their horizontal lines interfere with the motions and form of the wearer. "If we look at the details of Indian patterns we shall be surprised at their extreme simplicity, and be led to wonder at their rich and satisfactory effect. It will soon be evident, however, that their beauty results from adherence to the true principles of decoration. The parts themselves are often poor, ill-drawn, and common-place; yet, from the knowledge of the design, due attention to the just ornamentation of the fabric, and the refined delicacy evident in the selection of the quantity and the choice of tints, both for the ground and the ornamental forms, the fabrics, individually and as a whole, are lessons to our designers and manufacturers, given by those from whom we least expected it."

Of the £5,000 placed at the disposal of the Board of Trade, £2,075 was expended on articles exhibited on the foreign side of the building; £893 on articles from the British side; and £1,501 on objects from the Indian collection. The apportionment of the sum may be thus epitomised:—Mixed fabrics, £1,080; metal works, £1,126; enamels, £844; porcelain, £348; and wood carvings, furniture, &c., £771; leaving a small portion of the parliamentary grant in hand for expenses. In the museum all these articles are catalogued and arranged for exhibition and study. Here are works in the precious and other metals—in pottery, glass, wood, and woven fabrics—chosen for qualities which illustrate true principles of design or display high excellence in workmanship." These are arranged in the several rooms and passages in such a manner as to best display their several excellences. Thus, on the staircase are carpets from India, tapestry from Hampton Court (lent by her Majesty), copies of Raphael's arabesques from the Vatican, and wall tiles from the manufactory of Messrs. Minton, of Stoke-upon-Trent; and in the gallery are casts of celebrated antique sculpture and ancient ornament, together (in the hall) with a collection of examples illustrating the stages of studies pursued in the schools of design in London and the provinces.

In addition to the statues, statuettes, friezes, basso-relievos, busts, &c., &c., in various parts of the building, there are arranged in the council room, for the use of the students, a large and valuable collection of prints and drawings, illustrative of the styles of the old and modern masters, the architecture of the most famous buildings of ancient times, and illustrations of the various uses of colours in decoration. A library of works on art is also rapidly approaching a degree of excellence worthy the institution; and in specimens of lace-work, embroidery, patterns for garments, and kindred articles of manufacture, the collection may already be said to be unrivalled.

In our small space, it is impossible to do more than indicate the principal sources of attraction in this noble museum, and our hope is, that it may become the first school of ornamental art in the world. Suffice it to say, that both the materials collected, and the manner in which they are arranged, are

JEAN BAPTISTE MONNOYER.

There are two kinds of flower-painters. Some paint them for the love of the flowers themselves, others for love of the painting. The former see nothing in a bouquet, except a happy mixture of striking hues, which surprise and delight the eye. If the rose sheds its sweet colours on their canvas, if the carnation opens out its dazzling mosaic, if the drooping peony displays its large carmine petals, or the tulip exhibits its whiteness of porcelain, and descending in the scabious to dark violet. Each flower is thus a sharp note, soft or deep, in this music of hues, and if the painter succeeds in pleasing the spectator he is content.

In the latter, on the other hand, the artist is lost sight of in the botanist. The individuality of each species strikes them and absorbs their attention. They must learn to smooth golden rays, it is not so much for the purpose of delighting the botanist, or calling to his recollection all the beauties that crowd the genus or species to which they belong, but to give the artist an opportunity of entering into competition with nature for the production of striking effects. The flowers serve as a sort of excuse or pretext for the execution of a painting containing a glittering gamut of chosen colours rising in the hyacinth to the hue of ivory, or in the lily to the the rose-leaves, to draw the flower delicately, to touch the stamens lightly. They want to reproduce accurately the beautiful hair that hangs round the corolla of the anemone, or the down that softens the vermilion of the peach; they wish to trace with the pencil the anatomy of their graceful moulds, to sketch the minutest petal that droops or falls, to take away none of the elegance of the attitude, to mark upon each the exact locality of the tone; and thus, being so intent upon the parts, they lose sight of the whole. In their passionate worship of each flower, they can sacrifice nothing, or at least nothing save what the modesty of some flowers renders necessary.

Monnoyer may be classed among the first of these. He belonged to the age of Louis XIV., and possessed rather the instinct of decoration than the sentiment of nature. The French school of painting was at that time a good deal under the influence of the new school of philosophy. It wanted love for reality. With it a landscape was but a garden for heroes to amuse themselves in; all nature wore the hue of history; flowers were not looked upon as a branch of art in themselves, and were never seen except in books, and such beautiful collections of plants as those painted on vellum by order of Gaston d'Orleans, brother of Louis XIII. Those quaint and painstaking artists, who embellished the manuscripts of the middle ages with their brilliant illuminations, had entirely disappeared. It was the last of them who, at the commencement of the revival, so beautifully illustrated the primer of Anne of Bretagne. It was reserved for the eighteenth century, led back to nature by Jean Jacques Rousseau, to restore the painting of realities, to do for flowers what Chardin was doing for the spinning-wheel—that is, to load them with as much poetry as he had thrown around the household utensils of a decent and well-ordered dwelling. In the reign of Louis XIV. flowers were painted in France as part of a system of decoration, as ornaments for the sake of their rich colouring; but not as objects worthy of an artist's love and admiration. No one ever thought of prizing them as the Dutch protestants prized tulips. It is in protestant countries, above all, where the love of the people for quiet pleasures is developed by a calm, contemplative, and serious life, that the passion for flowers is found in its full vigour—in Holland, in parts of Germany, and in England. In these countries every villa, every cottage even, is surrounded with them as far as the owners' means will permit. Antiquity is dead beyond restoration. The swans have abandoned the Eurotas, and now build their nests on the banks of the Thames; Arcadia is no longer in the Peloponnesus, but in Holland and Germany.

Monnoyer was born at Lille, the capital of French Flanders, and studied in Paris. Who his master was is not known, and in fact but very little information of any kind has come down to us regarding his early life. At the age of thirty, in 1665, he presented himself for admission to the Academy and was elected. He painted, for his reception, a flower and fruit-piece, which met with immense praise. The branch he followed, however, was not recognised by the Academy, and he, consequently, did not obtain a professorship, but he was elevated to the council in 1679. He obtained a high reputation very rapidly, all the more so because he was at that time the only flower painter in France. His free manner recommended him to the designers of the decorations of the royal palaces which Louis XIV. had ordered, and his bouquets were consequently soon seen upon the panels of Trianon and Marly. He seized upon everything with delight that could extend his sphere, and serve as an accompaniment to his bunches of carnation and jasmine, his orris branches, and the stems of his poppies, or roses, or campanulas. The richness and pomp which Lebrun put in his historical paintings, and Rigaud in his portraits, he put into his flowers. Splendid carpets, thick and fringed with gold, were introduced to set off the main subject of the piece, which stood majestically upon tables of porphyry or marble. Large and beautiful vases, embossed with masks of silver and small figures, rested on rugs, lest they should, even to the eye, grate upon the polished surface of the stone. Stems of all shapes and sizes hung over in apparent confusion, but were mingled with such art, that instead of bewildering the sight, they delighted it. Sometimes japan porcelain was placed upon a pedouche of copper inlaid with gold: and then the delicacy and splendour of the colouring rivalled that of the flowers themselves, which appeared to be repeated on the enamel of the vase. At others the painter introduced an embossed cuirass, or helmet, to counterbalance by its brightness the principal lights of the picture; but these rude images, though they contribute something towards the optical effect, break in upon the harmony of the impression. The eye cannot habituate itself to these combinations; on the contrary they offend it. The softness of a jonquil, or the austere melancholy of the tuberose, cannot consort with the iron of armour.

Monnoyer's reputation spread daily. The admiration of him begetting familiarity, the connoisseurs began to call him Baptiste simply; and under this appellation his fame passed the sea, and reached the ears of the Duke of Montagu, a passionate lover of art, who, in his pursuit of it, entirely overlooked national distinction. English, French, or Dutch mattered not; if a man could paint well, he found in him a magnificent patron and a firm friend. Nor did he confine his attention to one branch of art. He was equally fond of the historical, the marine, landscape, dead nature, animals, and flowers. At this time, he was engaged in the construction of a magnificent mansion in London, which he intended to decorate with paintings, and for this purpose invited a great number of artists from all parts of Europe, but particularly from France, in which country he had resided for a length of time. The painters he chose in it were all academicians, or men of the highest standing in their respective departments—La Fosse, famous for his historical compositions; Rousseau, for his perspective; and Monnoyer, for flowers and decoration generally. The three arrived in London in 1690, and each of them executed the part assigned to him with admirable skill. Rousseau opened up imposing perspectives upon the walls, repeated the balustrades of the staircase, or continued the rows of pillars, thus creating an illusive grandeur and extent. La Fosse painted on the ceiling the Apotheosis of Isis, and the Assembly of the Gods; and Monnoyer scattered here and there his flowers, his gorgeous draperies, his vases of silver, or japan porcelain, full of orris, or poppies, or gillflowers. Sometimes he introduced amongst these inanimate objects a bird of some southern clime, with luxuriant plumage; but it only appeared for the purpose of lending to the composition the glowing hues which flashed from its feathers—the bright scarlet, the lively emerald, or the deep azure. These colours are employed now to lend warmth to the painting, when the tints of the other objects have thrown an air of coldness round it; such as those of the lilae, or the white daisy; and again, to subdue the brilliancy of the peony.

When D'Argenville states, however, in speaking of Baptiste's flowers, that "these beautiful flowers wanted nothing except the odour which they seemed to exhale;" he gives the reins wholly to his fancy, and disregards facts. And Levesque, in his notices in the "Encyclopedia," grossly exaggerates when he says, speaking also of Baptiste, "He gave flowers the charm and freshness, and beautiful tints of nature; his pencil moistened them with morning dew." The fact is, that if Baptiste be compared to his rivals, he will be found on these points by no means their superior, but the reverse. He is full of truth, without doubt, but it is a bare, naked truth, which wants a veil to make it agreeable. Paradoxical as it may seem, a large amount of falsehood is necessary to reach that truth which captivates us, to call up that appearance of reality, the charm which is given to flowers by the surrounding atmosphere, by the caresses of the dew, and the kisses of the sun. We speak here not only of the large flowers painted upon the panels of apartments in the decorative style, such as we see at the Louvre and at Trianon, but those splendid bouquets in which he strove to give the roses all their honour, and the anemones all their glory, which he executed only at rare intervals, when he wished to captivate the gaze of some captious botanist. One of these, which is in his happiest style, may be seen in the collection of Messrs. Claude of Paris. It is not merely to the effect of the picture that the artist has looked; we might almost say, without being guilty of a pun, that each of these bouquets is the flower of the painting. The touch is skilful and varied, and it contributes, as well as the management of the chiaro-scuro, to the general truthfulness of the whole. We do not speak of that truth which shows itself in minor details, and is the result of minute observation of nature, but of that which appears in the general harmony and beauty of tone, as much as in the manner in which the pencil shows by its handling the character of the flower. The glossy surface of the lily is rendered by an oily impasting apparently without thickness, and skillfully laid on. The delicate stems are treated with charming lightness, as the myosotis of the marsh, and the full-blown periwinkle. The double anemone, as also the live petals of the white hyacinth, are emphasised with a firm touch, thick and amplified. The brush, on the contrary, becomes softer in the light tints of the blue hyacinths, which serve as a transition to a united background of a neutral tint. The practice here is excellent, and may be cited as a model. His colours are laid on at the first effort, and with so much confidence, that the painter must have known by heart the form and outline of his copy.

Monnoyer has made one singular mistake, and one which has since been extensively copied—the mingling of spring flowers with autumn fruits. No better proof than this can be afforded of the assertion we made at the commencement of this article, that flower painting with him was simply a means of decoration. The eye is offended by seeing snowdrops, which appear in April, side by side with bunches of grapes, nuts, and apples. But it must be confessed that the fruit is treated with a master hand—not certainly with the delicate taste and with the light glazing of the Dutch, but with full paste, like the Italians, who knew no other way of painting fruits than in the style of Michael Angelo's battles.

Baptiste was so well treated by Lord Montagu, that he took up his abode in London for the remainder of his life. Kneller was then in his glory, and it was his custom to paint only the head himself, and leave the figure and drapery to inferior artists, so that he might accomplish a greater amount of work. The same motive induced him to seek the aid of Monnoyer, so that the portraits of persons of quality now began to appear with bouquets in their hands, or wandering in a garden, plucking roses or watering geraniums, &c.; and it is needless to add that these graceful adjuncts doubled the price of the picture.

Monnoyer was a clever and dexterous engraver, and his works in this department will probably live fully as long as his paintings, which, as we have said, have now lost much of the brilliancy and finish that were at first their greatest charm. In some of the chronicles of French art, we find descriptions of thirty-four of his etchings, divided into several series of small and large baskets of flowers, crowns, garlands, and opaque and transparent vases. It is from these that the designers of commerce, the artists who scatter flowers upon stuffs that veil the figures of the fair sex, the damask coverings of their furniture, the silk of their dresses, and the chintz of their curtains, derive their inspiration. It is at Lyons, above all, the great seat of the silk manufacture, that Baptiste is most worshipped. There he is the master par excellence. The thousand combinations of colour and form that may be created in a single bouquet, are a rich mine for the designers of the manufacturers. As to the painter himself, his works are easily recognised, with some few exceptions, by the splendour of effect and bold manner of their treatment. When you take a run over to Paris—and who now-a-days does not?—and are devoting your mornings to the study of the fine arts, if you enter any of those good old hotels of the departed nobility, built in the Mansard style, and belonging to the age of Louis XIV., which crowd the Faubourg St. Germain, but are abundant above all at Versailles,—if you see a large bouquet fitted in the wainscoting, relieved with gold; and if it stands in a vase adorned with lions, with satyrs, loves, bacchantes, and is composed of the largest and most gorgeous flowers, poppies, peonies and tursons, and is set off by splendid carpets, silken tassels; and if peacocks and golden pheasants perch upon the edge, so that the whole is brilliant, striking, and luxuriant in the highest degree; you must not say, "that is by Van Huysum, or Mignon, or Daniel Seghere;" but "that is by Monnoyer."

Monnoyer has left behind him a great number of pictures, and they are to be met with everywhere—among the dealers and amateurs, in the public galleries, and many in private collections in England, where he lived so long and so happily. He executed sixty for the chateaux of Trianon, Marly, and Meudon. As they were mostly intended to decorate the upper part of doors, or fill very large spaces, they are usually rough sketches; but the execution is broad, the arrangement good, and the touch skilful and masculine. Some of them are, however, so delicate and finely drawn, that they equal any of the works of the Dutch painters in this department.

The Louvre is very rich in Monnoyer's works. It is to be regretted, however, that their restoration was not confided to abler hands; the back-grounds, which have been almost entirely re-executed, are heavy, black, and without transparency, and the flowers, however beautiful they may be, exhibit the effects of this ugly bordering. We have already alluded to his engravings. Under the name "Little Bouquets," he has engraved a series of four pieces; under that of "Transparent Vases," nine; under that of "Middle-sized Baskets," four; "Large Baskets" in height, three; "Large Baskets" in breadth, four. Lastly, under the name of "The Coronets," two. To none of these engravings is there either cipher or monogram. Underneath is written, J. Baptiste, sculpt. et sc. cum privileg. regis. Some amateurs also attribute to him a book of every sort of flowers from nature, composed of twelve sketches, folio size in length, and bearing a cipher at the left hand side at the bottom. But this series was engraved by Vanquer, his pupil.

In the engravings of this painter may be found the following flowers:—Roses, stems of the tuberosa, poppies, anemones, lilies, carnations, periwinkles, orris, orange blossoms, hyacinths, tulips, auriculas, jasmines, columbines, pol. egr. mates, snowdrops, ranunculi, peonies, and campanulas.

At the Salve de July sale, in 1770, two were sold for £10; at the Prince of County's sale, in 1777, two pendants, representing very beautiful flowers in vases, brought by auction £11; two others only reached £5; two others, representing peaches and grapes, £1 15s.; and, lastly, a splendid garland of flowers, in the midst of which Stella had painted the Virgin holding the Infant Jesus in her arms, reached £18 10s.

These particulars, in the absence of a detailed description of the paintings—no very easy matter when flowers are the subject—may serve to show, if not demonstrably prove, that the works of Monnoyer, though good enough to be found in the best collections, yet have never risen to an exorbitant price;—£6, £8, or £12 will purchase one of his paintings, of greater or less dimensions and greater or less finish. If we compare the splendid paintings of Baptiste with those of Mignon, of Rachel Ruysch, of Sighers, of Van Huysum, we are surprised to find so great a difference in the price, considering there is so little between the talents of the artists. The real explanation lies in the low estimate formed by the French of the capabilities of their own artists—an absurdity common to all European nations except, we believe, the Italians. Baptiste never affixed any signature to his paintings. His etchings only bear his Christian name, J. Baptiste.

One of this artist's celebrated works is a looking-glass in Kensington Palace, decorated by him with a garland of flowers for Queen Mary II., who sat by him, it is said, the whole time he was doing it. He also painted six pictures of East Indian birds from nature, in water colours, on vellum, for the Duke of Ormond. They are elaborate productions, displaying exquisite skill and delicacy of touch.

Baptiste had two sons and one daughter. The latter was married to Blain de Fontenoy, the disciple and imitator of his father-in-law. Of the sons, one, Antoine, inherited his father's talent, and was elected a member of the Academy in 1704. The other travelled in Italy, where he became a Dominican monk, and adorned the walls of his monastery with tolerably good pictures, representing scenes in the life of St. Dominic. This is all we know of Baptiste or his family. He died in London in 1699.

JOSEPH WRIGHT.

JOSEPH WRIGHT was called "Wright of Derby," to distinguish him from Richard Wright, of Liverpool, another artist, who acquired some celebrity in his day. He was the son of an attorney, and was born in September, 1734. He was sent to London, at the age of seventeen, to study under a painter named Hudson, as his father was led to believe, from his great love of mechanics and great power of observation, that he would eventually succeed as an artist. Hudson was at that time the chief portrait painter of the metropolis. He had formidable competitors in Vanloo and Liotard; but his thoroughly English style, and the air of bluff bonhomme that he was able to throw into his faces, made him a great favourite with the country gentlemen of the old school. He flourished made the best possible use of his time, and became an enthusiastic admirer of the old masters, particularly of Michael Angelo, on whom he always lavished the highest expressions of admiration. His modesty, on his return to England, made him retire to Bath and Derby, his native town, instead of seeking the wider field for his talents which would have been afforded by residence in the metropolis; for such was his skill in portrait painting, that there can be no doubt he would have soon stood at the top of the ladder had he pursued it as his vocation. Rome had given him a higher idea of the artist's vocation, and he speedily abandoned portraits for history and landscape. He had the good fortune, during his stay in Italy, to witness an eruption of Mount Vesuvius; and the curious in great splendour till Sir Joshua Reynolds, one of his own pupils, made his appearance on the scene; and then he had the good sense to perceive that his occupation was gone; so he retired to his villa at Twickenham, and died rich and happy.

He would, in all probability, be never heard of now, if it were not that it was his good fortune to turn out a greater number of pupils who afterwards rose to distinction than any other man whose own abilities were so poor. One of those was Wright, whose custom it was to bemoan his misfortune in having so stupid a master; but it would seem without just cause; for some of his earliest pieces bear evidence of careful instruction. He paid a visit to Rome in 1773, and during his stay of two years journeyed over most parts of Italy. He phenomena of light and shade caused by the conflagration inspired him with an extraordinary desire to paint subjects in which these could be displayed to the greatest advantage. In firelight scenes, therefore, he was extraordinarily successful. Nor did he display less ability in historical subjects. "The Dead Soldier," "The Destruction of the Floating Batteries at Gibraltar," "Edwin at the Tomb of his Ancestor," "Belshazzar's Feast," "Hero and Leander," "The Lady in Comus," and "The Storm Scene in Milton's Comus," all display the highest ability.

Wright was elected an Associate of the Royal Academy, but was so disgusted by Garvey's reception as a member before him that he resigned. He continued, however, to send pictures to the exhibition, occasionally afterwards.

THE CRETAN BULL.

ANCIENT mythology has furnished a rich store of materials to our artists. It would be hard to find a fable or adventure recorded in the Greek or Roman classics which has not been illustrated or adorned by painter or poet. It was, in fact, only at a very late period that modern fiction or history was thought worthy of an artist's notice. They have recently, however, received a due share of attention from painters, but it is rarely that sculptors think anything belonging to their own time a proper subject for their genius to exercise itself upon, unless when they receive an order from an enthusiastic corporation, or a knot of "admirers" for the statue of some lamented great man, or it may be a very little man indeed. There have of course been some exceptions to this rule, as for instance, the "Oliver Twist," which was exhibited at the Great Exhibition in 1851; but they are few in number. Many that seem exceptions are not so in reality. The "Greek Slave" has nothing peculiarly modern about it.

One of the most remarkable of the personages who figure in the legends of Grecian mythology is Hercules, the personification of irresistible strength. According to one of these legends, Hercules was the son of Jupiter; and when the day of his birth arrived, Jupiter imprudently boasted, in the hearing of his jealous wife Juno, that on that day a son of his was about to be born to whom all others should be subject. Juno at once called upon him to confirm this declaration with an oath; and as soon as he had done so, she prematurely hastened the birth of Eurystheus, another of Jupiter's offspring. The consequence was, that Eurystheus was invested with dominion over Hercules, which he exercised in a very tyrannical way, by imposing upon him a series of most difficult and dangerous tasks, usually styled the twelve labours of Hercules. It is one of these labours—the capture of the Cretan bull—that is represented in our engraving, which is taken from a zinc cast from Berlin, now in the Dublin

THE CRETAN BULL. FROM A ZINC CAST AT BERLIN.

But for the chain it might be a Venus or Diana, or any one of a thousand nymphs. The same may be said of most others.

This is not a thing to be wondered at; nor should sculptors on this account come in for any share of patriotic indignation. The fact is, up to the present time modern civilisation has progressed in a great measure independently of the beautiful. It has been intensely rude in regard to externals, intensely fond of the practical and useful. That of ancient Greece was precisely the reverse. The prime and chief element in it was the beautiful. The keen perception of it was the leading characteristic of the Greek mind. It, therefore, showed itself at the very earliest periods in their poetry and mythology. They had hardly a single superstition which was not artistic; hardly one which was not graceful in whatever way expressed, on canvas, in stone, or in poetry. That modern art should look back to it as the Golden Age, and even seek a return to it, need, therefore, cause us no surprise.

Exhibition. This bull was said by some to have been that which carried Europa across the sea; but according to others, it was sent out of the sea by Poseidon, that Mino, the king of Crete, might sacrifice it to him. The monarch, however, was so charmed with its beauty, that he kept it, and sacrificed another in its stead. This so enraged the god, that he made it mad; and it committed terrible havoc in the island, till Hercules was sent by Eurystheus to capture it. This he did—took it by the horns, and carried it home on his shoulders; but then set it free again. We afterwards meet with the animal in the stories of the exploits of Theseus.

The work is at present attracting great attention in the Exhibition. The idea of "irresistible might," of which Hercules was the personification in ancient legend, is admirably displayed in the muscular development of the hero; but it seems to us, that the bull scarcely throws as much force and energy into his struggles for escape, as an animal of his size ought, in such a predicament, to display.

BRIDGEWATER GALLERY.

LONDON is not so destitute in point of art-exhibitions as might at first sight appear. For, to say nothing of the National Gallery, and the fine Dutch and Flemish pictures at Dulwich, open to all comers, there are plenty of art-treasures to be seen in London. In fact, the very best pictures in England—the most genuine and undoubted "old masters," and the most famous specimens of the modern English and French schools—are in the galleries and houses of private collectors and purchasers. Just to mention a few of these:—there is first, her Majesty's private gallery at Buckingham-palace—a noble collection of Dutch and Flemish pictures, formed at a great expense by George IV., with some good portraits of Sir Peter Lely and Reynolds, Wilkie's celebrated "Penny Wedding" and "Blind Man's Buff," and Sir William Allan's "Orphan," representing Annie Scott standing near the vacant chair of her father, Sir Walter. Admission to view these may be obtained from the Lord Chamberlain, during the absence of the court, by written application, enclosing a stamped envelope for an answer. Then there is the Grosvenor collection, at Grosvenor-house, formed by Richard, first earl of Grosvenor; the Vandyckes at the Earl de Grey's in St. James's-square; the collection of the poet Rogers, at 22, St. James's-place; the Hogarths and the Canaletti at the Soane Museum, in Lincoln's-inn-fields; the three fine Reynolds' at the Thatched-house Tavern, St. James's-street; the Duke of Sutherland's Murillos; the Holbein at Barber-Surgeons'-hall; Mr. Neeld's collection, at 6, Grosvenor-square; Sir Robert Peel's Dutch pictures, at Whitehall; the fine collections at Northumberland-house and Apsley-house; Lady Garvagh's Raphael, at 26, Portman-square; Lord Ward's collection; the portraits, &c., at the Herald's-college, Doctor's-commons; the splendid gallery of pictures collected by Henry Hope, Esq., at the corner of Dover-street, Piccadilly; Baron Rothschild's collection; Mr. Holford's gallery; Lord Ward's pictures; the English collection of Mr. Sheepshanks; and Lord Normanton's private gallery; to say nothing of the Vandycke pictures at Windsor, and the Raphael "Cartoons" at Hampton-court. All these, with the exception of the two last, which are open to the public, may be seen by written application to their several owners.

But what we wish now to bring before our readers is—the superb collection of pictures, belonging to the Earl of Ellesmere, known as the Bridgewater Gallery. There is no difficulty in obtaining admission to the gallery—every Wednesday during the earl's stay in town, which may generally be considered to last through the London season, or the session of parliament rather, being set apart for the reception of visitors. The house, which stands in Cleveland-square, with a front towards St. James's-park, was built by Francis, the present earl of Ellesmere, from the designs of Sir Charles Barry, R.A., the architect of the new palace at Westminster. Though commenced in 1847, it is even now unfinished, as far as the interior is concerned. It stands on the site of what was formerly called Berkshire-house, the town-house of the Howards, earls of Berkshire. It was purchased by Charles II., and presented by him to the beautiful Barbara Villiers, Countess of Castlemaine and Cleveland, whose portrait by Sir Peter Lely is in Hampton-court Palace, with the rest of the court beauties. It then changed its name to Cleveland-house; the Earl of Castlemaine lived here in 1668, and the countess, alone, in 1669. Lord Clarendon was a resident in it for a short time after the Great Fire, after which it had several tenants. In 1691 it belonged to the Earl of Nottingham. The house was eventually bought by the great Duke of Bridgewater, the collector of the picture-gallery which bears his name, who altered and re-faced the front, and called it Bridgewater-house. The earl dying in 1803, left his pictures, then valued at £150,000, to his nephew, the first Duke of Sutherland (then Marquess of Stafford), with remainder to the marquess' second son, Francis, the present Earl of Ellesmere. The last noble possessor pulled down the old house, and erected the present structure in its place.

The Earl of Ellesmere, who appears to have inherited all his ancestor's love of art, has added numerous fine paintings to the original collection, which now consists of about 320 pictures, besides 150 original drawings by the celebrated Italian painters Lubovic, Agostino, and Annibale Caracci, who flourished in the sixteenth century; and eighty large paper drawings by Guilo Romano, which he purchased at the sale of the Lawrence collection, in 1836. Forty-seven of the finest of the pictures originally belonged to the celebrated Orleans collection. The contents of the present gallery may be thus epitomised:—Italian, Spanish, and French pictures, 127; Flemish, Dutch, and German pictures, 158; English and doubtful pictures, 35.

Mrs. Jameson, in her "Handbook to the Picture-Galleries," remarks, that the Bridgewater Gallery is deficient in examples of early Italian pictures; but that the series, since Raffaele, is the most complete of any existing as a private collection, not even excepting the Lichtenstein Gallery at Vienna. Since that remark was made, however, the earl has purchased a "Tantalus" illustrative of the school of Bologna; a "Holy Family," by Andrew Del Sarto, who was contemporary with the great Italian, and one or two others. There is also a fine "Head of a Girl," by Leonardo da Vinci, who was born about the year 1450, more than thirty years before Raffaele, and died in 1519, only one year before his great contemporary.

The first object in the great Hall, on entering from the door in Cleveland-square, is, the beautiful marble group of "Ivo Nursing the Infant Bacchus," by Foley; a subject which has been extremely popular in engravings, and has been successfully reduced in Parian by John Bell. This may be really considered the most poetical, if not the finest, marble produced in the British school of sculpture. See how delicately round, and yet how full and soft, the flesh of the child is, and how the mother's fingers press into its little sides. It is really an exquisite piece of work. The marble is unpolished, and the prism-cut glass in the roof throws down a kind of glory upon the group.

The Picture-gallery is a noble apartment, lighted from the roof as a matter of course. The pictures are ranged in something like chronological order; the Italian, Spanish, and Flemish pictures in the places of honour. There are four Raffaelles. They are all of one character—"Holy Families," the Virgin and Child, with infant St. Johns and adoring St. Josephs in all but one, in which the Virgin, a pure Italian maiden with a sunny face, is holding the infant Jesus in her arms. Then there is that celebrated picture which once belonged to the Marquis d'Aumont, and is known as "La Sainte Famille au palmier." It is in a circle about four feet high; and the head of Joseph, which is that of a fine old man, with a good, reverent expression, is said to be a portrait of Bramante, the architect. The marquis sold it to M. Delanoul, whence it found its way into the Orleans gallery, and thence into the possession of the Duke of Bridgewater. It has been well transferred from panel to canvas, and is by many considered the gem of the collection. In another "Holy Family," the Virgin is lifting the drapery from the sleeping figure of the infant Jesus with all a mother's care; and in another, St. John is paying him homage. In all of them there is the same exquisite expression of love and reverence. These Raffaelles are engraved in the well-known "Crozat-gallery."

We pass on to the Claudes. Claude Lorraine was born in the year 1600, and died full of years in 1682. Another kind of enthralment comes over the gazer's mind. Deep shadowy landscape scenery, with here and there a figure; in the foreground a noble pile of buildings, with Corinthian pillars and porticoes, and, in the distance, great blue mountains, or dark, thought-provoking, deeply-flowing waters, which stretch into dim mist, and seem miles and miles away! Look at that "Demosthenes on the Sea-shore." The orator is pacing the sand-bank near the ruins of a beautiful Grecian portico, studying, perhaps, some thrilling Philippic to hurl at the head of the arch-enemy of his country. A couple of ships lie at anchor in the still waters, and a wide expanse of blue stretches itself away and mingles in the distance with the sky. This picture belonged, during the life of the painter, to M. de Bourlemont, and afterwards to Mr. Clarke and the Hon. Edward Bouverie; for the latter of whom it was purchased by the duke. It is engraved in the Liber Veritatis, No. 171, and also in the Stafford Gallery. Many engraved copies have been made of this true picture, which is fully described in Smith's "Catalogue Raisonné."

There are in this collection five specimens of Rembrandt's skill,—a group representing Samuel and Eli, and four portrait studies. One, the head of a burgo-master, an old white-bearded man, seated in an arm-chair, attracts us very much. It is painted in exactly the manner which we have been taught to consider the Dutchman's best style—full of colour, deep, grave, harmonious, and without those ugly misshapen outlines so frequently seen in the pictures of this master. Rembrandt (born 1606, died 1674) appears to have paid greater attention to colour than to form; but as a portrait painter he was unrivalled in his day.

Then, these four Titians, all good, but dimmed and yellowed here and there with age, especially in the flesh-tints of his nude figures. The "Diana and her Nymphs interrupted at the Bath by the Hunter Acteon," a picture nearly eight feet square, with six female figures in various attitudes of surprise and shame, is a gem. It was formerly in the Orleans collection, and has been engraved in the works known as the Galerie du Palais Royale and the Stafford Gallery; as are also the "Venus rising from the Sea," a single half-length naked figure, and the "Diana and Calisto," a companion to the "Diana and Acteon," painted on a canvas of the same size. These two pictures were painted, Varsuri informs us in his "Historia Pittorica," for Philip the Second of Spain. They afterwards came into the possession of our first Charles, whence they found their way into the Orleans Gallery, and from it to their place upon these walls. They are distinguished by all the peculiarities of this great master (born 1477, died 1576), who may be said to have been the founder of the Venetian School, the painters in which usually drew their figures direct from the living model, without first preparing a cartoon, or paper drawing. Thus we find, as in the Venus, both the beauties and the blemishes of the actual figures transferred to the canvas. "An Allegory of the Three Ages of Life," an undoubted original by the same master, is not so successful as those we have mentioned, three children gathered together in a group in one corner, being mere bags of flesh colour. The same subject has been several times chosen by Titian, one treatment of it being in the Borghese Palace at Rome, and another in the Manfrini Gallery at Venice. The one before us was painted for Giovanni de Castelli; and subsequently passed through the collections of the Cardinal of Augsburg, the Queen of Sweden, and the Duke of Orleans.

One picture, "The Entombment," by Sebastian del Piombo (born 1485, died 1537), is supposed to have been designed by the celebrated painter, Michael Angelo Buonarroti, from whose pencil no example is to be found in the Bridgewater Gallery. "A Female Head," by Luini, also in the style of Michael Angelo, is very fine.

There are here four specimens of Tintoretto (born 1512, died 1594), one a portrait of a Venetian councillor, "The Presentation in the Temple," a small sketch from the Orleans Gallery, and two Portraits of Gentlemen. Velasquez (born 1594, died 1660) is also represented in this gallery by three portraits; but to judge of what this noble Spaniard is really capable, the connoisseur should see his "Boar Hunt in the Prado," in the National Gallery, a work which, though injured by time and bad cleaning, has been pronounced by no less an authority than Sir Edwin Landseer, as one of the best in the collection.

Salvator Rosa (born 1615, died 1673), Guido Reni (born 1575, died 1642), and Murillo (born 1618, died 1685), are each well represented in the Bridgewater Gallery. The first by two fine landscapes, one of which, from the collection of the Duc de Praslin, was known as "Les Augures," or "The Soothsayers." It is a very fine picture of bold mountainous scenery, the principal feature of which is a large overhanging rock at the mouth of the Tagus, and known by the sailors as the rock of Lisbon. Guido is here seen to perfection in an "Assumption," after the manner of, and almost as fine as, that famous picture of Murillo's which was purchased by Louis Napoleon, at the sale of Marshal Soult's pictures, for £22,000. This beautiful picture was purchased by the Earl of Ellesmere from Messrs. Smith of Bond-street, into whose possession it came at the dispersion of Mr. Watson Taylor's collection at Eulstoke in 1832. By the latter gentleman it was bought of M. de la Haute, who purchased it in Paris of General Sebastiani, and he obtained it from the Cathedral at Seville. Its pedigree, therefore, is perfect. The pure, beautiful, star-crowned virgin, surrounded by angels, who bear her up into heaven, was never more simply or enchantingly rendered. This picture is a perfect gem, and, in point of colour and preservation, is far before the "Venus Attired by the Graces," by the same master, in the National Gallery. It has lately been well engraved by Mr. H. Watt. The Murillo is a recent acquisition by the Earl. The subject is the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus. It is a fine, spirited painting.

Domenichino, of whom there are five examples here, and Guido, were the most celebrated pupils and followers of the Carracci school of paintings. Nowhere, says Mrs. Jameson, can the Carracci style be so well studied as in the Bridgewater Gallery. And, in truth, the thirteen specimens of Ludovico and Annibale may be said to be unapproachable for beauty and perfect preservation. They are all religious subjects, altar-pieces, except the Danae of the latter painter—a fine painting, eight feet by five, from the Orleans collection.

Seven pictures called "The Sacraments," painted at Rome by Nicolo Poussin (born 1613, died 1673) for M. Chantelou, occupy the centre of the right wall of the gallery. They are fine specimens of the Frenchman's manner, but the colours appear to have "gone in," probably from some peculiarity in their composition, so that the outlines of some of the figures can scarcely be seen through the darkness. The picture, called "Penance," represents Mary washing the feet of Jesus, and is extremely full of figures; and that, called "Ordination," shows Our Saviour giving the keys to Peter. They are very fine compositions.

Other pictures—by Correggio, Paul Veronese, Emanuel De Witt, F. Millé, Palma Vecchio, Parmigiano, Carlo Cigniano, Valentin, Schiavone;—two, full of figures, representing a procession in front of St. Peter's, and the interior of a picture gallery, by Giovanni Panini (born 1691, died 1758), and a fine copy of Murillo, by Grimoux, representing the Youthful Saviour as a shepherd, with his hand on the head of a lamb—the original of which is in the National Gallery—will attract the visitors' attention.

But we must hasten into the inner rooms, which are devoted to the Flemish, Dutch, French, and English schools. Here are so many fine pictures that to notice a title of them would swell our sketch to too great a length.

There is, in the front gallery, a Vandervelde, which is considered by many the most famous specimen of the master. It is a grand sea view, with stormy weather, and a rolling sea. In the front is a Dutch packet with the sea breaking over her bows, and stretching back is a long perspective of water, painted with great truth and force. In the Dutch room, in so bad a light as only to be seen, and that imperfectly, from one point of view, is a companion to this Vandervelde, by our countryman Turner. They are nearly the same size, and the Englishman's picture is painted in the same style as the Dutchman's, and represents squally weather, rolling sea, grand distance, fishing boats in front. Comparing one with the other, it is difficult to say which is the finest picture. They are both excellent.

We must not conclude without a brief mention of Paul de la Roche's celebrated picture of Charles I. in the guard-house, which represents the soldiers insulting the unhappy king with their coarse jibes, and drinking and smoking. It is unquestionably one of the finest specimens in the gallery.

"THE DELUGE," BY POUSSIN.

POUSSIN has, in this celebrated picture, rendered the threat of the Almighty, in the sixth chapter of Genesis, in the most striking form of which it is capable. The fountains of the great deep are broken up. The waters have rushed forth, have covered the plains, and are rising towards the mountain tops. The scene is half hidden by a hazy damp atmosphere, a great waste of waters has blotted out green fields and pleasant valleys, towns and cities, and all that made earth beautiful; and have surprised men eating and drinking and making merry. All that is yet living is to be found on the summits of the hills, but the mist and opaqueness of the clouds tell but too clearly that this last refuge will also soon be destroyed.

the waters are at the very moment crumbling them away beneath his feet. Death stares them in the face whichever way they look.

Poussin knows how both to sympathise and furnish food for thought. In reproducing these terrible scenes, he at once recalls their origin and surrounds them with an air of religious grandeur. In the foreground of the picture upon a bare rock, he shows us the serpent crawling from the rising waters, and thus connects the memory of Adam's fall with the calamity which is engulfing the world. He seems to struggle against impending death, and to be resolved to perish only with the last of the race which he has ruined and betrayed.

In reference to this, St. Pierre tells an interesting anecdote

THE DELUOE. FROM A PAINTING BY POUSSIN.

In the midst of this wide-spread desolation man appears standing at bay with death. The painter has, with admirable skill, detailed the universal disaster which has befallen the species, and, still more, has represented the different stages of it without doing any violence to the general unity and harmony of the whole composition. In the prow of the boat which has been upset, an old man, standing up and in view of impending death, makes a last appeal to heaven, while his younger and more vigorous companion seems still disposed to struggle against fate. Another boat is just touching the land, impelled by a pole which a man pushes in the stern. Another on the bank is leaning over to lay hold of his child, which his wife hands up to him, in the hope that they may all find shelter from the torrents upon the rocks behind him, though of Jean Jacques Rousseau. "One day," says he, "when we were speaking of Poussin's 'Deluge,' Rousseau sought to fix my attention upon the serpent creeping up the rock for the purpose of avoiding the water, with which the earth was everywhere covered. After having heard what he had to say, I replied, 'It seems to me that in this sublime painting there is a still more striking feature—the infant which the mother is handing to its father upon the rock; the child aids their efforts with its little legs. The spirit is struck in the midst of all the crimes and follies of earth, by the spectacle of innocence, subjected to the same law as crime, and of maternal love more powerful than the love of life.' He then said to me, 'Oh, yes—it's the child, there can be no doubt that it's the child which forms the principal object.'"

DON DIEGO VELASQUEZ.

ONE day, as Velasquez had just finished the portrait of the Grand Admiral of Castile, Don Adrian Pulido Parcja, Philip IV. entered the studio of his principal painter, and, perceiving the admiral's portrait, addressed it in the following terms: "What are you doing there? Is it thus that you execute my orders? Is it not to you that I have confided the honour of most flattering tribute which could be paid to the genius of Velasquez, a genius of a high and haughty order, which looked upon painting only as a means of recommencing the task of creation.

Don Diego Rodriguez de Silva y Velasquez was, according to the testimony of the Spanish writers, born at Seville in 1599, and not in 1594, as so many of his biographers have stated. His family, which was noble, and, indeed, claimed to be descended from the ancient kings of Alba Longa, was originally Portuguese, but, being reduced by adverse circumstances, left Portugal and established itself in Spain. His father and mother were far from being rich; they were not able to give their son wealth, but they resolved that he should, at least, enjoy the advantage of a liberal education, and they accordingly placed him under the care of the most learned preceptors. During his literary studies, Velasquez evinced great talent for drawing, and his parents determined that he should follow the bent of his inclination. His first master was Francesco Herrera, commonly surnamed The Old, a man of horrible temper and indomitable roughness of behaviour, who had formed for himself a style of painting in harmony with his natural character. He was a contemporary of Caravaggio, and possessed that artist's sombre humour, as well as his savage boldness and spirited touch. But he treated his pupils and his family in the same fashion that he painted his pictures,—that is to say, with a sort of savage fury. The consequence was that he estranged every one from him; and Velasquez was soon obliged to quit the school of a master who was abandoned by even his own children. Velasquez's stay with Herrera the Old was, however, of use to him. He contracted a taste for a free, energetic, and spirited style of execution, which formed a favourable contrast with the timid manner of the former painters of Andalusia! and, by dint of seeing his master succeed through his audacity, he accustomed himself to a mode of painting that was full of freedom and vigour.

At this period there lived at Seville a fellow-disciple of Herrera the Old, namely, Francesco Pacheco, who was as quiet my flag?" The fact is, that on entering the dimly-lighted room, the monarch at first supposed the portrait to be the admiral himself; perceiving his mistake, however, he turned towards Velasquez and said: "My son, you completely deceived me." * This was, without the slightest doubt, the and moderate as Herrera was impetuous. On quitting the studio of Herrera for that of Pacheco, Velasquez found in his second master not only a good painter, especially in fresco, but also a clever author and a poet, whose house, says Palomino, was the golden prison of painting,—el carcel dorado del Arte. Around him used to be collected all the literary celebrities that inhabited Seville, or merely passed through it, and, among others, Herrera, The Divine, author of a treatise on painting; Francesco Quevedo de Villegas, an ingenious poet; and the immortal author of "Don Quixote de la Mancha," Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra. How charming is the history of art! It is she who raises certain portions of the hangings which the political historian has never touched; it is she who introduces us unexpectedly through a secret door into the abodes of painters, showing us personages whom we never expected to meet, and who have come there to spend the pleasantest hours of life, namely, those that are passed among philosophers, artists, and dreamers. What a piece of good fortune for a young painter to grow up in the company of such men, and to benefit his mind with the rich treasures of their conversation! We can easily imagine that in this studio, where two ardent young students, Alonzo Cano and Velasquez, might be seen at work, the days must have glided very quickly by, and that every moment must have been well filled up, either while Pacheco was drawing the portrait of Cervantes in red and black chalks,* or the portrait was inspiring Quevedo with a number of pleasing verses, or lastly, while, the illustrious novelist was recounting the prowess of the last of the knights-errant, or opening a door to the imagination of his auditors through which they might look out upon that rugged landscape of the Sierra-Morena, which resembles no other in the world.†

Although, from the portrait, painted by himself, it might be supposed that Velasquez was a man of violent temper, he was, on the contrary, sociable and mild. Pacheco, seeing him already so skilful, and so attentive to the noble conversation of his visitors, took a particular liking to him. He showed him all the pictures which at that period were sent to Seville from Rome, Naples, Venice, and even the Low Countries, and procured for him permission to study and copy them. But none of these numerous works possessed the same charm for Velasquez as the pictures of his compatriot Luis Tristan de Toledo, whom he admired for his fine colouring and vivid conception. This was, without a doubt, because these qualities agreed best with his own peculiar ideas; for, as a general rule, what artists admire in others is a portion of themselves. It is, however, a remarkable fact, that Velasquez, thereby proving that he was a painter born, had succeeded in appreciating his two masters at their proper value, and appropriating what struck him as the best points in each of them. He detested the natural savageness of Herrera the Old, but he borrowed his vigorous and bold style; he admired Pacheco's cultivated taste, but he could not adopt that learned professor's chastened and quiet manner; so that he formed his palette from the one and his mind from the other. It was at the conclusion of this double course of education, when he was about twenty years of age, that Velasquez married his master's daughter, Dona Juana, as Pacheco has told us in his "Treatise on Painting."‡

As we all know, the ideal was never the domain of the Spanish painters. By ideal we mean the grand style. The lot of this vigorous school was to express passion, to seize on reality, and represent subjects palpitating with life. In this sense Don Diego Velasquez was the most Spanish painter of all the painters of Spain. He must be followed and observed step by step, in the path conducting to that kind of perfection which he was destined to attain. His favourite master, that master whom he placed above Pacheco and Herrera the Old, was nature. He consulted nature every moment of the day. His first sketches were taken from everyday life, and represented the personages he met in the streets and pasadas of his native city. They are peculiarly valuable for the true picture they afford us of the manners and characteristics of the lower classes in Spain at the period in which he lived. They also exhibit a great luxuriance of still life. When his friends reproached him with not selecting higher subjects, Velasquez was accustomed to reply, that the foundation of his art must be strength; delicacy might follow afterwards as the superstructure. In these first productions of his pencil he coloured in the style of Caravaggio, but he altered his style after having seen some pictures by Lanfranc, Guido, and Pomerancio. His model for heads was Domenico, surnamed el Garco, a most strange and extravagant artist, who would have been much greater than he was, but from an absurd apprehension of being taken for a copyist of Titian, under whom he is said to have studied. But Velasquez never copied Domenico servilely, observing, that "what this master did well was the best of all things, and that what he did ill was bad in the extreme." He had taken into his service a young peasant, who never left him.* He used to study his slightest gestures, and place his body in a thousand different positions, carefully noting in his physiognomy the expressions of gaiety or sadness, of attention or indifference, of pleasure or fear, produced by the events of everyday life. There was, in a word, no nice delicacy, no difficulty of drawing, no case of foreshortening that he avoided. In this manner did he study humanity in one man, and endeavour to seize in this model, always the same and yet always changing, not only the trace of the ordinary emotions of the soul, but every advantage which painting can derive from the different attitudes of the human body. He studied upon this peasant's face the furrows caused by smiles as well as those produced by tears—furrows which, according to the remark of a certain philosopher, serve to express joy as well as grief. Nor, while Velasquez was thus indefatigable in the actual use of his pencil, did he neglect the theoretical part of his art, but read every author of credit who could form his judgment or expand his mind.

So great was the confidence of Velasquez in the rich variety of nature, that whenever he drew upon her inexhaustible treasury, he almost invariably did so at hazard, being very certain that he should everywhere meet with beauty, and that he should be able to represent it to others. Setting out from this principle, he, at first, had no other end in view than a scrupulous imitation of the form and tone of every object, finishing each portion of it with the same care, and imparting to it all the vigour which he thought he saw in it. Is it not to this that naturalism must inevitably lead its votaries, at least at the commencement? If we consider art as a mere counter-impres of nature, everything in the latter immediately enchants us. Exclusively absorbed by the wish to render our copy a faithful one, we attach the same importance to the accessories as to the principal parts; taking each detail separately, we begin by working on it with passion and energy, without consenting to sacrifice a single one. The consequence of this is, that the various plans, which we should have distinguished from each other, are all confounded together, the relative value of the tones escapes us, and, from our very desire to obtain accent and relief everywhere, we inevitably become harsh. This is exactly what happened to Velasquez in the first trial of strength that he made with nature. His celebrated picture of "The Water Carrier of Seville" (p. 116) belongs to this style. The truthfulness of this picture is, however, so striking that it actually causes the spectator's throat to feel parched, for he beholds a man of the lower classes drinking so eagerly and with such evident enjoyment out of the water-carrier's jug, that he himself would willingly suffer thirst for a long time in order to revel in the pleasure of combined with such artistic skill, and obtained with such certainty.

We think we have discovered the secret of treating painting in this cavalier fashion, and why Velasquez succeeded so marvellously in it. He had commenced by painting objects in the order they presented themselves to his view: birds, fish, fruit, frutas, aves, peces, y cosas inanimadas por el natural, says Cean Bermudez,* and nothing is more capable of forming or perfecting a colourist than the severe study of what is called still fascinate it. The eye of a painter making the round of a calville, for instance, would find pleasure in remarking the fine gradations which would lead him from a pale-yellow to a carnation. The goldfinch, again, with its red head and gold-tipped wings, presents the artist with a whole system of colouring. By imitating nature, and bringing together those colours alone which he felt were related to each other, Velasquez avoided the necessity of blending them. He was thus enabled to preserve their solidity and freshness, because, life. By a course of study of this description we may penetrate some of the mysteries of creation, and learn some of the rules which govern its harmonious natural arrangements. The first objects taken at hazard, the stone on the high road or the wild flower of the fields, contain in themselves the principle of the alliance and the opposition of tones. Their contrast serves to excite our attention, and their harmony to knowing that he could not possibly offend the eye by the juxtaposition of such colours as harmonised naturally with each other, he applied them boldly and surely, exactly where they were wanted, and thus was not under the necessity of working them up.

Meanwhile the news was spread about the Spanish court, that a celebrated painter, Peter Paul Rubens by name, had just arrived in Madrid. Rubens was the bearer of certain official presents from the Duke of Mantua. An hour was appointed for his introduction to Philip IV., and what happened? The officer whom he meets at the door of the king's apartment, the king's intimate friend who is charged with the duty of introducing him, is no other than Velasquez! * The day that these two great painters beheld each other, for the first time, must indeed have been a happy one for them! How comes it that historians have mentioned nothing of this interview? Is it less interesting than that between Philip IV. and Louis XIV. in the Isle of the Conference? Were not these two illustrious princes, we mean Velasquez and Rubens, the most brilliant impersonifications of Spanish and native originality, or of a spirit of nationality more easily recognised, than Velasquez and Rubens.

However this may be, Velasquez, with the permission of the king, who with difficulty parted from him, embarked at Barcelona the 10th August, 1629, on board the vessel of the Marquis de Spinola †. Touching at Venice, he immediately hastened to visit the pictures there. Titian appeared to him as grand as Rubens predicted he would. Veronese enchanted, and Tintoretto captivated him. It was Rubens who inspired the painter of the Spanish monarch with the desire to see Italy; Rubens, whom neither the ideal school of Florence nor the Sixtine Chapel had been able to change; Rubens, who had beheld and copied the "Last Supper" of Leonardo da Vinci with the eyes and the pencil of a master of the Flemish school? Never, perhaps, did nature create two men endowed with a greater degree of master, with the intention of offering the two paintings to his friend Philip IV. At Ferrara, at Bologna, at Rome, Velasquez everywhere met with an honourable reception—thanks to the orders sent by the Duke of Olivares to all the representatives of Spain in Italy. The pope, Urban VIII., lodged the artist in the Vatican, and ordered the keys of those apartments which contained paintings to be given to him. † quez made chalk drawings of the "Last Judgment," the "Prophets and Sybils of the Sixtine Chapel," the "School of Athens," "Parnassus," and the "Incendio del Borgo." So intense, indeed, was his application to study, so incessant were his endeavours to improve himself in his deeply-cherished art, that his physical powers gave way, and he became so ill that he was obliged to move to a more airy and salubrious spot. No sooner had he recovered, however, than he resumed his former course of life, and devoted himself to the study of the antique, every moment of his time being so taken up, that he had scarcely any leisure left to execute two original compositions, "Joseph's Garment," one of his most famous pictures, and "Vulcan's Forge." Both these paintings are chefs-d'œuvre in their way.
